

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

his dandyism. From all those stores, small and great, nothing but that solitary and sorry impression would he receive.

Of all which his wealth could procure him, in the shape of a real enjoyment of poetry, paintings, music, sculpture, and the million of ideas which they might produce, he would know nothing.

Of all the countries that produced his furniture, all the trades that helped to make it, all the arts that went to adorn it, all the materials of which it was composed, and the innumerable images of mes, lands, faculties, substances, elements, and interesting phenomena of all sorts to which the knowledge might give rise, he would know nothing.

Of his books he would know nothing, except that they were bound, and that they cost a great deal.

Of his gardens he would know nothing, except that they were "tedious," and that he occasionally had a pink out of them to put in his button-hole—provided it was the fashion. Otherwise pinks are "vulgar." Nature's and God's fashion is nothing.

Of his hat and his coat it might be thought he must know something; but he would not, except as far as we have stated;—unless, indeed, his faculties might possibly attain to the knowledge of a "fit" or a "set," and then he would not know it with a grace. The knowledge of a good thing, even in the least matters, is not for a person so poorly educated—so worse than left to grow up in an ignorance unsophisticate. Of the creatures that furnished the materials of his hat and coat,—the curious, handicraft beaver, the spinster silkworm, the sheep in the meadows (except as mutton), nothing would he know, or care, or receive the least pleasurable thought from. In the mind that constitutes his man—in the amount of his existence—terribly vacant are the regions—bald places in the map—deserts without even the excitement of a storm. Nothing lives there but himself—a suit of clothes in a solitude—emptiness in emptiness.

Contrast a being of this fashion (after all allowance for caricature) with one who has none of his deformities, but with a stock of ideas such as the other wants. Suppose him poor, even struggling, but not unhappy; or if not without unhappiness, yet not without relief, and unacquainted with the desperation of the other's ennui. Such a man, when he wants recreation for his thoughts, can make them flow from all the objects, or the ideas of those objects, which furnish nothing to the other. The commonest goods and chattels are pregnant to him as fairy tales, or things in a pantomime. His hat, like Fortunatus's Wishing Cap, carries him into the American solitudes among the beavers, where he sits in thought, looking at them during their work, and hearing the majestic whispers in the trees, or the falls of the old trunks that are everlastingly breaking the silence in those wildernesses. His coat shall carry him, in ten minutes, through all the scenes of pastoral life and mechanical, the quiet fields, the sheep-shearing, the feasting, the love-making, the downs of Dorsetshire and the streets of Birmingham, where if he meet with pain in his sympathy, he also, in his knowledge, finds reason for hope and encouragement, and for giving his manly assistance to the common good. The very tooth-pick of the dandy, should this man, or any man like him meet with it, poor or rich, shall suggest to him, if he pleases, a hundred agreeable thoughts of foreign lands, and elegance and amusement,—of tortoiseshells and books of travels, and the comb in his mistress's hair, and the elephants that carry sultans, and the real silver mines of Potosi, with all the wonders of South American history, and the starry cross in its sky; so that the smallest key shall pick the lock of the greatest treasures; and that which in the hands of the possessor was only a poor instrument of affectation, and the very emblem of indifference and stupidity, shall open to the knowing man a universe.

We must not pursue the subject further this week, or trust our eyes at the smallest objects around us, which, from long and loving contemplation, have enabled us to report their riches. We have been at this work now, off and on, man and boy, (for we began essay-writing while in our teens,) for upwards of thirty years; and excepting that, we would fain have done far more, and that experience and suffering have long restored to us the natural kindliness of boyhood, and put an end to a belief in the right or utility of severer views of any thing or person, we feel the same as we have done throughout; and we have the same hope, the same love, the same faith in the beauty and goodness of nature and all her prospects, in space and in time; we could almost add, if a sprinkle of white hairs in our black would allow us, the same youth; for whatever may be thought of a consciousness to that effect, the feeling is so real, and trouble of no ordinary kind has so remarkably spared the elasticity of our spirits, that we are often startled to think how old we have become, compared with the little of age that is in our disposition: and we mention this to bespeak the reader's faith in what we shall write hereafter, if he is not acquainted with us already. If he is, he will no more doubt us than the children do at our fire-side. We have had so much sorrow, and yet are capable of so much joy, and receive pleasure from so many familiar objects, that we sometimes think we should have had an unfair portion of happiness, if our life had not been one of more than ordinary trial.

The reader will not be troubled in future with personal intimations of this kind: but in commencing a new work of the present nature, and having been persuaded to put our name at the top of it, (for which we beg his kindest constructions, as a point conceded by a sense of what was best for others,) it will be thought, we trust, not unfitting in us to have alluded to them. We believe we may call ourselves the father of the present penny and three half-penny literature,—designations, once distressing to "ears polite," but now no longer so, since they are producing so many valuable results, fortunes included. The first number of the new popular review, the Printing Machine, in an article for the kindness and cordiality of which we take this our best opportunity of expressing our gratitude, and can only wish we could turn these sentences into so many grips of the hand to show our sense of it,—did us the honour of noticing the Indicator as the first successful attempt (in one respect) to revive something like the periodical literature of former days. We followed this with the Companion, lately republished in connexion with the Indicator; and a few years ago, in a fit of anxiety at not being able to meet some obligations, and fearing we were going to be cut off from life itself without leaving answers to still graver wants, we set up a half-reviewing, half-theatrical periodical, under the name of the Tatler (a liberty taken by love), in the hope of being able to realize some sudden as well as lasting profits! So little, with all our zeal for the public welfare, had we found out what was so well discerned by Mr. Knight and others, when they responded to the intellectual wants of the many. However, we pleased some readers, whom it is a kind of prosperity even to rank as such: we conciliated the good-will of others, by showing that an ardent politician might still be a man of no ill-temper, nor without good-will to all; and now, once more setting up a periodical work, entirely without politics, but better calculated, we trust, than our former ones to meet the wishes of many as well as few, we are in hearty good earnest, the public's very sincere and cordial friend and servant,

LEIGH HUNT.

FIRST WEEK IN APRIL.

The Swallow—the Cuckoo—the Nightingale. Letter from Mr. Fox to Lord Grey, giving his opinion of the Song of the Nightingale.

So extraordinary has been the winter, and full of all vernal anticipation, that it is impossible to expect, as a matter of course, any of the usual coincidences of the season. In the first week of April, swallows may generally be looked for in the south of England, and the Cuckoo and Nightingale may be heard; but we are not sure, that before this paragraph be read, they will not have become guests of long standing. At all events, we are not so likely, as in some seasons, to be too early for them with our notice. The horse-chestnut is already leafing: the fruit-trees have blossomed; flies have been in the houses the whole winter; cowslips, we suppose, have thickened the beautiful carpets of the meadows; the sun is warm on the back of the pedestrian. Everything, therefore, by day, is ready for the swallow and the cuckoo; and, as to the nightingale, if the nights are still cool, that is no objection with him. His glowing nature seems to love a little cold round about him; from the midst of which his serenade rises with the intenser and therefore the graver joy.

So many quotations have been made in the periodical works from the pages of White of Selborne and others, that we reckon it a piece of good fortune to be able to commence our extracts on these subjects with passages out of a new author, who has a real genius for them. The following notices of the swallows are from the work just published, entitled The Feathered Tribe of Britain, written by Mr. Mudie, an original and earnest observer, whom Nature, as is customary with her, has rewarded for his genuine passion, by making it eloquent. Mr. Mudie's pen is one of the most alive we ever met with. The birds rustle, and dart, and sing, and rend in his pages; and the eagle strains his prey with a truly sovereign foot. The passages here quoted, though very good, are by no means among his best. The reader may, therefore, judge how excellent the latter must be.

"Swallows perform their principal moult in warmer countries about the month of February, appear in plumage in the north of England about the first of April, and proceed northward, colouring as they fly, along all the places that are adapted to their habits, till about the end of the month they appear in the extreme north of the country.

"Swallows are delightful little creatures, not only as they come from a far country, the harbingers of the blooming season; but on account of their industry, the celerity of their motions, and the perfect confidence in which they carry on all their operations.

"The most lovely scenes would lose much of their summer interest, if it were not for the presence and lively motions of the swallow. The banks of rivers and the margins of small lakes, are at all times delightful places for quiet contemplation, and for agreeable walks, when the sultry day draws near to a close, or on those stilly and transparent days which immediately precede rain. But there is an excess of repose about them which would soon become monotonous and heavy, except for the evolutions of the swallows, now shooting into mid air, now skimming the surface of the water, and sipping or laving its plumage, as it speeds along, alternately with darting wing and with dart-like glide. Then, when we think of the myriads of gnats and flies which the teeming waters are constantly giving to the air, to sport (and sting) for their few hours, deposit their eggs, and die, making the shores and shallows, which are inaccessible even by the minnow, rank with their innumerable carcasses, we feel how much the swallow contributes to keep sweet and clean those waters over which it glides, quaffing or bathing the while. The air too, is so still, that we hear the repeated strokes of its bill as it captures those insects which, to our sight, are viewless.

"The Swift is the garretier of nature; not that it inhabits the highest grounds (for the very altitude of its place presupposes productiveness in its locality), but where it is found, it spends its time and finds its food above every other creature. Its place of habitation corresponds; for the highest crevices in steeples, towers, and jutting rocks that rise to a considerable altitude, amid fertile places, are the habitations of the swift, and its instinct leads it to adapt the structure of its nest to the elements.

"In dry weather the swifts hawk only towards morning and evening, flying lower down than when the air is different, and occasionally skimming the surface of the pools, and sipping and laving themselves as they dash along. At these times too, they are sportless and silent, and if the drought is of longer continuance, they seem fatigued; but when the upper air relents, they fly high, appear all day on the wing, accumulate in unwonted numbers, gliding, dashing, wheeling, playing numerous antics, screeching to each other, and apparently acquiring more energy the longer they are on the wing. These sportive dashings in the upper air become more numerous and energetic as the time of their departure approaches, as then their care of their broods has ceased, and they have only their own food to find each for itself. The solstitial showers generally give them a farewell feast; and at that time they may be seen on the wing for sixteen hours in the day without once alighting to rest. Their sight has, by experiment, been found to be so very acute, that from a distance of 400 feet, they can discern an object not more than half an inch in diameter, and how much less than that is not known. The same motive of exertion which they often perform in this country without any apparent rest, would suffice to carry them across the widest sea or desert that is in their way, or even from England to Africa in the course of one flight."

Almost every body is now intimate with certain poetical passages about the cuckoo, and with Mr. Wordsworth's beautiful expression, "a wandering voice," so characteristic of what every body has felt who has heard this mysterious bird, now here and now there in the hedges, playing his hiding flute. In our wish therefore not to repeat what has been said so often, and not to hunt for new poetical passages where they do not happen to present themselves at once to the memory, we shall give another extract from Mr. Mudie's book:—

"Why the people of Scotland should have chosen their name for the cuckoo (gawk) as a synonyme for a fool, it is not easy to say, for there is more cunning about the cuckoo than about most birds, though its history, notwithstanding all that has been seen and imagined, and printed, and spoken, about it, is still as obscure as it is singular.

"Every body has heard the note of the cuckoo, or the imitation of it by a Dutch clock, though domesticated in the most birdless part of the city; and in the summer, it is difficult to be in any part of the country without hearing the cuckoo, and even seeing the bird as it flies hurriedly, and to all appearance heavily, from one tree to another, with generally a few of the smaller birds in its train.

The bird has something the air of the hawk, but none of the powers, and it does not seem to have much of the disposition. Its food is insects and their larvæ, especially the larvæ or caterpillars of the lepidoptera; and, as many of these are highly injurious to trees, it is probable that the cuckoo is of great service, as it is with us at the very seasons when, if not thinned, these caterpillars would commit their depredations. It beats for its food in the trees, and it is probable that its peculiar feet, its long wings and great tail, and its soft plumage, enable it to hunt among the leaves, especially on the under sides of them, in places which the smaller insect-hunting birds cannot reach.

"Considering the general distribution and the numbers of cuckoos, the eggs and young have been very seldom seen, probably not one to a million of the birds. When found, it has always been in the nests of other birds, at least in all those of the recorded instances that are received as properly authenticated; and little birds, pipets and others, have been observed most industriously feeding cuckoos, after these had acquired their young or hair-brown plumage, and could fly. But before the habit can be considered as general, there must be numbers of young observed, bearing some nearer proportion to the abundance of the old birds, than have yet been found, although the cases that are recorded appear to be too many to be considered accidental; and the accident, too, is of a kind that rarely happens in the case of any other wild birds—that is, birds in a state of nature. The disproval of the old theory, that the bones of the under part of the female cuckoo were such that it could not hatch, throws at least a doubt on the universality of the habit, which would demand some additional proof on the other side, more than three or four isolated cases in the season; and that is, perhaps, nearly the usual number of young cuckoos that are seen in the nest.

"Still, we may safely conclude that the absolvment of the cuckoo from nest-building and rearing young, which are the severest labours of other birds, is meant to answer, and does answer, some very important purpose in the economy of nature; and that purpose can be accomplished only by employing in some other way that portion of time in the cuckoo, which, in other birds, is devoted to nidification and nursing. That is the grand point to be ascertained: it can be ascertained only by observation of the most careful nature; and till it is ascertained, the history of the cuckoo, unquestionably the most curious bird that visits the island, must remain imperfect and mysterious; as such, we shall not enter further upon it. Conjectures, in any quantity, may be had in the books."

On the subject of the nightingale we think we cannot please the reader better just now, than with giving a letter written by Mr Fox to the present minister, Lord Grey. It is the more agreeable, inasmuch as it lets us into the privacies of these public men, and shews us how like they are to other men, and to very amiable ones too. The conclusion is particularly pleasant. Mr. Fox was, indeed, a man of such a genial nature, that there is reason to believe that his ascendancy over his friends and his disciples was quite as much owing to it, as to his sense and eloquence; and reasonably; for as social happiness, the kindly intercourse between man and man, is the only end of all politics and statistics, however deep, a man like this exhibits the means and the end together in his own instance, and so leaves no sort of convincing omitted.—But to the letter.

"DEAR GREY,

"In defence of my opinion about the Nightingale, I find that Chaucer, who of all poets seems to have been the fondest of the singing of birds, calls it a merry note; and though Theocritus mentions nightingales six or seven times, he never mentions their note as plaintive or melancholy. It is true, he does not say where call it merry, as Chaucer does, but by mentioning it with the song of the blackbird, and as answering it, he seems to imply that it was a cheerful note. Sophocles is against us; but even he says, lamenting Ilys, and the comparison of her to Electra is rather as to perseverance by day and by night, than as to sorrow. At all events, a tragic poet is not half so good authority in this question as Theocritus and Chaucer. I cannot light upon the passage in the Odyssey where Penelope's restlessness is compared to the nightingale; but I am sure that it is only as to restlessness and watchfulness that he makes the comparison. If you will read the last twelve books of the Odyssey, you will certainly find it, and I am sure you will be paid for your treat whether you find it or not. The passage in Chaucer is in the Flower and Leaf, p. 99.

The one I particularly allude to in Theocritus, is in his Epigrams, I think in the fourth. Dryden has transferred the word merry to the goldfinch, in the Flower and the Leaf, in deference, may be, to the vulgar error; but pray read his description of the nightingale there—it is quite delightful. I am afraid that I like these researches as much better than those that relate to Shaftsbury, Sunderland, &c., as I do those better than attending the House of Commons.

"Your's affectionately,

"C. J. Fox."

How pleasant it is to be enjoying this good-natured statesman's company, long after his death!

As to the question, however, respecting the mirth or melancholy of the nightingale, which he has here somewhat hastily discussed, and which of late years is supposed to have been settled in favour of the gayer side by some fine lines of Mr. Coleridge, it surely resolves itself into a simple matter of association of ideas, and those modified by the hour at which the nightingale is chiefly heard. The word merry, in Chaucer's time, as quoted by Mr. Fox, had not the specific meaning here implied by it, but signified something alive and vigorous after its kind; as in the instance of "merry men," in the old ballads, and "merry England," which did not mean a nation or set of men always laughing and enjoying themselves, but in good hearty condition; a state of manhood befitting men. This point is determined beyond a doubt by Chaucer's application of the word to the organ, as the "merry organ,"—meaning the church organ, which, surely, however noble and organic, is not merry in the modern sense of the word.

The whole matter we conceive to be this. The notes of the nightingale, generally speaking, are not melancholy in themselves, but melancholy from an association with night-time, and the grave reflexions which the hour naturally produces. They may be said to be melancholy also in the finer sense of the word (such as Milton uses it in his Penseroso), inasmuch as they express the utmost intensity of vocal beauty and delight; for the last excessive feelings of delight are always grave. Levity does not do them honour enough, nor sufficiently acknowledge the appeal they make to that finiteness of our nature which they force unconsciously upon a sense of itself, and upon a secret feeling of our capabilities of happiness compared with the brevity of it.

Are not the birth-days of eminent men, and all other anniversaries, previous to the alteration of the old style, marked wrong in the calendars? We fear so. At all events, till we are shewn to be wrong in the opinion, we must act upon it in what we have to date and to state on these points, and, accordingly (to begin with a pleasant name), instead of making Ovid to have been born on the 20th of March, we put his nativity twelve days forward, and make a welcome gift of him to April 1st.—Ovid born. So that the April Fools have not all the days to themselves. His birth dates forty-three years before the Christian era at Salmo, now Salmon in the modern Neapolitan territory of Abruzzo. He was the son of a Roman knight, had an easy fortune, and (to use a modern phrase) was one of the gayest and most popular men about town in Rome for nearly thirty years; till, owing to some mysterious offence given to the court of Augustus, which still forms one of the puzzles of biography, he was suddenly torn from house and home, without the least previous intimation, and in the middle of the night, and sent to a remote and wintry place of exile on the banks of the Danube. Ovid was a good-natured man, tall and slender, with more affections than the levity of his poetical gallantry might lead us to suppose. His gallantries are worth little, and have little effect; but his Metamorphoses are a store-house of beautiful Greek pictures, and tend to keep alive in grown people the feelings of their boyhood.

A health to Ovid, readers of the London Journal: for immortal men never die. We must speak of them as they still exist among us, and not of their memories.

NEWS FOR THE UTILITARIANS.

MR. BENTHAM'S TESTIMONY TO THE PLEASURES OF IMAGINATION, AND THE DUTY OF CULTIVATING AGREEABLE THOUGHTS.

We have been favoured with a copy of Mr. Bentham's posthumous and unpublished work on Deontology, which has been excellently well put together by Dr. Bowring from the manuscripts of his illustrious friend. In a popular point of view, it will be by far the most interesting of the great jurist's productions, being his guide to the virtues and amiabilities of private life, and freed by his pupil from that word-compounding, every-thing-stating, and all-possible-objection-anticipating style, which, though highly desirable for the deeper student as omitting nothing which passed through his mind, was not so well calculated to recommend his book to the general reader. It does not appear to us that Mr. Bentham always makes out his case when stating the grounds of some parts of his philosophy, and the extreme easiness of their practice. He makes too little allowance, we think, for natural impulses; assumes too much necessity for individual reasoning, where the improvement ought to result from the progress of government; and is too apt to take for granted that the reasoning would be conducted in a dispassionate manner. This is the more striking, inasmuch as he himself in this very book, just and amiable as it is, is strongly and strangely moved against a philosopher so remote as Plato; who even makes him forget himself so far, as to regret that there is no Index Expurgatorius—no list of forbidden books—prohibiting the perusal of certain philosophies! The world, however, will not love the Prince of Utilitarians the less for exhibiting these sallies of emotion; and they will love very much indeed, and be agreeably surprised, at the delightful, amiable doctrines laid down for their conduct in private life, and the advantage of general intercourse. From these we shall extract some excellent passages next week. Meanwhile, we present our readers with something which will still more surprise most of the philosopher's enemies, and not a few, perhaps, of his friends; namely, an enthusiastic testimony borne to the utility of imagination, and to the desirableness of cultivating what we have been writing about in our first paper.

"In the pursuit of pleasurable thoughts (exclaims Mr. Bentham) what infinite regions are open to the explorer! The world is all before him; and not this world only, but all the worlds which roll in the unmeasured tracts of space, or the measureless heights and depths of imagination. The past, the present, the future—all that has been, all that is of great and good, of beautiful and harmonious—and all that may be. Why should not the high intellects of days that are gone be summoned into the presence of the inquirer; and dialogues between, or with, the illustrious dead be fancied, on all the points on which they would have enjoyed to discourse, had their mortal existence stretched into the days that are? Take any part of the field of knowledge in its present state of cultivation, and summon into it the sages of former times; place Milton, with his high-toned and sublime philanthropy, amidst the events which are bringing about the emancipation of nations; imagine Galileo holding intercourse with Laplace; bring Bacon—either the Friar or the Chancellor, or both—into the laboratory of any eminent modern chemist, listening to the wonderful development, the pregnant results of the great philosophical mandate—'Experimentalize.' Every man pursuing his own private tendencies, has thus a plastic gift of happiness, which will become stronger by use, and which exercise will make less and less exhaustible all the combinations of sense with matter, the far-stretching theories of genius, the flight of thought through eternity—what should prevent such exercises of the mind's creative will? How interesting are those speculations which convey men beyond the region of earth into more intellectual and exalted spheres. Where creatures endowed with capacities far more expansive, with senses far more exquisite than observation had ever offered to human knowledge, are brought into the regions of thought. How attractive and instructive are even some of the Utopian fancies of imaginative and benevolent philosophy! Regulated and controlled by the utilitarian principle, imagination becomes a source of boundless blessings."

"In all cases where the power of the will can be exercised over the thoughts, let those thoughts be directed towards happiness. Look out for the bright, for the brightest side of things, and keep your face constantly turned to it. If exceptions there are, those exceptions are but few, and sanctioned only by the consideration that a less favourable view may, in its results, produce a larger sum of enjoyment on the whole; as where, for example, an increased estimate of difficulty, or danger, might be needful to call up a greater exertion for the getting rid of a present annoyance. When the mind, however, reposes upon its own complacencies, and looks around itself for search of food for thought—when it seeks rest from laborious occupation, or is forced upon inaction by the pressure of adjacent circumstances, let all its ideas be made to spring up in the realms of pleasure, as far as the will can act upon the production.

"A large part of existence is necessarily passed in inaction. By day (to take an instance from the thousand in constant recurrence), when in attendance on others, and time is lost by being kept waiting; by night, when sleep is unwilling to close the eyelids—the economy of happiness recommends the occupations of pleasurable thought. In walking abroad, or in resting at home, the mind cannot be vacant; its thoughts may be useful, useless, or pernicious to happiness; direct them aright; the habit of happy thought will spring up like any other habit.

"Let the mind seek to occupy itself by the solution of questions upon which a large sum of happiness or misery depends. The machine, for example, that abridges labour will, by the very improvement and economy it introduces, produce a quantity of suffering. How shall that suffering be minimized? Here is a topic for benevolent thought to engage in. Under the pressure of the immediate demands of the poor, Sully is said to have engaged them in raising huge and useless mounds in his garden. Others have been found to propose the digging holes and filling them again, as meet employment for industry when ordinary labour fails. But what a fertile field for generous consideration is that, which seeks to provide the clear accession to the national stock of riches and happiness which all real improvements bring with them, at the least possible cost of pain; to secure the permanent good at the smallest and least enduring inconvenience; to make the blessings that are to be diffused among the many, fall as lightly as possible in the shape of evil on the few! Perhaps when the inevitable misery is really reduced to the smallest amount, by the attentions of the intelligent and benevolent, the transition will become, in most instances, neither perilous, as it has often been made by riotous violence towards those who introduce it, nor alarming to those whose labour may be temporarily shifted by its introduction."

"It frequently happens, when our own mind is unable to furnish ideas of pleasure with which to drive out the impressions of pain, these ideas may be found in the writings of others, and those writings will probably have a more potent interest when utterance is given to them. To a mind rich in the stores of literature and philosophy, some thought appropriate to the calming of sorrow, or the brightening of joy, will scarcely fail to present itself, clothed in the attractive language of some favourite writer; and when emphatic expression is given to it, its power may be considerably increased. Poetry often lends itself to this benignant purpose; and where sound and sense, truth and harmony, benevolence and eloquence are allied, happy indeed are their influences."

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 2, 1834.

THE best things going forward in the poetical world are the play of the Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, (not one of the author's best, but Knowles, as Ben Jonson said of Cartwright, "writes all like a man,") and the editions, in monthly volumes, of the works of Burns and Crabbe. Our living poets just now, with the exception of Mr. Knowles, are as silent as birds in August. One of them, a warbler partaking of the mocking tribe, may be heard at intervals in the Times, imitating grave speeches with which we have nothing to do in these columns. Intimations, however, are given of something new from Miss Landon, who (to keep up our metaphor) is the very dove of the modern Castaly, giving out such a perpetual note of luxurious melancholy, that we know not whether to call it sorrow or love. And Elliot, in the magazines, occasionally beats against the iron bars of restriction, and utters his indignant cry. The best poetry we have seen a long time is the prose of Professor Wilson's commentaries on Homer and the Greek Anthology, in Blackwood's Magazine. And this reminds us that there is a new poetess who writes in that magazine, and whom, in our ignorance perhaps of many of its former numbers, we never heard of till lately—Miss Hamilton. We know not who she is, except that she is one whom everybody ought to know. Her Muse is a kind of younger and less stately sister of Mrs. Hemans, with less command of images, and yet, we should guess, with a more universal sympathy.

It has been well observed by somebody, that Burns was not so uneducated a man as is supposed. He had jokes, and some good teaching, and was acquainted, at an early period, with some of the best writers. We notice the circumstance chiefly in order to observe, that the intelligent part of what are called the uneducated are apt to be better instructed than is supposed, and that many a workman and peasant would surprise people, if they talked with him, with the amount of his acquired knowledge, and his habits of reflection. Many years ago a celebrated public speaker, now living, told us that he made a point of talking his best, to whatever multitude were assembled; finding by experience that the emotion and interest of the hearers always found an understanding in themselves equal to the highest things he could say. And since the lapse of that period, how have not the means of knowledge increased with the cheapness of literature! About mid-way betwixt this time and that, we heard a common working-man, as he walked along a country road, say more sensible, superior, and charitable things concerning a hare-hunt that was going on before him, than would have entered into the heads of the best educated men in his village fifty years ago, or perhaps enters into them now; not, of course, for want of equal natural faculties, but because his class have discovered that it is their interest to know as much as they can; while, on the other hand, the richest people are not always equally alive to the necessity of being in advance of that knowledge.

In consequence of the universal reading of cheap literature, Burns, perhaps does not require a glossary for his finest English words with any of those among the working classes in this country, who are respected among each other for their intelligence; and when the Scottish poet wrote English only, he sometimes affected words fine enough. It was the only evidence of a defective education betrayed by his style.

The reader will see in another place our opinion of Mr. Mudie's Feathered Tribes of England, and Mrs. Lemon Grimstone's novel of Cleone. The new Review for the many, entitled the Printing Machine, full of sterling sense and acuteness, and admirably adapted to its purpose, requires no recommendation of Mr. D'Israeli's second volume of his ninth edition of the Curiosities of Literature was published yesterday, and is still more entertaining than the first. Every body that can get it, should read the Bubbles from the Brunns of Nassau, by an Old Man, for its sense, spirit, and humanity. But they say it is by Sir Francis Head, who scampered across the Pampas; and how can he be an old man? We cannot conceive of him in any such light. He must be riding and scampering still somewhere, and if he is not, must surely remain as young in his age as Lord Peterborough, who was the greatest poster of his time in Europe, and famous for his vivacity at seventy. Besides, they say that Sir Francis is not old: why then, should he call himself so? Is it his only affectation, and does he do it, like other middle aged seniors, only to make people protest against the epithet, and exclaim, "You old!"

The friends of the gentleman so long and so agreeably known to the circles of taste and literature by the title of "Conversation Sharp," (we believe the name is to be, and can be, no secret with the public) will be glad to find that a collection of his Letters and Essays in Prose and Verse has appeared. It has this moment been put into our hands. At the second page we meet with the following pleasant foretaste of the rest:—

"Utinam et verba in usu quotidiano posita minus timeremus."

"He that would write well," says Roger Ascham, must follow the advice of Aristotle, speak as the common people speak, and think as the wise think."

"In support of this opinion many of the examples cited by you are amusing as well as convincing. The following from a great author may be added—

"Is there a God to swear by, and is there none to believe in, none to trust to?"

"What becomes of the force and simplicity of this short sentence, when turned into the clumsy English which schoolmasters indite, and which little boys can construe? 'Is there a God by whom to swear, and is there none in whom to believe, none to whom to pray?'"

The whole of the volume is very sensible and elegant, and bears out the author's colloquial reputation.

Some of the letters, we should think, will get into the collections.

The First Book of a "Revolutionary Epick," or as he designates it, "The Revolutionary Epick," has been published by Mr. D'Israeli, Junr. He says he conceived the idea of it on the "plains of Troy," and that the old opinion of a connexion between Epic poems and the spirit of their age, flashed across his mind "like the lightning which was then playing over Ida." There is more of the same magnificence of announcement, but it is suddenly checked by suggestions of modesty; and the author concludes his preface with humbly asking the public whether he shall proceed or not. It appears to us, from what we have seen of his poem, and of another work of his which we have lately read through, "The Psychological Romance," that Mr. D'Israeli has feeling, reflection, and imagination, the last in abundance but not of the subtlest or most poetical order; and that he too often takes splendid common-places, and the conclusions of other men's philosophy, for inventions of his own. His talents have gold in them, but mixed with alloy too obvious for currency, and are coarse in their "image and superscription." There is a sort of Oriental flare about him, which, with a little less thinking of his own glorification, and more of the inner man, would probably subside into a steady and shining light.

Landscape and portraiture of a mediocre rate do not constitute an interesting collection for exhibition, and Suffolk Street has not much else to boast of this year. Not that there is an absolute destitution of talent, but what there is lies chiefly among the young and unfinished, and what there is of mastery is mostly second or third rate. Still there are a few pictures worth seeing. Hancock's "Old Squire," pleased us more than any of his that we have seen. Inskipp has some striking pictures. The last of his name is very pretty. Childe has many exceedingly good. The effect of night with the deep rich tone, in the moonlight picture, 353, could not be better. The Moorish Tower is a very lively painting, and also the splendid Interior of a Church, by D. Roberts. Holines's pictures are not his best; but they are clever as usual. Lance shews us some tempting fruit. His Lady and Gentleman, are not quite so happy. Barrett also, and Allen, assist in brightening the walls. 676. Flowers, by V. Bartholomew, are amazing for their brilliancy. We must also mention an exceedingly clever picture by W. Derby, facetiously called Turkey in Europe, being a dead turkey and other articles in still life, admirably painted. This picture perhaps struck us more than any in the place, from its great reality. We trust that we shall not be thought availing ourselves of an undue opportunity, in stating that Mr. Lawrence, a young artist who promises to do honour to his name, has an excellent likeness of one of the daughters of the Editor of this Journal.

Mr. Huggins, upon his appointment as Marine Painter to the King, had a commission for three pictures commemorative of the battle of Trafalgar; and two of these pictures are now exhibiting at Exeter Hall. To all who are interested in the actions of Nelson, (and few can be otherwise) they are worth the visit. The first presents the state of the action about half an hour after its commencement, the ships still orderly and fresh, ranged side by side, packed together, pouring the heavy torrents of destruction close into each other's fabric. The Victory looks like the noblest personification of its name, for it is already battered, as though it had drawn to itself the fiercest danger, solely that it might satisfy the desire of power, and have more to conquer. Of all modern fighters Nelson is the one to whose person attaches our greatest sense of heroism. So brave, so his remarkable answer. On the duke's saying, there must be something very odd in the man, Barnard answered, "I imagine he must be mad." "He seems surprised that I should have pistols," his Grace continued, to which he made answer, "I was surprised to see your Grace with pistols, and your star on." "Why were you surprised at that?" "It was so cold a day, I wondered you had not your great coat on," was his reply after a little hesitation.—On reading that part of the letter to him, which mentioned his father's being out of town, he remarked, "It is very odd; my father was then out of town."—This last circumstance struck the Duke more particularly, as the letter had no date. Before they parted, his Grace concluded with saying, "If you are innocent, it becomes you, much more than me, to find out the author of these letters, as it is an attempt to blast your character." Barnard then smiled, and took his leave.

On the strength of these circumstances, it was soon after thought proper to take him into custody. He was indicted, tried on the Black Act, at the Session House, in the Old Bailey, in May, 1758, and after a long and patient investigation, of the circumstances, equally honourable to the candour and humanity of the Duke, and to the impartiality of the judges and jury, acquitted.—It appeared in favour of the prisoner, corroborated by respectable evidence, that, on the day he met the Duke in Hyde Park, he had been sent by his father on business to Kensington. As to his being in the Abbey, a Mr. Greenwood, a person of credit, who, as is before observed, was seen with him there, proved that, contrary to Mr. Barnard's wish he had, with some difficulty, persuaded him to walk with him from Abingdon Buildings to the Park, that morning: that they were going thither without passing through the abbey, but Greenwood recollecting a new monument he had not seen, insisted on his going that way.

Many persons of fortune and reputation appeared: some of whom had dined with him at Kensington on the day above mentioned. These, with many others, had repeatedly heard Mr. Barnard speak with wonder of having twice met the Duke of Marlborough, and the circumstance of his Grace speaking to him being very singular.

They all united in the most ample testimonies of his regularity, sobriety, and pecuniary credit, and his being in the habit of daily receiving considerable sums.

Our authority for the above curious story informs us, that certain circumstances afterwards occurred, particularly a transaction with an East India director, which rendered the guilt of Barnard highly probable. The circumstances are puzzling; but we believe him to have been the man, particularly as he was so brief in his replies, and showed no anxiety to bring the offender to light. A clever man, such as he evidently was, could easily have contrived to make Greenwood appear to have originated the wish to go into the abbey, and even to have made him do so: and as to the inconsistency of the rest of his conduct, there is no end to such inconsistencies in men as at present educated. Barnard might even have been conscious of a touch of the madness, which he attributed to the anonymous person, and which his questions and his strange smile not a little resemble. At the same time it is, perhaps, not unlikely that he had accomplices; that either of them was prepared to come forward, as the case might require; and yet that neither would stir more in it, if unsuccessful, than their knowledge of each other's secrets would render advisable.

OLEONE.

THE NEW NOVEL. AN ENTIRE ABSTRACT.

THIS tale opens with the year 1810 during the assizes at Lancaster, where the hero, Sidney Mountwarren, a briefless barrister, is introduced to us. He is described as exhibiting by his general demeanour, the appearance of one who entertains a proud yet inoffensive consciousness of his own power, together with a disdainful sense of the neglect and privations which merit is ever fated to endure. While he is standing amid the crowd, musing upon his fortune, he excites the observation of an elderly person in the court, who, through a natural sympathy with the pensive melancholy of the young barrister, conceives a strong desire to effect a nearer acquaintance with him. The accident of a fall on the part of the old man, as he approaches Mountwarren, facilitates this object by eliciting the polite assistance of the latter, and the conversation begun with the common-places of good breeding, is continued in the language of friendly feeling. Mountwarren finds in his new acquaintance a person of singular good humour and affability: his name is Festus Felix Connor, of whom we are told that his blood "was a compound of Irish and Italian," so that the real place of his nativity is left to surmise, though the Sister Isle, upon the whole, seems to possess the best claim. The interrogations of a personal kind which naturally arise in the early stage of this acquaintance, gave occasion to many national reflections, amongst which the following is deserving of notice.

"Were I a North Briton," says Mountwarren, "I should not stand alone as I do. He, no more than a freemason, can remain unsupported among brethren. The claim of common country is stronger with the Scot than the claim of common blood with us. England is sometimes called the stranger's home—it is a pity she leaves so many of her own children shelterless."

This is so true, that the defect reflected upon is one of the most unfortunate from which we Englishmen suffer.—An animated dialogue ensues which affords our authoress the opportunity of developing many features of her amiable philosophy.

Festus Felix Connor, though having, according to his own showing, long since lost the literal title to his two first names, is yet one upon whom the hand of misfortune is incapable of leaving any sensible imprint, and he not only practices the philosophy of contentment successfully in his own case, but is obviously bent upon disseminating the principles of so admirable an art; and impresses his doctrine so well upon the mind of his new pupil, that before the conclusion of their journey Mountwarren is made sensible of the impropriety of the gloomy dissatisfaction he had hitherto permitted to cloud his thoughts and looks.

They arrive upon the banks of Windermere, in which beautiful situation is found the home of Felix Connor. Here the reader is introduced to two other characters the twin children of Connor, Cleone the daughter, the heroine of the story, and her brother Leon a blind child of peculiar intelligence and singularly affectionate disposition. The beauty of Cleone does not fail to make impression on the susceptible heart of the young traveller, whilst the extreme simplicity and unaffected manners of the family excite in him feelings of growing esteem. A Dutch footman and his wife conclude the list, without adding to its attractions. Mountwarren takes up his abode for the night with his hospitable entertainer, who is neither sparing of his cheer nor his philosophy, and both guest and host retire upon the most agreeable terms with themselves and with one another. Upon the day following, in the course of a walk with Felix Connor, Mountwarren accidentally encounters two gentlemen and a lady on horseback whom he immediately recognises as his old friends and former neighbours, the Arfleurs. Sir Edward Arfleur is described as a gentleman of the old school, hearty and well meaning but of no very enlarged views. Frank Arfleur, the son, is a person introduced for so little purpose, and then so suddenly dismissed, as to render it a pity that he should have been called into existence at all; but Rosina his sister, the spiritual Rosina, is a character of more importance. This interview, which is as short as it was unexpected, admits us to a knowledge of some mutual sentiments of the tender kind which formerly existed in the breasts of Rosina and Mountwarren, but which a long cessation of intercourse had interrupted. The love for Cleone, however, having all the force of a new passion in its favour, predominates, and in a visit which our hero pays at the house of Sir Edward Arfleur, he makes no scruple of unfolding to Rosina the state of his affections; an avowal, which is received by her with a composure very creditable to her understanding, but perhaps somewhat disparaging to her sensibility. From the description which Mountwarren gives of his new friends the Connors, Rosina conceives a strong desire to cultivate their acquaintance, a desire which she ultimately succeeds in gratifying, though at first strenuously opposed by her father, who with all the peremptory philosophy of a country squire associates nothing but disaffection and disloyalty with the known independence of Connor, and in answer to Mountwarren's encomiums upon his friend's natural nobility, talks of "levelling principles," and of "standing by the institutions of one's country," &c. But the principal objection entertained by Sir Edward Arfleur, no doubt, is the inequality of fortune between the two families. This "icy barrier" it is for the liberal minded Rosina to dissolve by her free and open address. She visits the Connors, finds in them all the excellent and interesting qualities she has been led to expect, and above all experiences a deep sympathy for the case of the poor blind Leon. If sympathy is akin to love, so is gratitude, and to the heart of the unfortunate sufferer, feelings, arising from this evidence of a regard so new to him in a stranger, are communicated, which rapidly passing over the stages that lie between kindness and passion, convert him from the humble object of Rosina's pity to the ardent candidate for her love. Far from meeting the repulses of prudery or the coquet's heartless indifference, Leon's fate reserves him for the rare happiness of an immediate and complete reciprocity of affection, and though the lovers separate at this period of their history, it is with that mutual declaration which softens the pains of absence.

The Arfleurs' return home into Gloucestershire, and Mountwarren's departure from the lakes, takes place immediately afterwards. An erroneous impression in the breast of the tender Cleone, from which much of the interest of the story depends, takes its rise from this circumstance. Mountwarren's deliberations upon the prospects of his life conduct him to this resolution, viz. to repair to London forthwith, in the hopes of propitiating Fortune by well-directed exertions in his profession, so long supinely neglected by him, and with the further purpose of soliciting the assistance of his mother, a widow, who, together with his two sisters, is residing at Boulogne; then to return to Cleone on the wings of love, and ask her to share his fortune and his heart. How these schemes come to be concealed from the knowledge of her whom they most concern, it is not easy to suppose. It is a reservation, as it appears to us, more remarkable for its accommodation to the exigencies of the plot than for its consistency with probability. Cleone, in her ignorance of the intentions of Mountwarren, attributes his hasty departure to an impatience of the separation from Rosina Arfleur, whom she imagines him to regard with feelings of love, and to be now bent on pursuing. Her own feelings are those of the most poignant grief, which, the moment Mountwarren has left her is vented in floods of tears. The following pretty passage occurs in this place, and may convey some idea of the pleasing style in which these volumes are written.

"There is no pang like that of unrequited love—so many vulnerable portions of our nature are wounded by it; even pride, ever prompt at the call of offended self-love, brings but late relief, and comes rather to repair ruin than to avert it; while memory, like a very antiquary, picks up sundry little relics that were better left to be buried with subverted hopes."

A few days subsequent to the departure of the Arfleurs and Mountwarren, an event transpires which alters the whole aspect of things. Intelligence of the failure of a bank in which was invested the moderate capital upon which Felix Connor maintained his little household, comes upon them like a death-blow, and beggary stares them in the face. The old man's philosophy is now brought to the test, and is happily found to be of no spurious growth; he bears his reverse like a stoic, or, which is better, like a man, and has the happiness to find his children not behind him in all the qualities that can adorn adversity. They relinquish their home and proceed to London, a movement rendered desirable by the complete state of a treatise on the "Philosophy of Happiness" which Mr. Connor, the author, purposes to submit to a London publisher. Vandorf, the Dutch servant, not sorry to separate from his spouse, accompanies the expedition. Mr. Connor having taken up his residence at Islington, loses no time in seeking Mountwarren. The latter, however, has left his chambers, and is reported to have passed over to France, and Connor's inquiries can elicit nothing more satisfactory. The next object which occupies his mind is the sale of his treatise, and for this purpose he proceeds to various publishers, with whom the description of his interview presents no novelty, for the reason that it only describes disappointment and disgust. At length a bookseller of daring benevolence, goes the length of expressing his consent to see it. The expectation revived in the mind of Connor upon this hint, causes our authoress to exclaim, feelingly, "How little soothes the buoyant spirit of genius; and yet the world is so unwilling to yield that little!"

The wished for object is at last attained, and proof sheets and printer's devils come to gladden the heart of poor Connor. Anxiety, however, had enfeebled the old man, and he suffers a tedious illness. During her father's confinement, Cleone has to act upon her responsibility, and her management of the household affairs, under the combined disadvantages of inexperienced youth and overwhelming poverty, exhibit her in a point of view at once delightful and painful. In the meantime Leon, being able to contrive no other means of contributing to his sister's exertions, decides upon playing the savoyard. Disguised, with Vandorf for his treasurer, he allows himself to be conducted to the different squares, and there by his singing, an art in which he is represented as skilful, he succeeds in collecting something towards his father's subsistence. In the course of one of these peregrinations, having halted opposite to a handsome house, he hears a voice on the steps which he immediately recognized as that of Rosina Arfleur. She is leaving the house; Leon entreats Vandorf to lead him in pursuit of her, that they may discover, if possible, the place where she is sojourning. They miss her, however, and Leon returns home under the influence of the most agonising feelings. His evident sufferings excite the anxious curiosity of his father and sister; and, after much fruitless entreaty Cleone alone is successful in drawing the secret from him. The manner in which this is brought about, as well as the remarks which introduce the dialogue, deserve the utmost praise for delicacy of thought and feeling.

Cleone, with her own desire and her father's consent, now seeks a situation as governess. The scene with Mrs. Hawkins, the advertiser, and her five daughters, is so natural and so well sustained, that we are sorry our limits forbid its insertion. The following passage, however, is short, and happily describes this elegant family

"In the masquerade of life, gravity is the garb in which imbecility loves to array itself; and it may generally be remarked, that those who have least in their own heads are most ready to shake them at others."

"Mrs. Hawkins's five daughters, destined, probably, in after life, to luxuriate, like herself, into rotundity of form, were singularly spare, with shrewd severe faces. Already the frequent frown had antedated their brows the character of age by the agency of unkindness, was

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilisation; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Popular Library of Instruction" will be published regularly on the 1st of every Month, at 6d. each Vol.

COBBETT'S MAGAZINE.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

This Magazine stands forward as the representative of that strong common-sense school, of which Mr. Cobbett is the unflinching champion. To foil the cold-hearted cruelty of the system-mongers who infest the country at this present time, to present a bulwark of practical experience against the theoretical wisdom of the Scotch "fellows," and to prove to the wise men of this modern Gotham that there are more things in the world than are dreamt of in their philosophy, is the object and aim of this publication.

As a "Preventive Check" upon the headlong proceedings of quack Poor Law Commissioners and amateur Legislators, this Magazine will be found invaluable.

The Rights of the Labouring Classes, agricultural and mechanical, will be boldly declared and fearlessly advocated. Nor will the Trades' Unions, much as their objects have been mistaken and misrepresented, and foully as their worthy endeavours to protect the rights of Industry have been calumniated, be neglected or undervalued in "Cobbett's Magazine."

So much for the serious affairs of life. The lover of literature will find in this Magazine a Treasure of Intelligence, a Storehouse of Intellectual Pleasures, a Fund of Amusement, and a Library of Instruction, such as has never hitherto been imparted in the pages of a Monthly Periodical; for while one-third only of the Magazine will be devoted to Politics, the remaining two-thirds will be in that spirit of gay and light magazine literature, which during the reform excitement was banished by the severe but dull importance of Political Discussion. The Belles-Lettres and the Arts will here reign paramount. True English Humour will be fostered and encouraged. A garland of flowers will be woven round the brows of CARE, and every means will be resorted to for creating in the mind of the reader, that fine taste which has been hitherto the sole privilege of the rich and aristocratic, but will now be the proud boast of the poor and educated.

Nor let it be supposed that the inferiority in the price of this Magazine, which will contain for one shilling as much as the more expensive periodicals at half-a-crown, will therefore produce an inferiority of contents; for from the extensive increase of circulation which has immediately resulted from the reduction in price of "Cobbett's Magazine," the Proprietors are enabled to compete in their scale of remuneration for contributions with the most expensive Periodicals of the day.

LEIGH HUNT'S OPINION OF THE PENNY GAZETTE.
"We must require all our fair readers, 'an' they love us' (and it is hard if they do not love us a little, considering we love them and their interests so much), to leave off instantly what they are about (provided they are not saying something very kind to their husbands), and send to King Edward Street, Blackfriars, or any of the Periodical booksellers, for The Ladies' Penny Gazette. They have no notion what a good thing it is; how sociable, how sensible, how miscellaneous, how alive to all the sources of pleasure with which this culminated, and most capable, and divine world abounds, and how desirous every one should enjoy them. And the manner is as spotless as the matter is good; they may take it in without scruple at once, and put it in the hands of those they love best. And what a price! a penny a week! the cost of a bun, or a piece of bobbin; for which they have prose and verse, extract, comments, and theatricals, and always a good wood-cut of fashions, or a piece of music, sometimes (as in the number before us) both. Truly, 'Knowledge' may be said to 'cry out in the streets' now-a-days; and she cries here in her prettiest, as well as her cheapest, manner. It is the cry of the primroses.

The contributors to the Ladies' Gazette are of both sexes, and appear to consist generally of the same persons—friends, we presume, of a congenial editor; and a pleasant knot of people they are. One writes verse, another prose, another bo h verse and prose, and all agreeably, and with a true feeling, sometimes with a deep one. Their subjects, for the most part, are of love and the country, and the domestic and social affections, with a sprinkle of town matters, like news brought into their pleasant coterie, the milliner coming at the same time with her show of bonnets and dresses, and the pianoforte being at hand for the new song. But there is no assumption of being 'fine' on the one hand, nor any vulgarity on the other. All is calculated to do good to all; to harmonize pride, and elevate lowliness. It is a sort of Watteau publication, without the painters' airs or aristocracy."—True Sun.

SIR WALTER SCOTT'S

MISCELLANEOUS PROSE WORKS.

On the first of May will be published, Uniform with the Waverley Novels, and his poems, now in course of publication.

VOLUME FIRST of a new, extended, and corrected Edition of the MISCELLANEOUS PROSE WORKS of SIR WALTER SCOTT, Bart. to be continued in Monthly Volumes, with Notes and Illustrations. Embellished with Portraits, Frontispieces, Vignette Titles, and Maps. The designs of the Landscapes from Real Scenes, by J. M. W. TURNER, R. A. The great success which has attended the periodical issues of Sir Walter Scott's Novels and Poetry, leads the proprietors to bring forward in a similar form HIS MISCELLANEOUS PROSE WORKS, which they will endeavour to do, so as equally to deserve the patronage of the Public.

It is their purpose to observe the chronological order with much strictness as they shall find possible. The Early Volumes will contain the Lives of DRYDEN and SWIFT, and the as yet less widely circulated, though even more interesting, Biographical Memoirs of RICHARDSON, FIELDING, SMOLLETT, CUMBERLAND, GOLDSMITH, JOHNSON, STERNE, HENRY MACKENZIE, WALPOLE, REEVE, RADCLIFFE, LE SAGE, JOHNSTONE, BAGE, CHARLOTTE SMITH, SIR RALPH SAULDER, DR. LEYDEN, MISS SEWARD, DE FOE, &c. These Volumes will be enriched with Portraits of DRYDEN, SWIFT, SMOLLETT, and MACKENZIE, besides Vignette Embellishments.

Another important portion of this series will be the Life of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, which, besides two authentic Portraits, and engravings after Turner's drawings of the places most strikingly associated with the history of that extraordinary man, will have Maps of his Campaign, drawn and engraved expressly for this Publication.

The text of the Life of Napoleon had been revised with great care by Sir Walter Scott himself; two interleaved copies of the last edition are now in the hands of his Executor:—the language has been corrected and condensed; the utmost accuracy has been attended to as to dates; a most careful comparison has been made with the numerous biographies that had appeared since the publication of the First and Second Editions of the work—and copious Editorial Notes will now be attached, containing brief notices of the many distinguished men who acted a prominent part in the eventful wars which followed the French Revolution.

One or more volumes of this collection will comprise Sir Walter Scott's contributions to the principal periodical works of his time. It is well known that he was at one period among the chief supports of the Edinburgh Review, and at a later one of the Quarterly, and his Essays (now first collected) from these Journals and others, must ever form a most interesting feature in his literary, and even in his personal career.

The Series will close with the far-famed Tales of a Grandfather, which will also have the benefit of Mr. Turner's illustrating pencil.

The Work to be comprised in Twenty-Two Volumes; the publication to commence on the 1st of May, 1834, and to be continued on the 1st day of each month till completed.

Robert Cadell, Edinburgh; Whittaker and Co., London. Specimens of the Illustrations may be seen at the shop every Bookseller in Town or Country.

ON A STONE.

LOOKING about us during a walk to see what subject we could write upon in this our second number, that should be familiar to every body, and afford as striking a specimen as we could give, of the entertainment to be found in the commonest objects, our eyes lighted upon a stone. It was a common pebble, a flint; such as a little boy kicks before him as he goes, by way of making haste with a message, and saving his new shoes.

"A stone!" cries a reader, "a flint! the very symbol of a miser! What can be got out of that?"

The question is well put; but a little reflection on the part of our interrogator would soon rescue the poor stone from the comparison. Strike him at any rate, and you will get something out of him:—warm his heart, and out come the genial sparks that shall gladden your hearth, and put hot dishes on your table. This is not miser's work. A French poet has described the process, well known to the maid-servant, when she stoops, with flashing face, over the tinder-box on a cold morning, and rejoices to see the first laugh of the fire. A sexton, in the poem we allude to, is striking a light in a church:—

Boirade, qui voit que la perle approche,
Les arête, et tirant un fusil de sa poche,
Des veines d'un caillou, qu'il frappe au même instant,
Il fait jaillir un feu qui pétillie en sortant;
Et bientôt un brasier d'une meche enflammée,
Montre, à l'aide du souffre, une cire allumée.

Bolles.

The prudent sexton, studious to reveal
Dark holes, here takes from out his pouch a steel;
Then strikes upon a flint. In many a spark
Forth leaps the sprightly fire against the dark;
The tinder feels the little lightning hit,
The match provokes it, and a candle's lit.

We shall not stop to pursue this fiery point into all its consequences, to shew what a world of beauty or of formidable power is contained in that single property of our friend flint, what fires, what lights, what conflagrations, what myriads of clicks of triggers—awful sounds before battle, when instead of letting his flint do its proper good-natured work of cooking his supper, and warming his wife and himself over their cottage-fire, the poor fellow is made to kill and be killed by other poor fellows, whose brains are strewn about the place for want of knowing better.

But to return to the natural, quiet condition of our friend, and what he can do for us in a peaceful way, and so as to please meditation;—what think you of him as the musician of the brooks? as the unpretending player on those watery pipes and flageolets, during the hot noon, or the silence of the night? Without the pebble the brook would want its prettiest murmur. And then, in reminding you of these murmurs, he reminds you of the poets.

A noise as of a hidden brook
In the leafy month of June,
That to the sleeping woods all night
Sings a quiet tune.—Coleridge.

Yes, the brook singeth; but it would not sing so well,—it would not have that tone and ring in its music, without the stone.

Then 'gan the shepherd gather into one
His straggling goats, and drove them to a ford,
Whose cerule stream, rumbling in pebble-stone,*
Crept under moss as green as any gourd.

Spenser's Gnat.

Spenser's Gnat, observe; he wrote a whole poem upon a gnat, and a most beautiful one too, founded upon another poem on the same subject written by the great Roman poet Virgil, not because these great poets wanted or were unequal to great subjects, such as all the world think great, but because they thought no care, and no fetching out of beauty and wonder, ill bestowed upon

* Rumbling in pebble-stone" is a pretty enlargement of Virgil's "suscitantia" (whispering). Green as any gourd is also an improvement as well as an addition. The expression is as fresh as the colour.

[SPARROW AND CO. CRANE COURT.]

the smallest marvellous object of God's workmanship. The gnat, in their poems, is the creature that he really is, full of elegance and vivacity, airy, trumpeted, and plumed, and dancing in the sunbeams,—not the contempt of some thoughtless understanding, which sees in it nothing but an insect coming to vex its skin. The eye of the poet, or other informed man, is at once telescope and microscope, able to traverse the great heavens, and to do justice to the least thing they have created.

But to our brook and pebbles. See how one pleasant thing reminds people of another. A pebble reminded us of the brooks, and the brooks of the poets, and the poets remind us of the beauty and comprehensiveness of their words, whether belonging to the subject in hand or not. No true poet makes use of a word for nothing. "Cerule stream," says Spenser; but why cerule, which comes from the Latin, and seems a pedantic word, especially as it signifies blue, which he might have had in English? The reason is, not only that it means sky-blue, and therefore shews us how blue the sky was at the time, and the cause why the brook was of such a colour (for if he had wanted a word to express nothing but that circumstance, he might have said sky-blue at once, however quaint it might have sounded to modern ears:—he would have cared nothing for that; it was his business to do justice to nature, and leave modern ears, as they grew poetical, to find it out); but the word cerule was also a beautiful word, beautiful for the sound, and expressive of a certain liquid yet neat softness, somewhat resembling the mixture of soft hissing, rumbling, and inward music of the brook.—We beg the reader's indulgence for thus stopping him by the way, to dwell on the beauty of a word; but poets' words are miniature creations, as curious, after their degree, as the insects and the brooks themselves; and when companions find themselves in pleasant spots, it is natural to wander both in feet and talk.

So much for the agreeable sounds of which the sight of a common stone may remind us, (for we have not chosen to go so far back as the poetry of Orpheus, who is said to have made the materials of stone-walls answer to his lyre, and dance themselves into shape without troubling the mason.) We shall come to grander echoes by-and-bye. Let us see, meanwhile, how pleasant the sight itself may be rendered. Mr. Wordsworth shall do it for us in his exquisite little poem on the fair maiden who died by the river Dove. Our volume is not at hand, but we remember the passage we more particularly allude to. It is where he compares his modest, artless, and sequestered beauty with

A violet by a mossy stone
Half hidden from the eye;
Fair as the star, when only one
Is shining in the sky.

Is not that beautiful? Can any thing express a lovelier loneliness than the violet half hidden by the mossy stone—the delicate blue-eyed flower against the country green? And then the loving imagination of this fine poet, exalting the object of his earthly worship to her divine birth-place and future abode, suddenly raises his eyes to the firmament, and sees her there, the solitary star of his heaven.

But stone does not want even moss to render him interesting. Here is another stone, and another solitary evening star, as beautifully introduced as the others, but for a different purpose. It is in the opening words of Mr. Keats's poem of Hyperion, where he describes the dethroned monarch of the gods, sitting in his exile:—

Deep in the shady sadness of a vale,
Far sunken from the healthy breath of morn,
Far from the fiery noon, and Eve's one star,
Sate grey-hair'd Saturn, quiet as a stone.

Quiet as a stone! Nothing certainly can be more quiet than that. Not a syllable or a sigh will stone utter, though you watch and bear him company for a whole week on the most desolate moor in Cumberland. Thus silent, thus unmoved, thus insensible to whatever circumstances might be taking place, or spectators might think of him, was the soul-stunned old patriarch of the gods. We may picture to ourselves a large, or a small stone, as we please—Stone-henge, or a pebble. The simplicity and grandeur of truth do not care which. The silence is the thing,—its intensity, its unalterableness.

Our friend pebble is here in grand company, and you may think him (though we hope not,) unduly bettered by it. But see what Shakespeare will do for him in his hardest shape and in no finer company than a peasant's:—

Weariness
Can snore upon the flint, when restive sloth
Finds the down pillow hard.

Sleeping on hard stone would have been words strong enough for a common poet; or perhaps he would have said, "resting," or "profoundly reposing;" or that he could have made his "bed of the bare floor;" and the last saying would not have been the worst; but Shakespeare must have the very strongest words and really profoundest expressions, and he finds them in the homeliest and most primitive. He does not mince the matter, but goes to the root of both sleep and stone—can snore upon the flint. We see the fellow hard at it—bent upon it—deeply drinking of the forgetful draught.

To conclude our quotations from the poets, we will give another line or two from Shakespeare, not inapplicable to our proposed speculations in general, and still less so to the one in hand.

Green, a minor poet, author of the "Spleen," an effusion full of wit and good sense, gives pleasant advice to the sick who want exercise, and who are frightened with hypochondria:

Fling but a stone, the giant dies.

And this reminds us of a pleasant story connected with the flinging of stones, in one of the Italian novels. Two waggish painters persuade a simple brother of theirs, that there is a plant which renders the finder of it invisible, and they all set out to look for it. They pretend suddenly to miss him, as if he had gone away; and to his great joy, while throwing stones about in his absence, give him great knocks in the ribs, and horrible bruises, he hugging himself all the while at these manifest proofs of his success, and the little suspicion which they have of it. It is amusing to picture him to one's fancy, growing happier as the blows grow worse, rubbing his sore knuckles with delight, and hardly able to ejaculate a triumphant Hah! at some excessive thump in the back.

But setting aside the wonders of the poets and the novelists, Pebble, in his own person, and by his own family alliances, includes wonders far beyond the most wonderful things they have imagined. Wrongly is Flint compared with the miser. You cannot, to be sure, skin him, but you can melt him; aye, make him absolutely flow into a liquid;—flow too for use and beauty; and become light unto your eyes, goblets to your table, and a mirror to your beloved. Bring two friends of his about him, called Potash and Soda, and Flint runs into melting tenderness, and is no longer Flint; he is Glass. You look through him; you drink out of him; he furnishes you beautiful and transparent shutters against the rain and cold; you shave by him; protect pictures with him, and watches, and books; are assisted by him in a thousand curious philosophies; are helped over the sea by him; and he makes your cathedral windows divine; and enables your mistress to wear your portrait in her bosom.

But we must hasten to close our article, and bring his most precious riches down in a shower surpassing the rainbow. Stone is the humble relation, nay, the stock and parent of Precious Stone! Ruby, Emerald, and Sapphire are of his family—of the family of the Flints—and Flint is more in them than anything else! That the habitations and secret bosoms of the precious metals are stone, is also true; but it is little compared with this. Precious stone, for the most part, is stone itself—is flint—with some wonderful circumstance of addition, nobody knows what; but without the flint, the preciousness would not be. Here is wealth and honour for the poor Pebble! Look at him, and think what splendours issue from his lair:

Fiery Opals, sapphires, amethysts,
Jacinth, hard topaz, grass-green emeralds,
Beauteous rubies, sparkling diamonds,
And self-seen costly stones of great price,
As one of them, indifferently rated,
Might serve in peril of calamity,
To ransom great kings from captivity.

MARLOW.

"Sparkling diamonds" are not properly in our list of pebbles; for diamond, the most brilliant mystery of all, is a charcoal!

What now remains for stone, thus filling the coffers of wealth, glorifying the crowns of sultans, and adding beams to beauty itself? One thing greater than all. The oldest and stoniest of stone is granite, and granite (as far as we know,) is the chief material of the earth itself—the bones of the world—the substance of our star.

Honoured therefore be thou, thou small pebble lying in the lane; and whenever any one looks at thee, may he think of the beautiful and noble world he lives in, and all of which it is capable.

SECOND WEEK IN APRIL.

A ROOKERY.

THOUGH the re-appearance of the rooks, with their rustic population and good old rough music, does not belong exclusively to April, yet as people about this time begin to walk into the country and first observe them, we have taken advantage of Mr. Mudie's new work to furnish our readers with the best summary we are acquainted with, of their manners and way of life. The niceties of language and description in it we need not point out, from the happy idea of the "wingless rustic," down to the conclusion: but we must not forget to give the author our special thanks for the pains he has taken to do justice to Rook's character, and rescue him from the notion of his being a mere disorderly neighbour and a thief.

The Saxon word rook and the Latin word raucus (hoarse) appear to come from the same root; though it is curious that neither Latins nor Italians have a name for the rook, distinct from that of crow and raven, as the English have. The same sense, however, of the hoarseness of the bird's voice seems to have furnished the names of almost all the Corsican family,—crow, rook, raven, daw, corvus and cornix (Latin) korax (Greek). We notice this point, because when the rook is mentioned, nobody can help thinking of his voice. It is as much identified with him, as bark with the old trees. The only thing we miss in the description of Mr. Mudie is the kindly chuckle of the young crows, which appears to us particularly pleasant, good-humoured, and infant-like, and is as different from the rough note of the elders, as peel is from bark, or a baby's voice is from that of a man.

Let the reader picture to his mind's eye a hamlet, an old country-house, a rookery, some arable land, and himself walking and looking up to the growing and cawing tree-tops, with their dark blotches made by the nests, and he is in his best condition to relish our author's company:—

"Every body knows the rook; the dark, the noisy, and sometimes the nest-plundering, or, in the early fields, the contribution-levying rook; but still, notwithstanding the cheerful, the orderly, the industrious, the discreet, the beneficent rook. There in the aged and stately trees, he builds his wicker castle, chants his rude and monotonous cry the while, dwells among his brethren and his kindred, and looks down on the lord of the manor with as much self-possession as if it were he who suffered the wingless rustic to toil with heavy steps through the sticks that fall from the nest of his superior.

"Nor does he loiter away his time in the manorial dower. He looks after the estate, and gives a very broad, and at the same time, poised hint to others, if they would take it.

"When the frost is severe, and the snow lies thick, off he flies to the sea-beach or the river-side, and inter alia, inspects the embankments, weirs and dams, to notice if the teredo has bored into the posts, or any other injury has been done by small enemies, that can be productive of damage when the thaw and the flood come. Or he comes nearer the house, and examines the compost, in order to see that when you apply it to enrich the fields, you do not at the same time scatter insects which will eat up your young plants, and deprive you of your crop.

"When the thaw comes, he hurries to the meadows, and examines the debris which has been cast there by the swollen stream; and if he finds in it the germ of any noxious thing, he pulls it out, so that the blessing of the hill may come upon the valley, pure, wholesome, and without offensive addition. Next he goes to the Autumn-sown wheat, and, by a curious instinct, knowing those plants that are sickly, he delves down, and extracts the larva of the cockchafer, or whatever earth caterpillar it may be, which is only waiting for a few gleams of a warmer sun, in order to render your labour abortive, and compel you to plough and sow that field anew.

"Again, he is over the pasture, and every stool of grass and plant of clover undergoes a like patient and well directed scrutiny; and, by the time that 'the day is done,' he returns to his perch, cawing, to inform you that the labour is accomplished and the labourer paid, in less time than you would take in considering how to do either the one or the other.

"The great additional labour of the rooks is the preparing of their nests, and the rearing of those family which are to continue the society, and watch over the state of the fields, after age or casualty shall have given their own feathers to the winds, and their flesh to the raven; and their early rising, their constant labour, and the order and police which they maintain, are all very curious. Their time of commencement is the first of March, a little earlier or a little later, according to the season; and, as the building of the nest, and the instinct by means of which that nest is to be stocked, come to maturity together; so, if the lapsing storm, which, raging on the shores and in the low country, helps to drive these beautiful birds to the moors, be long and protracted, the nest-building is suspended till it blows over, and the rook contents himself in the interim with watching the safety of these sticks that are already placed.

"But if the season goes cheerily on, and there is no interruption, the cawing and the bustle begin at the greyest dawn; and that man is most industrious that can get to his work before the rook. 'Ask the beasts, and they shall tell; the birds, and they shall instruct.' It is good at that season, to be near a rookery. There is no lullaby in their cawing: you cannot sleep; and they will not allow you to be dozing and 'losing thought' in bed. Rise you must, or suffer for it. But they do not annoy you at night. 'Early to bed and early to rise,' is the rooks' maxim, and if you follow them as far as that, the rest will follow of necessary consequence.

"But their admonition does not stop there. The farmer's busy time is their busy time; they feel that he is as necessary to their present profit as they are to his future; or they act as if they so felt, which, in effect, comes to the same thing. If he will not bring out his teams, turn the soil, and expose the worms and the grubs; they caw over his fields, and make the same sort of lamentation that a hungry man does when he knows that there is meat in the house, but the careless servant has lost the key of the larder.

"But if the teams are all a-field betimes, slicing the sward or the stubble, and turning up the fresh and fragrant earth to be mellowed by the action of the sun, there is not a complaining note among all the fieldward rooks. Gallantly they strut, and incessantly they pick up the larva and the worms, so that the returning plough cannot bury and so preserve in the soil a single destructive thing. And you would think that the memory of gratitude was strong in them, and that they know upon whose territory they depend, when their own was locked up by the snow and frost. At that time, he resorted to the shores of the sea, and fed on the pastures of the gull; and now that it is his time for superabundance, the gull comes for a share, and the rook, instead of offering any resistance, mixes with the stranger on the most friendly terms. Even the pigeon comes from the cot or the wood, and the very poultry and ducks come from the farm-yard, and mingle in peace with the wild tribes,—such charms has the timely labouring of the ground.

"The plentiful supply of food which, in the course of a few hours, the rook obtains at that season, enables the one half of them to be always, and the greater part of them to be sometimes, at work in the rookeries. It has been said, though after a good deal of observation I cannot verify it, that the strong sometimes help the weak in the construction of their nests; but it is certain that those which have been detected in flogging sticks from the nests of others, are punished, not merely by the parties they have plundered, but by others. The attachment of the pair during the nesting time is the strongest of their attachments; but there is a feeling towards the society, and even the place; for if part of the trees are cut down, the rooks will accommodate each other upon the remaining others, often so thickly, as to contain two nests in the same fork, without any signs of hostility between either the old birds or the broods. In close time the male does not take turn in sitting, and when the action of the eggs has begun, the female is never long absent from the nest; but the male certainly does bring food to her, and appears as willing to bestow, as she is grateful to receive. After the young are of such an age as that they can be left, both parents assist in feeding them; and as the working of the land goes on during the time, or if not, the larvae come near the surface of the pastures, an abundance of food for the numerous broods (the average is five), is obtained without much difficulty. The feeding continues after the birds leave the nest and branch; and when there are several broods on the same tree, each parent appears to know its young, and each of the young its parents, with as much certainty, as the ewes and lambs of a flock know each other, though the ewes are browsing and the lambs sporting indiscriminately over the pasture. The pairing attachment weakens, if it does not altogether cease, as soon as the young birds are able to shift for themselves; but the social instinct, which is the bond of union of the rookery, continues not only for life, but through as many generations as the trees continue; and if these are cut down en masse, the birds remove en masse to a new locality, generally as near the old one as they can.

"The treatment of orphan broods, and the disposal of widowed rooks, are curious points in the domestic history of a rookery; but they are points upon which, from the similarity of one rook to another, it is very difficult to get accurate information. There is little doubt, however, that when any casualty happens to the parents after the brood are of such an age as that they can complain, the others do relieve their wants. Indeed, it is very possible that all species of birds contribute at times to the support of orphan broods of their own species, otherwise, from the casualties to which the parent birds are subject, we should meet with many more instances of young that had died in the nest. As for the widowed ones, there is no doubt that they pair again the next year, so that there is never more than one odd bird in a rookery; and it has been asserted that one of the ways in which new rookeries are formed, is the pairing of the odd birds from existing ones. During the pairing season, one may often observe a rook flying about in a hurried manner, and cawing in a sharper and more anxious key, without carrying sticks, or taking any share in the business of nidification; but whether they be the odd ones, it is not easy to say. Couriers sometimes pass and repass between the different rookeries, upon terms that are evidently amicable, but the messages which they carry are known only to the rooks themselves. There is no doubt, however, that all birds which live in societies have some signals by which they recognise each other; for when the rooks of different rookeries feed together during the day, but go home at night, each party takes its proper course, though occasionally one or two will follow the wrong leader for a time, before they discover their mistake. Rooks have a history which is neither brief nor void of interest; and they are so numerous, and found in so many places, that any one may study it."

"April 11, 1732. At Rheims in Austria, Joseph Haydn, father of the modern instrumental style of music. His compositions are full of taste, learning, and vivacity, sometimes sublime, with an occasional pedantry of ultra-scholasticism, and a graceful pathos. Haydn was a good man, with faith in all good things, and a pardonable reverence for the conventionalities in which he was brought up; though they sometimes betrayed the formal part of him into a confounding of small things with greater. Thus he was not easy when he sat down to compose, unless he was full dressed, and had a ring on his finger that was presented to him by the German Emperor.

"—12, 1796. In the French province of Touraine, Rene Descartes, author of an exploded system of astronomy, which perhaps, however, has not left others quite so settled as they appear. He was a deep and original philosopher, but spoilt for the deductions of science by too lively a temperament. He was also an excellent and noble-minded man.

A pleasant story (which would have amused him as much as any body) is told of the way in which a facetious French clergyman ridiculed the hot disputes that took place between his disciples and those of Aristotle. This reverend wag had brought up four dogs, one of which he called Aristotle, another Descartes, giving to each a disciple, and had found means to keep up the sharpest animosity between each party. Aristotle, at the very sight of Descartes, was ready to fly at him, and tear him to pieces; and Descartes, by his snarling, shewed, that he also longed to have a brush with him. The curate frequently diverted his company with the following scene. He called Aristotle and Descartes, who immediately took their proper places, Aristotle on his right hand, and Descartes on the left, and each of the disciples close by his master; then the curate would speak to Aristotle, persuading him to come to an agreement with Descartes, but Aristotle's latrations, and fiery eyes, bespoke his implacability; then he turned towards Descartes, who manifested the like aversion to the curate's overtures; "Well," says he, "then let us try what a conference may do; then ordering them to come near, and face each other, at first they only muttered and growled, as it were alternately, and seemed to answer each other; but by degrees, their vociferations increased, and terminated in a violent fray, two against two, so that they would have destroyed one another, if the curate, by the authority which he had been careful to maintain, had not interfered. This, with the curate, was a natural image of scholastic contentions."

saw what they were eating, she said to her good man, "Those two men are eating a goose, you had better see whether it is not one of ours out of the oven." The host opened the oven, and lo! it was empty. "Oh, you pack of thieves!—this is the way you eat geese, is it?—pay for them directly, or I will wash you both with green hazel-juice." The men said, we are not thieves: an old soldier whom we met on our road made us a present of the goose."—"You are not going to hoax me that way: the soldier has been here, but went out of the door like an honest fellow—I took care of that,—you are the thieves and you shall pay for the geese." But, as they had no money to pay him with, he took a stick and beat them out of doors.

Meanwhile, as Brother Merry journeyed along, he came to a place where there was a noble castle, and not far from it a little public house. Into this he went and asked for a night's lodging, but the landlord said his house was full of guests, and he could not accommodate him. "I wonder," said Brother Merry, "that the people should all come to you, instead of going to the castle." "They have good reason for what they do, for whoever has attempted to spend the night at the castle, has never come back to say how they were entertained." "If others have attempted it why shouldn't I?" said Merry.—"You had better leave it alone," said his host, "you are only thrusting your head into danger."—"No fear of danger," said Brother Merry, "only give me the key and plenty of brave eating and drinking." So the hostess gave him what he asked for, and he went off to the castle, relished his supper, and when he found himself sleepy, laid himself down on the floor, for there was not a bed in the place.

Well, he soon went to sleep, but in the night he was awakened by a great noise, and when he aroused himself, behold! he saw nine very ugly devils, dancing in a circle which they had made round him. "Dance as long as you like," said Brother Merry, "but don't come near me." But the devils kept coming nearer and nearer, and almost trod on his face with their misshapen feet. "Be quiet," said he, but they behaved still worse. At last he got angry, and crying "Holla! I'll soon make you quiet," he caught hold of the leg of a stool and struck it about him. But nine devils against one soldier were too much, and if he laid about lustily upon those before him, those behind pulled his hair and pinched him miserably. "Aye, aye, you pack of devils, now you are too hard upon me, but wait a bit," and thereupon he cried out, "I wish all the nine devils were in my knapsack," and it was no sooner said than done: there they were; so he buckled it close up and threw it into a corner. Then was all still again; so Brother Merry laid himself down and slept till morning, when he landlord and the nobleman to whom the castle belonged came to see how it had fared with him; and when they saw him sound and lively, they were astonished, and asked, "Did the ghosts, then, do nothing to you?" "Why not exactly," said Merry; "but I have got them all nine in my knapsack. You may dwell quietly enough in your castle now; from henceforth they won't trouble you." Then the nobleman thanked him, and gave him great rewards, and begged him to remain in his service, saying that he would take care of him all the days of his life. "No," answered he, "I am used to wander and rove about: I will again set forth."

Then he went on till he came to a smithy, and he went in and laid his knapsack on the anvil, and bade the smith and all his men to hammer away upon it as hard as they could,—so they did, with their largest hammers, and all their might; and the poor devils set up a piteous howling. And when at last they opened the knapsack, there were eight of them dead; but one, which had been snug in a fold of the knapsack, was still alive, and he slipped out and ran away to his home below in a twinkling.

After that, Brother Merry wandered about the world for a long time; but at last he grew old, and began to think of his latter end. So he went to a hermit, who was held to be a very pious man, and said, "I am tired of roving, and will now endeavour to go to heaven." The hermit answered, "There stand two ways,—the one broad and pleasant, that leads to hell; the other is rough and narrow and that leads to heaven." "I must be fool, indeed," thought Brother Merry, "if I go the rough and narrow road." So he went the broad and pleasant way, till he at last came to a great black door, and that was the door of hell.

Brother Merry knocked, and the door-keeper opened it; and when he saw that it was Merry, he was sadly frightened, for who should he be but the ninth devil, who was in the knapsack, and thought himself lucky to have escaped with nothing but a black eye! So he bolted the door again directly, and ran to the chief of the devils and said, "There is a fellow outside with a knapsack on his back, but pray don't let him in, for he can get all hell into his knapsack, by wishing it. He once got me a terrible ugly hammering in it." So they called out to Brother Merry, and told him he must go away, for they should not let him in. "Well, if they will not have me here," thought Merry, "I'll e'en try if I can get a lodging in heaven,—somewhere or other I must rest." So he turned about and went on till he came to the door of heaven, and there he knocked.

St. Peter, who sat close by, had the charge of the entrance, and Brother Merry knew him, and said, "Are you here, old acquaintance? then things will go better with me." But St. Peter said "I suppose you want to get into heaven." "Aye, aye, brother, let me in; I must put up somewhere. If they would have taken me into hell, I should not have come hither." "No," said St. Peter; "You don't come in here."—"Well, if you won't let me in, take your dirty knapsack again; I'll have nothing that can put me in mind of you," said Merry, carelessly. "Then give it to me," said St. Peter. Then he handed it through the grating into heaven, and St. Peter took it, and hung it up behind his chair. "Then," said Brother Merry, "Now I wish I was in my own knapsack,"—and instantly he was there; and thus being once actually in heaven, St. Peter was obliged to let him stay there.

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 9, 1834.

We have received a most welcome abundance of good wishes and encouragement upon the appearance of our new undertaking. Letters have showered upon us, like April blossoms. We beg the writers to accept our heartiest thanks, and are glad of their good word for more reasons than ordinary. They help us to enjoy our task for its own sake, as well as for other benefits which it may produce.

Next to the progress of mankind at large in knowledge and goodwill, there is nothing more delightful to think of in the present day than the special advancement of friendship between England and France, and their neighbourly interchange of one another's advantages. We understand that the wood-cuts and letter-press of the Penny Magazine are regularly carried over to France, and re-issued there; and our publisher has put in our hands the first number of a Library of Popular Instruction, founded on a Parisian work of a similar name, the Bibliothèque Populaire, which may be called the publication of the French Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge,—an assemblage of gentlemen containing some of the first names in France for talent as well as rank. The work is not to be a mere rescript or translation, but partly re-written, mixed up with more entertainment, and adapted to English illustrations and theories, which we shall be the more glad to see in the future numbers, because in the one before us there appears to us to be a little too much importance given to Napoleon and the art of war, a great soldier and a very important art (as the world has hitherto gone), but not a man to be selected for his intellectual greatness in a book of philosophy, which is to help to get the world out of the servitude of all false greatness, however mixed up with truth. As for the rest, this first number of the Library of Popular Instruction appears to us to be well calculated to effect what it desires, that is to give the hitherto uninstructed reader such an acquaintance with the nature and names of the first elements of science and the arts, as shall excite and enable him to help himself to a knowledge hitherto locked up in learned and expensive works.

Mr. Major's April number of his Cabinet Gallery, commences with an admirable scene from Teniers, of three old codgers concluding a bargain; or rather, of two old codgers, and a third younger party, of some knowing thirty years of age, or thereabout, with all his wits, health, and impudence about him, who, with a face of triumphant self-satisfaction, half concealed under a shew of heartiness, is giving a well-done-my-boy clap of the hand to the venerable seller of the pigs, who seems hardly to know whether he has been right or not; while the witness looks inclined to remonstrate with this jovial hurry, and to intimate a question to the buyer, whether he can have the face to shatter the old gentleman's faculties in that manner. All this has been better told in other words by Mr. Allan Cunningham. There are one or two fine faces in Leonardo da Vinci's Christ reasoning with the Pharisees. Doubt and stubbornness are particularly well expressed in the face, with the large chin and compressed mouth to the right; but the faces are all too long for the foreheads, and that of Jesus, instead of expressing the sublime of benevolence, is a little better than a smooth easy-faced young lady's. We cannot like Mieris's Dutch Alehouse, with the unpleasantly drawn-out features of the host, and the insipid ones of the daughter; but we like prodigiously the painter himself, and the anecdote recorded of his giving one of his finest works to a cobbler and his wife, who had saved him from an awkward accident in the streets.

Part the First of Illustrations of the Bible, by Mr. Westall and Mr. Martin, has agreeably surprised us by a landscape full of sentiment and grandeur from the pencil of the former of these painters, whose genius in that department of the art we had not been aware of.

The long hull of the ark in the horizon, the threatening and yet relenting clouds breaking apart,—the hopeful, and for the first time, roundly shining sun, again casting its dazzling brilliance over the waters, and the dove stooping towards the tree-top, which looks like a flower of the sea, are all conceived in the freshest and truest taste of the scene. Of the figured designs of this gentleman, elegant, but neither new nor powerful, we cannot speak so highly; and with all Mr. Martin's genius for the material grandeur of rocks and mountains and other magnitudes, (which none more truly admire than we do) he always disappoints us where intellectual expression and the soul of things, are required. His human beings, to say nothing of their incorrect drawing, (though he has an excellent general idea of the characteristic differences of the male and female outline) become like pigmies in his gigantic landscapes. Expression of face (the most heroic and the test of the highest art and epic of all things,) is generally out of the question; and the sentiment of his Paradise is mistaken. It is not Paradisaical. The happy pair are not enclosed and embowered in flowery seclusion,—"imparadised," as the poet says, "in one another's arms." They are wanderers in a huge overwhelming amphitheatre of alps and distances; and are crushed by its immensity. It is one thing to give them the place to range in, and another to show them always in the midst of it, and never, as it were, in their own proper persons, having their world in themselves.

Mr. Knight has just issued Part the First, price Eighteenpence, of The Musical Library, one of the most pleasing evidences that have yet appeared of the new and extraordinary facilities thrown open to the lovers of taste and knowledge, by providing cheap publications for the many, instead of dear ones for the few. The other day it was difficult to procure a single piece of music, correctly printed, for a less sum than a shilling or eighteenpence. A song of any length cost two or three shillings, and overtures, &c. in proportion. But, says Mr. Knight, Music shall be as cheap, after its kind, as Reading:—there is no reason why fine sounds, like the air through which they come to us, should not be thrown open to all. Accordingly, we have here, for eighteenpence, in an elegant wrapper withal, and printed with admirable legibility in moveable types, four instrumental and nine vocal pieces! a quantity, that on a rough estimate might have cost a couple of guineas in the music shops, and including some of the finest productions of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart, together with those of Purcell, Storace, Callcott, Righini, &c., and Shakespeare's Dowland, the lutenist of the time of Elizabeth. A casket of the very pearls of sound, for one-and-sixpence!

This is literally giving music to the "march of intellect."

A monthly supplement of letter-press, abounding in information, both with regard to the pieces selected and to music in general, is added, for the convenience of those who chuse to get a critical acquaintance with the art. From the hasty glance which we have yet been enabled to give it, it appears to be written with the true relish as well as the scientific knowledge.

ROMANCES OF REAL LIFE.

II.—III.

STORIES OF MADONNA PIA, AND OF A LADY OF PIEDMONT.

"The following story," says Mr. Hazlitt, in his Notes of a Journey through France and Italy, is related by M. Beyle in his charming little work entitled De l'Amour, as a companion to the famous one in Dante: and I shall give the whole passage in his words, as placing the Italian character (in former as well as latter times) in a striking point of view.

I allude (he says) to those touching lines of Dante:—

Deh! quando tu sarai tornato al mondo,
Ricordati di me, che son la Pia;
Sienna mi fe: disfecemi Maremma:
Salai colui, che innannellata pria,
Disposando, m'avea con la sua gemma.

Purgatorio, Canto v.

[Dante, the great Italian poet, in his imaginary progress through Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise, meets with a variety of his countrymen and countrywomen who accost him, or speak to others, and in brief but intense words, relate, or refer to their story. In Purgatory he sees a female spirit, who says, "I pray thee, when thou returnest to earth, that thou wilt remember me—wilt remember Pia. Sienna was the place of my birth, the Marshes of my death. He knows it who had put upon my hand the spousal ring."]

The woman who speaks with so much reserve (con-

(times M. Beyle) had in secret undergone the fate of Desdemona, and had it in her power, by a single word, to have revealed her husband's crime to the friends whom she had left upon earth.

Nello della Pietra obtained in marriage the hand of Madonna Pia, sole heiress of the Ptolomei, the richest and most noble family of Sienna. Her beauty which was the admiration of all Tuscany, gave rise to a jealousy in the breast of her husband, that, envenomed by wrong reports and suspicions continually reviving, led to a frightful catastrophe. It is not easy to determine at this day if his wife was altogether innocent; but Dante has represented her as such. Her husband carried her with him into the marshes of Volterra, celebrated then, as now, for the pestiferous effects of the air. Never would he tell his unhappy wife the reason of her banishment into so dangerous a place. His pride did not deign to pronounce either complaint or accusation. He lived with her alone, in a deserted tower, of which I have been to see the ruins on the sea shore; here he never broke his disdainful silence, never replied to the questions of his youthful bride, never listened to her entreaties. He waited, unmoved by her, for the air to produce its fatal effects. The vapours of this unwholesome swamp were not long in tarnishing features, the most beautiful, they say, that in that age had appeared upon earth. In a few months she died. Some chroniclers of these remote times report, that Nello employed the dagger to hasten her end: she died in the marshes in some horrible manner; but the mode of her death remained a mystery, even to her contemporaries. Nello della Pietra survived to pass the rest of his days in a silence which was never broken.

Nothing can be conceived more noble or more delicate than the manner in which the ill-fated Pia addresses herself to Dante. She desires to be recalled to the memory of the friends whom she had quitted so young: at the same time, in telling her name, and alluding to her husband, she does not allow herself the smallest complaint against a cruelty unexampled, but thenceforth irreparable; and merely intimates that he knows the history of her death.

This constancy in vengeance and in suffering is to be met with, I believe, only among the people of the South. In Piedmont I found myself the involuntary witness of a fact almost similar; but I was at the time ignorant of the details. I was ordered, with five-and-twenty dragoons into the woods that border the Sesia, to prevent the contraband traffic. On my arrival in the evening at this wild and solitary place, I distinguished among the trees the ruins of an old castle: I went to it; to my great surprise it was inhabited. I there found a nobleman of the country of a very unpromising aspect; a man six feet in height and forty years of age: he allowed me a couple of apartments with a very ill grace. Here I entertained myself by getting up some pieces of music with my quarter-master; after the expiration of a week we observed that our host kept guard over a woman whom we called Camilla in jest: we were far from suspecting the dreadful truth. She died at the end of six weeks. I had the melancholy curiosity to see her in her coffin; I bribed a monk who had charge of it, and, towards midnight, under pretext of sprinkling the holy water, he conducted me into the chapel. I there saw one of those fine faces which are beautiful even in the bosom of death: she had a large aquiline nose, of which I shall never forget the beautiful and expressive outline. I quitted this mournful spot; but, five years after, a detachment of my regiment accompanying the Emperor to his coronation as King of Italy, I had the whole story recounted to me. I learned that the jealous husband, the Count of —, had one morning found, hanging to his wife's bed-side, an English watch belonging to a young man in the little town where they lived. The same day he took her to the ruined castle in the midst of the forests of the Sesia. Like Nello della Pietra, he uttered not a single word. If she made him any request, he presented to her, sternly, and in silence, the English watch, which he had always about him. In this manner he passed nearly three years with her. She at length fell a victim to despair in the flower of her age. Her husband attempted to dispatch the owner of the watch with a stiletto, failed, fled to Genoa, embarked there, and no tidings have been heard of him since. His property was confiscated.

"This story," observes Mr. Hazlitt, "is interesting and well told. One such incident, or one page in Dante or in Spenser, is worth all the route between this and Paris; and all the sights in all the post-roads in Europe. Oh, Sienna! If I felt charmed with thy narrow, tenantless streets, or looked delighted through thy arched gateway over the subjected plain, it was that some recollections of Madonna Pia hung upon the beatings of my spirit, and converted a barren waste into the regions of romance."

GOODNESS AND PLEASURE.

"If virtue could be seen as she really is, all the world would fall in love with her."—PLATO.

We proceed to give some of the further extracts we promised from the unpublished work of Mr. Bentham, on the prudential and social virtues—or what is to be pursued and what avoided, for the attainment of individual happiness, and a proper state of intercourse between man and man, consequently, of the very end, of society itself, and of laws and governments. Some of these virtues, during a condition of society arising out of misconceptions of power and the true value of it, have been thrust into far too low a rank in the moral scale. Mr. Bentham's work will assist in raising them to their just importance. We are loth to mark passages in italics, however great the temptation, because it runs a chance of throwing a slur upon what is not marked; but we have found it impossible to resist on some of the occasions before us, in which the concentrated spirit of beneficence catches up the delighted moral sense with a pungent quickness and fragrant, like that of the new sweet briar in the garden.

Conversational Enjoyment. No man, who has the gift of language can, in the presence of others, pass a single hour, without the opportunity being afforded him of communicating enjoyment. One principal reason why our existence has so much less of happiness crowded into it than is accessible to us is, that we neglect to gather up those minute particles of pleasure which every moment offers to our acceptance. In striving after a sum total, we forget the cyphers of which it is composed.

Anger. The irascible affections, as respects others, are of all the most infectious, and ordinarily produce vehement re-action. Let them be directed against whom they may, they diminish the pleasure in serving the irascible person, and with the diminution of the pleasure comes the diminution of the disposition, or the motive to serve him. But what is the effect on the irascible person as disassociated from others? What price has he paid for the short-lived pleasure of being out of humour? He has flattered his temper; he has weakened his powers of judgment; his mastery over his own mind is diminished; he has lost time; he has lost influence; in a word, he is left with a serious balance of loss.

Re-action of Beneficence. It may happen that the effort of beneficence may not benefit those for whom it was intended, but when wisely directed, it must benefit the person from whom it emanates. Good and friendly conduct may meet with an unworthy, an ungrateful return, but the absence of gratitude on the part of the receiver cannot destroy the self-approbation which recompenses the giver. And we may scatter the seeds of courtesy and kindness around us at so little expense! Some of them will inevitably fall upon good ground, and grow up into benevolence in the minds of others, and all of them will bear fruit of happiness in the bosom where they spring. Once blest are all the virtues always; twice blest sometimes.

Re-action of Malignance. The counterpart of these observations applies to the baneful and immoral qualities. Their influence upon others may be undefinable, not so their influence on the person who exhibits them; he must be deteriorated. Cases may occur in which incivility, asperity, anger, ill-will, may, as far as regards others, produce consequences opposed to their natural tendencies, but they can only have a pernicious effect upon him who makes the foolish experiment of trifling with the happiness of others.

Reproaches for the sake of reproaching. Let useless reproaches in thought be avoided; they may lead to useless reproaches in words, or useless reprobation in action.

Abundance of pleasurable subjects of discourse. The topics (of conversation) are numerous, which, while they are pernicious to no one, are pleasurable to the hearer, pleasurable to the speaker, and pleasurable or useful to mankind at large.

Conversation with all. Let the tone of your conversation be invariably benevolent. Differ without asperity: agree without dogmatism. Kind words cost no more than unkind ones: kind words produce kind actions; not only on the part of him to whom they are addressed, but on the part of him by whom they are employed; and this not incidentally only, but habitually, in virtue of the principle of association.

Imperious questioning. There is an instrument of tyranny and consequent source of annoyance, against whose intrusions it is most desirable to find protection. It is that of imprudent interrogation. It assumes various shapes, and sometimes produces evil of no inconsiderable amount. Its powers of annoyance vary with the situation of the person who asks the question, as compared or contrasted with that of him who is expected to answer it; they vary with the topic which is put forward, and with the times or occasions on which it is introduced. Where an individual in a superior situation asks a question of an inferior, which that inferior is known to be unwilling to answer, what is the question but the interference of despotism on the part of the questioner; and what to the party questioned, but a cause of suffering, and of mendacity.

Ascription of motives. The pretension which indicates the motives of others is almost always futile and offensive. For, if their motive be what we suppose it, and the motive be a praiseworthy one, it will be visible by and in the act; and if the motive be blameworthy, to denounce it will but be a cause of annoyance to him to whom the motive is attributed. And after all, we have nothing to do with motives. If bad motives produce good actions, so much the better for society; and if good motives produce bad actions, so much the worse. It is the act, and not the motive with which we have to do; and when the act is before us, and the motive concealed from us, it is the idlest of idling to be enquiring into that which has no influence, and forgetting that which has all the real influence upon our condition.

MEMOIRS OF JUDGE JEFFREYS

We have selected, for our abstract of an entire book this week, the memoirs of this extraordinary product of a monstrous and unhappy system, written with singular impartiality by Mr. Woolrych, a gentleman at the bar, now, if we mistake not, in Parliament. We have no such judges now as Jeffreys, nor (in England) such kings as James the Second. Far different surely are they! Yet it is always salutary to bear in mind the evils from which the progress of knowledge has delivered us; and the example of this poor arbitrary wretch's singular self-delusion, or blustering attempts at it, and his humiliating and frightful fall, may be useful, according to their degrees of peril, to men the most confident of their cleverness and success, when under the temptation of compounding the pleasure of seconding the blows of power with the right to do it.

George Jeffreys was the sixth son of John Jeffreys, Esq. of Acton, near Wrexham, in the county of Denbigh, by Margaret, a daughter of Sir Thomas Ireland, Knt. of Bewsey, in the county of Palatine of Lancaster, and was born at his father's house, about the year 1648.

John Jeffreys claimed descent from Tudor Trevor, Earl of Hereford, and appears to have been a homely frugal person, much respected by his neighbours, with little of his son's ambition, and as little of his cruel eccentricity of character. George's splendour and turbulent train, when he once paid an ostentatious visit to his native place, startled his sober father out of his forbearance. The old man was never chancellor—and the chancellor was never an old man. The father survived the son.

A bully is in general one whom ignorance and dullness of comprehension render callous to all kinds of feeling; he dares, therefore, and assumes what others fear and shame to meddle with. He is like the rhinoceros, whose hide renders him regardless alike of bullets and flower banks, who breaks down the tangled thickets whose heart softens only to the courting of a bed of mud. Such a constitution is, in general, from its very dullness and bull-headedness, destitute of the quality which we familiarly term tact—a power of discriminating circumstances, and applying actions appropriate to the occasion; but Jeffreys was in some degree an exception to this rule: rude, indolent, dull, or entirely callous; of a narrow intellect, and base propensities, he still possessed a certain pampered vigour of action, joined to a degree of tact. Were our heavy wild beast just alluded to, gifted with about as much mind as a highwayman, he would be an awkward customer to deal with. Accordingly, Jeffreys revelled in the intoxications of executive tyranny, feeding his thirst for action, and impregnable to the assaults of feelings to which he was a stranger. He is much to be censured, not a little to be pitied. With all allowance for habit, education, and natural thoughtlessness, Jeffreys was far other than a happy man. His successes were burdened with many a difficulty, many a price never to be paid. His mortifications—and cruel ones they were—were as numerous as his successes; and he seems to have lived in a perpetual state of unsatisfied desire and exasperating repulse. May not, by the way, the unrelenting booby, under whom he was at school, have tended to increase exasperation of his constitutional ferocity.

A desire of aggrandisement and the profitable state of the law, which raised its drooping head under the influence of restored majesty, seem to have been the inducements that determined his choice for that profession, and, with the assistance of his friends, he set himself to study it, and was entered of the Inner Temple, May 19, 1663. His studentship was more remarkable for varied activity than intense practice. In the course of his computations, he managed to insinuate himself into the society and secrets of a band of malcontents; and this he made serve to the enlargement of his narrow means. Thus, then, though certainly not through youthful enthusiasm, he began his political career as a reformer. He is an ornament to the order of Rats.

While he was yet no older than eighteen, being at Kingston, whence the plague, aided by his effrontery, had scared the lawyers, he put on a gown and pleaded, though he was not called to the bar till two years afterwards. This circumstance has given rise to a belief that he was never regularly called to the bar. When he first started in practice, his political associates gave him good support, and he availed himself of the now hacknied, and we hope exploded, stratagems of pushing professional men, such as having his servants come after him to coffee houses and the like. He was of a bold aspect, and cared not for the countenance of any man; his words voluble and clear, and he spared none that were likely to serve his client; his voice was loud, his manners overbearing, and he had a quickness to discover the weak points of his adversaries, upon which he threw all the might of his bull-dog ferocity. He sometimes blundered, and met with more than his match; but the power he acquired over the weak and the unfortunate soon got him notice and fees. Had he encountered no witnesses but such as the one we are about to speak of, his insolence would have been cowed, and much good blood perhaps saved. The following is the first rebuff we find recorded:—

"A countryman who was giving his evidence, clad in a leather doublet, and Mr. Jeffreys who was counsel for the opposite party, found that his testimony was 'pressing home.' When he came to cross-examine, he bawled forth, 'You fellow in the leather doublet, what have you for swearing?" The man looked steadily at him, and, "Truly, sir," said he, "if you have no more for lying than I have for swearing, you might wear a leather doublet as well as I." Of course every body laughed, and the neighbourhood rang with the bluntness of the reply."

Jeffreys now attempted to push his fortune by means of a union with the daughter of a rich merchant; and he made a kinswoman of the lady to serve as a go-between in the affair. The father, however, discovered the affair, and secured his daughter and her money. The future judge, in a fit of impartiality, perhaps of spite, offered his hand to the kinswoman, and was accepted. Her name was Sarah, the daughter of Thomas Neesham, A.M. She brought her husband three hundred pounds, and proved a careful housewife. By this lady he had several children. As his first practice and success was in Guildhall, he cultivated to the best of his ability a city connection; in so much, that when he was scarcely twenty-three, he was made common serjeant. Having borne this office for some years he made a bold and avowed change in his political opinions, and helped himself to the place of Recorder, which he obtained partly through his intimacy with the notorious Chiffinch. He was then knighted, and October 22, 1678, made Recorder, or as he himself termed it, "the mouth-piece of the city."

A little before his elevation he became a widower, in three months married again (a widow), a daughter of Sir Thomas Bludworth, and in a few months afterwards was presented with a little son; a circumstance of which he was once unpleasantly reminded. Observing a lady who was giving her evidence pretty sharply in a cause which he was advocating:—"Madam," said he, "you are very quick in your answers!" "As quick as I am, Sir George, I am not so quick as your lady." While Recorder, he gave some specimens of his future rigours. A poor bookseller of the name of Smith published a book against the expenses of Mayors and Sheriffs. "Debauchery," said the writer, "is come to that height, that the fifth part of the charge of a shrievalty is wine, the produce of another country." The censures were however so general that the bill was ignored. Somebody scraped out the "Ignoramus," and next sessions it again appeared, and was again indorsed with that equivocal word of rejection. Jeffreys was enraged, and sent the bill back a third time. A third time he read "Ignoramus." "God bless me from such jurymen!" vociferated the city advocate, "I will see the face of every one of them, and let others see them also." And so he ordered the bar to be cleared, that they might be exposed to public view. The jury, seventeen in number, one by one reiterated the word "Ignoramus." They conquered.

When Jeffreys had once planted himself on the track of preferment—being active, bold, impudent, pliant, and unscrupulous, he advanced with a speed that has been seldom equalled. He was called serjeant, Feb. 17, 1668, on which occasion he gave rings with the motto—A Deo rex, a rege lex. (The king from God, and law from the king.) About the same time he became a Welch judge, and in the April following, Sir Job Charlton, a worthy old man, was ousted from the chief-justice-ship of Chester to make room for Jeffreys. He was made king's serjeant in May of the same year, and Nov. 17, 1681, was created a baronet. His arrogance increased with his advancement, and in the Kingston midsummer assizes for 1679, he provoked Mr. Baron Weston to severe anger. Some words passed between them upon an occasion when he was endeavouring to browbeat some witnesses, and he complained that he was not treated like a counsellor, being carbed in the management of his brief. "Ha!" fiercely returned the judge, "since the king has thrust his favours upon you in making you chief-justice of Chester, you think to run down every body: if you find yourself aggrieved, make your complaint; here's nobody cares for it." The counsel said he had not been used to make complaints, but rather to stop those that were made; but the judge again enjoined him to silence. Jeffreys sat down, and wept with anger.

In 1680, he made himself very unpopular, by shewing his loyal zeal in endeavouring to prevent the people from petitioning parliament, as their petitions were becoming something troublesome to the Catholic friends of the king. The king was petitioned to remove him from his offices. The only notice the petition obtained was the king's saying, "I will think of it." Eventually, however, Jeffreys had not courage to withstand his enemies, amongst whom the parliament was the foremost, and he resigned his place of Recorder. "He was not parliament proof," said the witty king; and it is supposed that Charles ever after despised him for his pusillanimity. During his disgrace he attempted to return to his old friends the malcontents, but was so roughly received, that he was obliged, in spite of himself, to be faithful to the king, from whom he never afterwards had an opportunity of withdrawing himself. Upon the occasion of the Rye-house plot he was counsel on the king's side, and put the most searching questions during the whole business. The case was likely to fail for want of proof that Lord Russell had assented to the order of the conspirators. This fact, or something very like it, he succeeded in winning out of Lord Howard.

On the 29th of September, 1683, Sir George Jeffreys was appointed chief justice in the room of Sanders, who died of apoplexy, brought on by ale drinking. One of the first trials at which he presided was the trial of the illustrious Algernon Sidney, who was condemned to death for theoretical writings taken out of his desk!

Upon this occasion Sir George's biographer attempts a defence of his conduct. Its heinousness is doubtless exaggerated, as such things mostly will be by a natural indignation; but allowing for the grossest exaggeration, still the chief justice's conduct remains chargeable with insolence and brutality of the worst kind, particularly in a dispenser of justice. He began speciously enough, though in a suspicious tone of adjuration, by reprehending the practice of whispering to the jury. "Let us have no remarks," said he, "but a fair trial, in God's name!" He showed another comparative decency or two in the early part of the trial, which his biographer (naturally, perhaps, enough, considering his subject) would have us take as singular favours. But as the case thickened, Jeffreys, as usual, grew outrageous. Some papers were shown to Sidney.

Col. Sidney.—I do not know what to make of it; I can read it.

Lord Chief Justice.—Aye, no doubt of it; better than any man here. Fix on any part you would have read.

Col. Sidney.—I do not know what to say to it, to read it in pieces then.

Lord Ch. Just.—I perceive you have disposed them under certain heads; to what heads would you have read?

Col. Sidney.—My lord, let him give an account of it that did it.

Be it remembered that it was the judge who thus interfered. When judgment was pronounced, Sidney firmly uttered his appeal to God that the inquisition for his life might be made only against those who maliciously persecuted him for righteousness' sake. "Jeffreys," says the biographer, "as well he might, on hearing this, started from his seat, and lost his temper! 'I pray God,' cried Jeffreys, 'work you in a temper fit to go unto the other world, for I see you are not fit for this.'"

Col. Sidney.—My lord, feel my pulse, (holding out his hand) and see if I am disordered; I bless God I never was in better temper than I am now.

Meantime the Lord Chief Justice lived no temperate life. He would unbend himself, to use the words of North, "in drinking, laughing, singing, kissing, and every extravagance of the bottle." He paid for such indulgences in severe fits of the stone, which increased the violence of his temper. To one of these visitations the writer ascribes his severity on the trial of Sir Thomas Armstrong. Sir Thomas demanded the benefit of the law. Jeffreys exclaimed, "That you shall have, by the grace of God! See that execution be done on Friday next according to law: you shall have the full benefit of the law." Armstrong, finding all he said to be in vain, exclaimed, "My blood be upon your head!" "Let it, let it! I am clamour proof!" returned Jeffreys. Fierce as he was, the chief justice did not always escape without a smart rebuke, any more than the barrister. An old greybeard once displeasing him, he said, "If your conscience is as large as your beard, you will swear any thing." "My Lord," retorted the old man, "if you go about to measure consciences by beards, your lordship has none."

In September 1684, much to the annoyance of decent observers, Sir George Jeffreys was summoned to the cabinet. In 1685 the king died, and James succeeded to the throne. The Judge suited the sullen passions of the new monarch, and Jeffreys was created Baron Jeffreys of Ulem, in the county of Salop. And now Titus Oates, the famous anti-catholic informer, who had formerly behaved with much insolence to Jeffreys when recorder, was to be tried by him for perjury. Jeffreys never forgave any one. Oates said that what he had sworn was true, and if he need were he would seal it with his blood. "Twere a pity," said Jeffreys, "but that it were with thy blood." Oates was convicted upon two indictments, and sentenced to pay a thousand marks upon each, to be stripped of his canonical habits, to stand twice in the pillory, to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate one day, and two days afterwards from Newgate to Tyburn, — and! — he was to stand in the pillory five days every year he lived. Oates was a portentous scoundrel, but this was a portentous punishment.

In the autumn of 1685, Jeffreys went forth to execute vengeance on the adherents of the luckless Duke of Monmouth. He took with him the lord chief baron, and three puisne judges, and was guarded by a party of Colonel Kirk's soldiers. He acted upon a special commission, and a second commission gave him the authority of general, so that he might have troops at his personal command. This expedition has been termed "Jeffreys's Campaign," and "the Bloody Assizes;" and bloody work he made of it. He afterwards said, when he was in the tower, that his instructions were severer than his execution of them, and that on his return from the circuit, he was snubbed at court for not acting on them to the full. Be that as it may, the numbers he condemned are reckoned by hundreds. He once boasted to a major that he had condemned about a thousand on one occasion, being as many as the officer's soldiers had killed.

The first place Jeffreys halted at, was Winchester, where Lady Alicia Lisle was awaiting her trial, charged with harbouring one John Hicks, a traitor. Hicks had escaped from Weston Moor, and entreated an asylum at the hands of Lady Alice. She instantly sent information to the nearest justice of the peace, but suffered the man to escape. Jeffreys himself gave evidence on the bench against the prisoner, a poor old lady, seventy years of age, who slept during part of the trial; he wrung a death-sending verdict out of the jury. "If I'd been among you," said he, "and she had been my own mother I should have found her guilty." It is probable, that Jeffreys looked for a bribe, which, however, was offered too late; and when the king was applied to, he said, that he had promised Jeffreys not to pardon her. Upon opening the assizes at Dorchester, the clergyman spoke of mercy, but Jeffreys laughed both during prayers and the sermon. On a Saturday, thirty prisoners were put to the bar. The same evening, Jeffreys signed a warrant to hang thirteen of them on the Monday. All the rest but one followed soon after. Among the prisoners was a constable, who, having some money in his hands for the use of the militia, was deprived of it by the duke's friends. He objected to the witnesses, who were a woman of ill fame and a Catholic. "Villain! rebel!" exclaimed the judge, "methinks I see thee already with a halter about thy neck;" and he was ordered specially to be hung the first. The crime of another one, Bragg, was being deprived of his horse by Monmouth's party. At Taunton, he sentenced one Tutchin to be imprisoned for seven years, to be flogged one hundred marks, to be whipped through every town in Dorsetshire once a year, and to find security for his good behaviour through life. The ladies in court burst into tears, and the clerk of the arraigns was so much astonished that he could not help observing upon the number of market towns in Dorset: he said, that "the sentence reached to whipping about once a fortnight, and that Mr. Tutchin was a very young man." "Aye, he is a very young man, but an old rogue," said Jeffreys. Tutchin in vain petitioned to be hanged instead. The small-pox, however, saved his bones, and procured him a change of sentence. On opening the assizes in Somerset, he declared, "it would not be his fault if he did not depopulate the place." "I will pay my excise to King Monmouth," said an old lady in jest; she was flogged for her joke. But we must have done with Jeffreys's campaign. We must quote, however, an extract from his charge to the jury at Bristol—it is a piece of characteristic brutality.

"Gentlemen, I am by the mercy of God, come to this great and populous city; a city that boasts both of its riches and trade, and may justly indeed claim the next place to the great and populous metropolis. Gentlemen, I find here are a great many auditors who are very intent, as if they expected some formal or prepared speech; but assure yourselves, we come not to make either set speeches nor formal declamations; for, Lord! we have seen these things twenty times before: no, we come to do the King's business."—"But I find a special commission is an unusual thing here, and relishes very ill; nay, the very women storm at it, for fear we should take the upper hand of them too; for, by the bye, gentlemen, I fear it is much in fashion in this city, for the women to govern and bear sway." Then he told them that he would give them no trouble about points or matters of law, but only remind them of events which had happened; "for I have the calendar of this city in my pocket," he said; and he then complained of the stone, and the unevenness of their roads, which was a bad omen for them. After this, came a long sermon about the blessed martyr King Charles, and rebellion the sin of witchcraft, a panegyric on King James, and an ample acknowledgment of his absolute power as God's vicerent on earth: and then he opened on the Duke of Monmouth by way of antithesis:—"On the other hand, up starts a puppet prince who seduced the mobile into rebellion, into which they are easily bewitched; for I say, the rebellion is like the sin of witchcraft. This man, who had as little title to the crown as the least of you (for I hope you are all legitimate), being overtaken by justice, and by the goodness of his prince brought to the scaffold, he has the confidence (good God! that men should be so impudent!) to say, that God Almighty did know with what joyfulness he did die (a traitor!).—"Great God of heaven and earth! what reason have men to rebel? But as I told you, rebellion is like the sin of witchcraft; fear God and honour the King is rejected by people, for no other reason, as I can find, but that it is written in St. Peter. Gentlemen, I must tell you, I am afraid that this city hath too many of these people in it; and it is your duty to search them out."—"Here the grand jury were in as many words directed to the mayor and aldermen."—"For this city added much to that ship's loading; there was your Tylys, your Roes, and your Wades, men started up like mushrooms, scoundrel fellows, mere sons of dunghills: these men must forsooth set up for liberty and property! a fellow that carries the sword before Mr. Mayor, must be very careful of his property, and turn politician, as if he had as much property as the person before whom he bears the sword, though perchance not worth a groat. Gentlemen, I must tell you, you have still here the Tylys, the Roes, and the Wades: I have brought a brush in my pocket, and I shall be sure to rub the dirt wherever it is, or on whomsoever it sticks. Gentlemen, I shall not stand complimenting with you; I shall talk with some of you before you and I part, I tell you; I tell you, I have brought a besom, and I will sweep every man's door, whether great or small. Must I mention particulars? I hope you will save me that trouble."—"I do believe it would have went very hard with you, if the enemy had entered the city, notwithstanding the endeavours which were used to accomplish it. Certainly they had, and must have great encouragement from a party within, or else why should their design be on this city? Nay, when the enemy was within a mile of you, that a ship should be set on fire in the midst of you, as a signal to the rebels, and to amuse those within! when, if God Almighty had not been more gracious unto you than you was to yourselves, (so that wind and tide was for you.)

for what I know, the greatest part of this city had perished; and yet you are willing to believe it was an accident. Certainly here is a great many of those men whom they call trimmers; a whig is but a mere fool to these; for a whig is some sort of a subject in comparison of these; for a trimmer is but a cowardly and base-spirited whig; for the whig is but the journeyman-prentice that is hired and set over the rebellion, whilst the trimmer is afraid to appear in the cause."—"Gentlemen, I tell you, I have the calendar of this city here in my hand. I have heard of those that have searched into the very sink of a conventicle, to find out some sneaking rascal to hide their money by night. Come, come, gentlemen, to be plain with you, I find the dirt of the ditch is in your nostrils."—[Now he opens upon the chief offence, alluded to by his having the calendar in his pocket,—the selling convicted criminals for slaves.]—"Good God! where am I—in Bristol? This city, it seems, claims the privilege of hanging and drawing amongst themselves! I find you have more need of a commission once a month at least. The very magistrates which should be the ministers of justice, fall out one with another to that degree, they will scarce dine with each other; whilst it is the business of some cunning men that lie behind the curtain, to raise divisions amongst them, and set them together by the ears, and knock their loggerheads together: yet I find they can agree for their interest, or if there be but a kid in the case; for I hear the trade of kidnapping is much in request in this city; they can discharge a felon or a traitor, provided they will go to Mr. Alderman's plantation at the West Indies.

"Come, come, I find you stink for want of rubbing. Gentlemen, what need I mind you of these things? I hope you will search into them and inform me. It seems the dissenters and fanatics fare well amongst you, by reason of the favour of the magistrate: for example, if a dissenter who is a notorious and obstinate offender, comes before them to be fined, one alderman or other stands up, and says, He is a good man, (though three parts a rebel)! Well then, for the sake of Mr. Alderman, he shall be fined but five shillings. Then comes another, and up stands another good man alderman, and says, I know him to be an honest man, (though rather more than the former). Well, for Mr. Alderman's sake, he shall be fined but half-a-crown; so, manus manum fricat: you play the knave for me now, and I will play the knave for you by and by. I am ashamed of these things: and I must not forget to tell you I hear of some differences among the clergy,—those that ought to preach peace and unity to others; gentlemen, these things must be looked into."

We must not omit among the enormities of the time, James's gift of Prideaux, a rich man who was in trouble, to Jeffreys. The king's words were, when some one would have interceded for Prideaux, "I have given him to Jeffreys." Jeffreys threatened to hang him; he obtained 15,000*l.*, and, merchant like, allowed 240*l.* as discount for prompt payment.

On his return from the western assizes Lord Jeffreys was made chancellor. "You will find the business heavy," said a bottle companion. "No," said the new chancellor, "I will make it light."

Meantime James began to make advances towards restoring the Catholic religion, and among other experiments, with an apparent reasonableness unsuited to the times, tried to gain admittance for a catholic gentleman into the university of Cambridge without taking the oaths. The University resisted this illegal use of royal authority. The same attempt was made at Oxford, and Jeffreys zealously assisted the king in his designs, though undoubtedly a protestant himself. A sense of interest and desire to shew his power on all about him, were, however, stronger feelings with him than even the habitual feelings of early education. He thus went on from one thing to another, till at length he assisted in the well-known committal of the seven bishops. And now so intimate had he grown with James, that on the birth of his son (afterwards the Pretender) the Lord Chancellor stood upon the step of the bed in which the queen lay. At length the Prince of Orange espoused the protestant cause, and landed in England. James fled incontinently, leaving his servant, like the devil of the witches, in the lurch at the last. He did not even give him notice of his flight.

And now Jeffreys, hated by all parties, was left alone and helpless to the mercy of his enemies. He cut off his eyebrows, which were large and fierce, disguised himself as a collier, and fled to Wapping, where he hid himself in an obscure house, to await an opportunity of quitting the kingdom. His plan was to get to Hamburg by a collier, which was to pretend to be bound for Newcastle, to elude the spies that were set upon out-going vessels. He got on board the collier, but was betrayed by the mate; of which he had a timely suspicion, and so got on shore again to await a safer opportunity. While waiting at a little ale-house, in Anchor and Hope alley, near King Edward stairs, he happened to look out of window. It chanced that a man was passing at that moment, who had once been terror-struck before him, while revelling in power. The man had told a friend at the time, that "he never should forget the terrors of that man's face while he lived." His words proved true; he recognized Jeffreys, proclaimed him aloud, and the rabble burst in upon the fallen tyrant. It is a matter of pure wonder that he was not destroyed on the spot. As it was, they took him to the Lord Mayor, who supplied the place both of protector and guard, till two regiments of the trained bands could be procured to convey him to the Tower.

On the way the people were so furious, that Jeffreys seems to have been quite overcome with fear, lifting his hands first on one side of the carriage, and then on the other, crying out, "For the Lord's sake, keep them off!—for the Lord's sake, keep them off!"

While he was in the Tower, the women of the counties he had visited during the "bloody assizes," petitioned that he might be delivered up to their vengeance. At the same period, an oyster barrel, tightly packed, was sent him as a present; it contained a halter. These were fearful billets-doux. He was not long, however, in confinement, for in a little while he fell sick, and the sickness mercifully killed him. There are many conjectures as to the mode of his death, some attributing it to intemperance, others to a diabolical visitation of fears and remorse, but the most probable thing is, that harassment and anxiety brought on severe fits of his old complaint, which killed him. Jeffreys was taken on the twelfth of September, 1688. He was first interred privately in the Tower; but three years afterwards, when his memory was something blown over, his friends obtained permission, by a warrant of the queen's dated Sept. 1692, to take his remains under their own care, and he was accordingly reinterred in a vault under the communion-table of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, 2nd Nov. 1694. In 1810, during certain repairs, the coffin was uncovered for a time, and the public had a sight of the box containing the mortal remains of the feared and hated magistrate.

One remarkable thing connected with his last hours, is that, although he expressed regret for many of his actions, he defended himself to the last from a charge of cruelty on the western circuit, reiterating that his orders were severer than his execution of them.

He was a bad man, a worse judge, and a greater fool than all,—the sure climax of wickedness; for all wickedness is but violent mistake, and the worst men have the excuse of some inconsistent breeding or other, or of a blood half insane.

A HANDFUL OF GOOD SENSE.

From the Essays and Letters (just published) of "Conversation Sharp," noticed in our last.

Reenement of Rejected Advice. It is at once an odious and a ridiculous kind of tyranny to take it ill of a friend that he judges for himself in the last resort. "Ah! if he had but followed my advice,"—"I told him what must happen,"—and all such betrayings of wounded vanity, are proofs that good sense and good will have both been wanting.

Indeed, if a selfish and conceited man's object is to gain a character for sagacity, he should be glad when his counsel has been disregarded. Human life is so liable to unforeseen troubles, that whatsoever course may be pursued, we shall often regret the lot that we have chosen. As a bachelor, I can be no judge of a known saying: "If you marry, if you do not marry, you will repent." But this will serve as a specimen of the general language. Herein, however, we must avoid the opposite and prevailing evil practice of asking advice for the sake only of stealing a sanction. I was sincerely pleased by the frankness of a young lady, who being urged to consult me respecting an offer of marriage, replied, "Why should I wait? My mind is made up, and I will not use an old friend so ill, as to trouble him for advice which I shall not be guided by."

Riches and Poverty. In De Rulhiere's Anecdotes of the Revolution in Russia, there is a short story exemplifying that decay of the ancient respect for rank, and that growth of a regard for wealth, so observable of late in most parts of the world.

Odarh, a Piedmontese conspirator for Catherine, used to say, "I see there is no regard for anything but money, and money I will have. I would go this night and set fire to the palace for money; and when I had got enough, I would retire to my own country, and there live like an honest man." More than once the Empress offered him a title. "No, madam, I thank you," said Odarh, "money, money, if you please."

He did get money, went to Nice, and there it is said lived as became a gentleman.

Many persons do the poor the honour of expecting them to be spotless. Too often it is deemed a good excuse for refusing them aid that they have failings like our own. There are many advantages in this variety of condition, one of which is boasted of by a divine, who rejoices, that between both classes, "all the holidays of the Church are properly kept; since the rich observe the feasts, and the poor observe the fasts."

To be more serious, it is fortunate for the Christian world that our public worship tends at once to abase the proud, and to uplift the dejected; while a similar effect results in a free country from its elections, where the haughtiest are obliged to go hat in hand begging favours from the lowliest. Nor should the lofty be ashamed; for it has so happened, that the best benefactors of the human race have been poor men, such as Socrates and Epaminondas; such as many of the most illustrious Romans, and the inspired founders of our Faith.

War. So much has been well said against war, that it has the air of a plagiary when any of its unavoidable evils are alluded to. Yet there is a short passage in Dr. Aikin's Life of Howard the Philanthropist, placing one of them in so striking a light, that it must excite the most painful reflections in a reader of common humanity. In one of his benevolent journeys, he writes from Moscow, that "no less than 70,000 recruits for the army and navy, have died in the Russian hospital during a single year."

He was an accurate man, incapable of saying any thing but the truth, and, therefore, this horrible fact cannot but heighten our detestation both of war and of despotism. It has, however, been scarcely spoken of in Europe; while other hateful crimes, though affecting only individuals, have justly become the perpetual objects of pity and indignation. For instance, the cruel murders of the Princesses de Lamballe and Louis the Sixteenth.

The truth is, that despotism is ever destroying its millions silently and unnoticed; while sedition is generally tumultuous, and always dreaded and detested. So many are interested in painting exaggerated pictures of its mischiefs, that the world is kept in perpetual alarm, and even the writers themselves become unable to judge impartially between oppression and resistance, as an artist is said to have drawn the devil so hideous, that he lost his senses by looking at his own colours.

There are few riots without some grievance. "Jupiter," says Lucian, "seldom has recourse to his thunder, but when he is in the wrong;" and at the close of a long military life, Monsieur de Vendome owned that "in the eternal disputes between the mules and the muleteers, the mules were generally in the right."

All our praiseworthy toil and expense in building infirmaries and asylums, cannot save a hundredth part of the lives, nor alleviate a hundredth part of the afflictions brought upon the human race by one unnecessary war. "Next to the calamity of losing a battle, is that of gaining a victory," is reported to have been said by our great commander on the evening of the bloody day of Waterloo.

[If the Duke of Wellington really said this, all true hearts will open to receive him as a brother, however they may differ with him in opinion, or think it their duty practically to oppose him.]

Evil speaking. The most gifted men that I have known, have been the least addicted to depreciate either friends or foes. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Burke, and Mr. Fox, were always more inclined to overrate them. Your shrewd, sly, evil-speaking fellow is generally a shallow personage; and, frequently, he is as venomous and false when he flatters as when he reviles. He seldom praises John but to vex Thomas.

[Young men, and older ones too, will sometimes be wholesale in their "severity," not out of any real wish to harm the objects of it, but to evince their own shrewdness, and be admired. The former leave off the habit, if they are discerning and generous, or have suffered enough; the latter, deceiving themselves more than others, sometimes retain it out of a notion that it is the only way of proving their sincerity. We append these common-places to Mr. Sharp's remarks, in order to give hope where it may be wished for, and leave a loop-hole for the bad habit to escape.]

TABLE-TALK.

THE PLANT PHYSICIAN.—In the Irish Gardener's Magazine it is said, not only that decoctions or the leaves dried and powdered of the common camomile, Anthemis nobilis, will destroy insects, but that nothing contributes so much to the health of a garden as a number of camomile plants dispersed through it. No green-house or hot-house should be without camomile in a green or in a dried state; either the stalks or flowers will answer. It is a singular fact, that if a plant is drooping and apparently dying, in nine cases out of ten it will recover, if you place a plant of camomile near it. Have any of your readers tried the camomile in any way as a remedy for insects in England?—John Brown, Westerham, Kent, Feb. 1834.—Gardener's Magazine, 49.

A MODERATE FOOD.—How hard is the case of the foreigner among us, who often with a sentiment on his lips that elicits our applause, draws down our laughter, perhaps in spite of us, by an unconscious violation of the king's English. The French and Italians are certainly more amiable than we are in this respect: they can listen with an imperturbable thoughtfulness of allowance; but we appeal to the candid reader, whether the following would not have been irresistible with most of us. An Englishman talking with a German friend, a man of a remarkably philosophical cast of mind, and fond of clothing his sentiments in the graces of classical allusion, the discourse happened to turn upon the mortifications to which those subject themselves who seek after the vanities of this world. Our friend was for stoical independence, and had Diogenes in his eye. "For mine self," he exclaimed, with rising enthusiasm, "I should be quite contentment for to live all my days in a dub, eating no-thing else but unicorns!" (acorns).

CONVERSATION OF MEN OF GENIUS.—The great Colbert paid a pretty compliment to Boileau and Racine. This minister, at his villa, was enjoying the conversation of our two poets, when the arrival of a prelate was announced; turning quickly to the servant, he said, "Let him be shown every thing except myself."—D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature.

POSSIBILITY.—Those things are to be held possible, which are to be done by some person, though not by every one; and which may be done by many, though not by any one; and which may be done in succession of ages, though not within the hour-glass of one man's life; and which may be done by public designation, though not by private endeavour.—Bacon.

MARRIAGES.—Previously to the year 1754, the date of the first Marriage Act, all marriages in England were regulated by the canon law, by which modes of contracting matrimony other than in the face of the church were acknowledged. In Scotland the celebration of marriage is still governed by the principles of the ancient canon law. In England there is but one form of contracting marriage, and all marriages not celebrated according to that form are void, with an exception however in favour of Jews and Quakers, where both parties are of the same persuasion. Prior to the passing of the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33. (the Marriage Act of 1754) the publication of banns was merely an ecclesiastical regulation, adopted for the purpose of ascertaining whether the persons about to be married were free from all lawful impediments.

But that statute renders the ceremonial of banns indispensable, in all cases in which a licence is not obtained. Persons not married by banns must be married by licence, and marriage licences are either common or special. A common licence is a dispensation, by virtue of which marriage is allowed to be solemnized in a church or chapel without the publication of banns. A special licence dispenses with the banns, and also with time and place. The same form is used in granting the one as the other, the only material difference consisting in the additional words introduced into the special licence permitting the marriage to be solemnized, "at any time, in any church or chapel, or other meet or convenient place."

Special licences are restricted to persons of condition; indeed, a regulation, dated Jan. 15, 1759, was made by Archbishop Secker, ordaining that such licences should only be granted to peers or peeresses in their own right, their sons and daughters, dowager peeresses, privy councillors, the judges of Westminster-hall, baronets, knights, and members of Parliament. But, notwithstanding this regulation, it has been usual for the Archbishop of Canterbury to grant occasional favours beyond these limits.—Brady and Mahon's Dictionary of Parochial Law and Taxation, (just published).

MAN.—The mind is the man; and the knowledge of the mind. A man is but what he knoweth. The sovereignty of man lieth hid in knowledge, wherein many things are reserved, which kings with their treasures cannot buy, nor with their forces command.—Bacon.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

What a monstrous thing to have so many and kind correspondents, and yet to be forced to say that the limits of our paper will not allow us to answer them separately! To private communications we answer of course; to the others we say, that they, the writers, must make all the kindest construction of us in the world, at the very time we are seeming inattentive. But we are not so in spirit.

To the question whether contributions are desired, we answer Yes.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Popular Library of Instruction" will be published regularly on the 1st of every Month, at 6d. each Vol.

Four more numbers will conclude this interesting and spirited periodical; and taking into account its very moderate price, the admirable fidelity of its graphic transcripts, and the frank, fearless, and con amore tone of its letter-press, we have no doubt of its ultimate station in public opinion becoming a proud one. The subjects for the present No. are from Teniers, Leonardo da Vinci, and Meiris. The second rank far above the first and third in dignity of subject, and will doubtless be familiar to most, from prior engravings; but we prefer those from Teniers and Meiris; which are delightful, however undignified, from their homely truth to nature, simplicity of design, and unity of effect. LETTERS TO SUCH OF THE LOVERS OF KNOWLEDGE AS HAVE NOT HAD A CLASSICAL EDUCATION.

LETTER I.

INTRODUCTION TO A SERIES OF ARTICLES ON THE GREAT WRITERS OF GREECE AND ROME, ETC.

DEAR FRIENDS,—It is related of an Italian lady, a poetess, who was addressed by a crowd of lovers, that her disposition was so good and charming, and inclined them all so much to resemble her, that they met one another in perfect harmony, and only contended who should please her best. The case is extraordinary, and will be thought not very possible. But there is one mistress who, in proportion as we love her heartily, is so truly a mistress for our soul, and tends to exempt us so much from those infirmities of envy and jealousy which beset the more animal passions, that all who profess themselves her admirers, may unquestionably be very good friends, and love one another the better, the more they love herself. This Mistress is Knowledge; and this is the reason why we of the London Journal venture to claim you all as friends; and to share with you such helps as we possess, towards the enjoyment of her society.

For "to like the same things, and dislike the same things, that (says a Roman historian) is the friendship after all."

"Namque, idem velle, atque idem nolle, ex demum firma amicitia est."—Sallust.

We give you a bit of Latin, that you may see the two languages together, and perhaps chuse to compare the words, and see where you can pick out a meaning. We have heard an intelligent woman say, that when she met with a passage in a book on a scientific or other subject which she could not thoroughly comprehend, she nevertheless made a point of reading it, because it piqued her understanding—made it curious to know more; and she sometimes found that she got a bit of knowledge by the way. In the days of our boyhood, and before we knew the Greek alphabet, we remember how thankful we used to be to Smollett and Fielding, in their novels, for writing their Greek quotations in English letters, and how we used to sound the words, and fancy them something fine. They gave us a regard for the language before we knew any thing about it; like a youth who hears a girl with a sweet voice speak, before he has seen her; and is pleased with her tone and manner, though he does not even know what she says.

We have begun talking with you on other points, before we have stated the main object of our letter; but they are not unconnected with it; and we give you notice, that we shall probably take many of the like liberties of companionship, and endeavour in all respects to be as much at our ease as possible, in order to persuade ourselves that we are as much at home with you as this sort of private publicity will let us be, and that you regard the writer of these letters in the only light in which his addressing himself to you in this way could be bearable; namely, as one who is heartily in earnest for the good and sociality of the world, and who would fain take any steps not calculated to baulk themselves, to promote them. To this end, it has struck him, that by singling himself without reserve into the field, and setting an open example of the bringing into public intercourse the same candour and simplicity that are practised between friends in private, he does something towards breaking down the barriers of many stiff and mistrustful conventionalities which serve to keep men asunder, and therefore assists, however remotely, in hastening the coming of that time, when all men shall say candidly and in friendliness, what they think, and nobody shall be thought the better or worse of for speaking in public, any more than he is now for talking in a room, or telling his friends of something which he thinks will please them. The example has been long set in political and other such public matters. It is desirable that public matters should no longer be supposed exclusively to mean politics, or even parish matters (important as they are). They should comprise knowledge of all sorts, entertainment, the interchange of every kind of advantage; and knowledge is fast making them do so. We look upon ourselves but as a bringer of some new means of enjoyment to that large party of friends, the fellow-creatures who do not happen to have quite as much of them as ourselves; just as a man might bring to his native village some curious presents, or new games, from abroad: and fervent is our sincerity when we add, that as hundreds of the scholars now living could go far deeper into the learning of the subjects we are about to handle than we shall go, so there are, of course, as many readers among the average number of those to whom we address ourselves, who, if they had enjoyed the same advantages as the others, would have been our masters in that respect as well as they; perhaps, like many of those others, could have done them more justice on every point. We believe, however, that we know enough to make our remarks welcome and useful; and if love can supply the want of knowledge in this instance, as it does sometimes in others, assuredly there will be no lack of that.

We propose, then, in these letters, from time to time, and with due intervals of other matter, to furnish those who have not had a classical education, and who have heart and sense enough to regret the want, with such help towards the appreciation and enjoyment of the great names of Greek, Roman, and other literature, as translations in general do not supply, and some knowledge, united with the aforesaid love, in some degree may. We shall begin with the most ancient—or those who are nearest at hand,—as the case may happen; and we shall help our helps with all the aids we can get from other men's criticism, and from translations that are really worth anything. To points of mere learning, and such as men who have learning and nothing else devote themselves, we shall, of course, pay no attention; not because they are without their value, but because, fortunately, they are not necessary to our purpose, which is to give the relish of the fruit, rather than the botany of it. We only wish we could give this better, like that of fruits eaten on the spot where they grow, or transplanted into the exquisite hot-houses that exist in the cells of some brains that we know of. And yet, how few readers are there even among the scholarly, who can pretend to thorough perceptions of that kind? and what multitudes are there that know no more of them than the basket knows of its strawberries? We will venture to say, that even with no better helps than it is in our power to afford, and because we judge of the ancient poets as of the modern, and treat them as men and as geniuses, and creatures of perennial flesh and blood, and of wonderful imaginations, and not as things made up of nothing but schoolmasters, and college-caps, and a "gentlemanly reputation," our reader shall know more of them, before we have done, than half the educated men in England. And we look for the special encouragement, to this end, of real scholars, and shall be grateful for any helps with which they may be moved to enrich us.

There are two supposed (for they are not real) extremes of pretension, upon the strange question whether a knowledge of the learned languages, is or is not of use, against which it behoves an uneducated man of sense and modesty to be on his guard. One is the pretension of those who say that a man can have no idea of the ancient writers, without a deep intimacy with their language: the other, of those who affirm, with equal vehemence, that there is no necessity to know the language at all, and that translations do quite as well as the originals for giving you all that you need be acquainted with of the author's genius.

The former of these pretenders is generally a shallower man than the other, though sometimes it is pure vanity and self-will that makes him talk as he does; he has an over-estimation of his advantages, simply because they are his. He is as proud of his learning as another pompous man might be of his park and his mansion. Such is the case, when he really has anything like an intimacy with his authors; but in both instances he would fain make out his possession to be unapproachable, by all who have not had the same golden key. The common run of the class consists of men who really know nothing of their authors but the words, and who unconsciously feel that, on that account, they must make the best of their knowledge, and pretend it is a wonderful matter. Such a man smiles when you speak of getting some insight into the character of Homer's genius, or Virgil's, by dint of some happy bit of version, or some masterly criticism. He says, triumphantly, that "even Pope" is acknowledged not to give a right idea of him, much less Chapman, and those other "old quaint writers:" for "old," observe, is a term of contempt with him; though "ancient," he thinks, comprises every thing that is respectable. But "old" means a man who lived only a few hundred years back, and who did not write either in Latin or Greek; whereas "ancient" means a man who lived upwards of a thousand, and wrote perhaps a dull book in one of those languages, which has contrived to come down to us, owing to some curious things it contains relative to customs and manners, or to the influence of a succession of these sort of critics, and the long fashion they have kept up by dint of the connexion that has hitherto subsisted between the power of receiving a classical education and the advantages of wealth and rank. When all the world come to share in that education, some singular questions will take place, both as to the genius of the ancient writers, and the moral benefits derivable from portions of them. If our friend, of the above class, is a man of consequence, he looks upon his learning as forming an additional barrier between him and the uneducated. He quotes Greek in parliament, and takes it for an argument. Or he forgets both his Greek and Latin, but thinks he could recover it when he pleases, and that is the same thing. If he is a professed scholar, he is ignorant of every thing in the world but scholarship, and therefore ignorant of that too. He is a pompous school-master, or a captious verbal critic, or in his most respectable capacity, a harmless and dreaming pedant,—a Dominie Sampson. If England had existed before Greece, he would have been an idolater of Shakespeare and Milton, at the expense of Homer and Euripides; or he would have known just as much of the former as he does of the latter! that is to say, nothing. In short, you may describe him as a man who knows that there is another man living on the upper side of his town, of the name of Ancient; and a very wonderful gentleman he takes Ancient to be, because he is rich, and has a large library, and has given him access to it; but what sort of a man Ancient really is, what is the solidity of his understanding, the subtlety of his imagination, or the contents of the books in his library, except that they are printed in certain kinds of type, of all that, our learned friend knows nothing, and therefore he concludes, that nobody else can know.

Of the other extreme of pretenders, who dogmatise on this subject, that is to say, who pronounce peremptory judgments of Yes and No, and Possible and Impossible, without a due knowledge of the subject,—the best and most intelligent portion sometimes contains persons who know so much on other points, that they ought to know better on this: but out of a resentment of the very want of the other's advantages, affect to despise them. For herein the exalters of a classical education, as the only thing needful, and the decriers of it as a thing altogether unnecessary, set out from precisely the same ground of self-sufficiency. The former unduly trumpet up the education, merely because they have had it, (or think they have), and the latter as readily decry it, merely because they have not. These latter argue, that you may know all that is useful in ancient books, by means of translations; and that the poetry "and all that" may be got equally out of them, or is of no consequence. Their own poetry, meanwhile, such as it is, that is to say, their caprices, their imaginary advantages, and the colouring which their humour and passions give to every thing near them, is in full blossom.

To cut short this question, which we feel more loth to touch upon in the latter instance than in the former, (because more sympathy is due to the resentment of a want than to the arrogance of a possession), we may, perhaps, illustrate the point at once to the readers' satisfaction, by the help of no greater a passage than a jest out of "Joe Miller."

It is related of Archbishop Herring, that when he was at college, he fell one day into a gutter, and that a wag exclaimed as he got up, "Ah, Herring, you're in a pretty pickle!" Upon which a dull fellow went away, and said, "So and so has been bantering poor Herring. Herring fell into the gutter, and so, says Dick, says he, Ah, Herring, my boy, you're in a pretty situation."

Now the pedant, who is all for the original language, and is of opinion that no version of their writers or account of them can give you the least idea of their spirit, is bound to maintain, on the same principle, that it would be impossible to convey the smallest real taste of this joke out of English into Latin or Greek; while every real scholar knows that the thing is very possible.

On the other side the bigotted no-scholar is bound to insist, that the stupid version of the joke is quite as good as the original, or at any rate supplies us with all that is really wanted of it,—that the word situation is as good as the word pickle, and that, therefore, no utility is lost sight of—no real information. It is true, the whole joke is lost, the whole spirit of the thing, but that is no matter. As to confining the notion of utility to matters of information, useful in the ordinary sense of the word, however important; we will not waste our room, at this time of day, after all which has been said and understood to the contrary, with shewing you what you know already. The more we really know of any thing, languages included, the more, as it has been finely said, do we "discipline" our "humanity;" that is, teach our common nature to know what others have thought, felt, and known, before us, and so enable our modesty and information to keep pace with each other.

It will not be supposed by the reflecting reader that we mean to compare the sufficiency of a translation in the above instance with its being all that might be wanted in others, or that the spirit and peculiar fragrance (so to speak,) of such poetry as Shakespeare's, could be transferred through a Greek medium without losing any thing by the way; unless a Shakespeare himself were the operator, or even then. Undoubtedly the peculiarity of the medium itself, the vessel, will make a difference. All that we mean to say is, that some real taste of the essence of ancient genius, far better than what is afforded by the specimens generally on sale, can be given by means of great care and lovingness; and that those who are so insanely learned as to take the vessel itself for the whole merit of the contents, have no taste of it at all.

THIRD WEEK IN APRIL.

THE SINGING BIRDS.

APRIL is full of the beautiful evidences of Spring. March has enough of them to make us grateful, but April, with her profusion of white and green, of her songs, and her bright little wings, confirms the promise. She may be said to have four charming manifestations of nature's wealth to herself,—the blossoming of the fruit trees, the leafing of the trees in general, the return of the singing birds, and the re-appearance of the butterflies. She is the elder and slenderer sister of May, dressed in more virgin apparel, and her fingers are dabbled with wet; but her colder cheek has still a bloom on it, and she prepares the country for her luxuriant sister with a world of good will.

Of the three principal leaders of the spring and summer birds,—the swallow, the nightingale, and the cuckoo, we spoke in our first number. The trees (if our own leaves last long enough, and thicken into bowers for the reader,—as we have reason to hope they will,) we shall keep till June or July, when their shade will be desirable; and brown and thick shall be a whole wood of them, by the help of their human birds, the poets. The present week, by the help of a book, of which it is difficult to take leave, even for a time, we devote to the song of birds in general, and shall proceed to lay before our readers the following interesting speculations on nature's intention in it, from the pages of the writer to whom we are already so much obliged.

"The purpose (says Mr. Mudie) which the song of birds answers in the economy of nature, is one of those mysteries, which, like the differences of tint in their plumage, human ingenuity has not yet been able to explain. It is not, however, a mere pairing cry, because it is continued till the birds break the shell, and, in some instances, till they are able to fly. We may be sure, however, that it has its use; and, as we can observe that the females of all birds which have that cry, whether it be what we call song or not, are excited when it is uttered by the male, it may be that it produces in the female that heat which is necessary for hatching the eggs. In ourselves there are many sounds which make the heart beat, the blood dance, and the whole body glow, we know not why; and thus we have at least no ground for denying without proof, that the other animals may be affected in a similar manner. Perhaps the more philosophical way of considering it is to suppose that it produces general excitement, and a power of more energetic performance in all the labour which the birds can undertake.

"The connection between the song and the plumage, and the silence and the moult, is also a curious matter, and shows that the whole bird is subject to some general law, which, though it lies deep beyond the power of our divination, governs ever the minutest circumstance,—the production of a new spot or gloss on a feather, the reddening of a comb or a wattle, or the inspiration of courage into birds naturally timid. The birds, in fact, blossom in the spring as well as the plants; and when the purpose of nature is accomplished, the bloom of one is shed as well as that of the other. But if the purpose of nature in continuing the race, is not accomplished, the bloom lingers. If the east wind shrivel the anthers of the peach blossoms, the petals do not come down perfect in that powdery shower which is the sign of a plentiful crop; they cleave to the tree, and languish slowly there. "Wo be to the wind of the black north-east," says the cultivator; "it sheds no blooms;" and so also may the lover of birds lament, if the songs of his favourites are continued through the summer. If the bird continues its song, it at the same time continues its plumage; and the moult, when it does, takes place, partly because it is at a later and colder season, and partly from that part of physiology which has not yet become a science; the new plumage has less of the peculiarity of the male, and more resembles that of the female and the young, than if the bird had been mute and had moulted, in due course.

"That song of sorrow (though to the bird it is rather a song of hope delayed) has not the spirit of the natural song. It is true, that by Midsummer, nature is muffled by drooping leaves, and fallen blooms, and downy anthers; and it waxes fat and rank, so that though it may murmur, it will not "ring clear," (like a moistened flute), as it does in the season of vernal song, when all is fresh and full of sap; but we also can perceive a falling off in the note itself; and we have a corroboration in caged birds, which never give their song with the full glee and power of that of the woodlands. Even in the most admired song that is warbled from the prison-house of wire, an ear tuned and habituated to the free strains of nature, can recognize a blending of the cry of irritation and distress. Nor can it be otherwise. The bird is the child of nature as much as man is, and it loves liberty as well—better, for it will not voluntarily exchange that to be a pampered slave in a palace. It puts one in mind of that exquisitely mournful delineation of the children of Israel, in painful servitude and restraint, even on the palmy shores of the wide-rolling Euphrates; and one cannot contemplate the imprisoned bird, without thinking on the mossy tree, the little nest, and the chirping brood, and feeling the force of the unanswerable interrogatory—"Ah! how can we sing the song of our God in the place of our captivity?"—Feathered Tribes of the British Islands. Vol. 1. p. 244.

In another part of his book, where he speaks of the nightingale (respecting whose song we venture to think him on the unorthodox side), Mr. Mudie says, that men sing in many moods, "but birds sing only when they are merry." Is there not some inconsistency between this assertion and the remarks above quoted? Does he not show us, that birds, as well as human beings, may be moved in their song by melancholy as well as mirthful excitement—not without pleasure, it is true—but still a mournful one, or something allied to it? They sing, he tells us (in this and other passages of his work) from "hope delayed," from want of their mates, and other uneasy circumstances; and he adds an affecting piece of information—worthy the regard of the thoughtful—that an experienced ear can discern a mingling of distress and irritation in the tones of their imprisoned song. Now, in what we cannot help in all this, there is no such pain and melancholy as we need contemplate with any misgivings of nature's good will; for birds generally realize their hopes and their mates, and we heartily agree with the opinion implied by the poet respecting the grounds and intentions of all her works, that

"In nature there is nothing melancholy."

What is unalterable, we may conclude to be best for the general energy of health and pleasure which it includes; what is otherwise, man (and, for aught we know, other creatures too), but man evidently, is incited to alter. Let us never lose sight of that manifest and important fact. But as lovers and bereaved persons sing to their guitars and piano-fortes, not always a song of mirth, so nightingales and other birds may surely warble in the like shadow of a sweet thought, and feel the shade of it as well as the sweetness.

We proceed to give two more extracts from Mr. Mudie's attractive work—the first on the subject of the birds more particularly called the Warblers, or those who return to us from warmer climates with songs unknown to our homesteads; the other, on that joyous herald of the spring, the lark.

"Though all the little birds are interesting, as associated with nature, with innocence, and with beauty, there is a peculiar interest about the warblers. The birds, which remain constantly with us and come around our dwellings in the inclement season, give that season sprightliness by their appearance, and hail with their songs any warm day that breaks out. But the constancy of their appearance takes off some of the interest which, if they were as novel as they are beautiful, they would more certainly command; and as their songs, breaking out as they do in the intervals of the storms, are no certain signs that the life of the year has begun, we do not listen to them with the same attention and satisfaction as to the migrant warblers.

"The song, or the other demonstrations of spring, given by the resident bird, tells us merely of the state of the season in our own country, of which we have other means of judging; but the summer, or rather the spring migrant brings us tidings from afar—intimates that the plains of Africa are burned up with drought, or that the season of growth is advancing in the south of Europe, and will speedily reach us. They are visitants from afar, but they are not strangers; they are our own native birds that retired during winter, leaving the groves, the fields, and the river banks to other races, driven from our own wilds, or from more inclement regions further to the north, so that in the season of penury there might be plenty for those whose structure and powers did not adapt them for flights so far to the southward; and now, when the time of plenty is again coming round, and vegetation is approaching that state in which there is danger to it from those creatures on which birds feed, they return to resume those labours which are alike useful, and those songs which are alike cheering, to themselves and to us.

"They come also to be our near associates, when those that we had with us in the winter are beginning to seek their way to the woods and the wilds. All the warblers love shade and shelter; but, with few exceptions, they seek these among the cultivated lands, or close on their margins. Some are in the grove, others in the coppice; some by the ridgy stream, or the reedy pool, and others in the brake; but they are not found on the wide waste, or in the upland forest; and, generally speaking, a man always partakes in the benefit of their labours, and may hear the melody of their notes. The spaces of which they extend vary, and so do the characters of those places which they most frequent; but it is a general rule, that where the air is most pure, and the soil most fertile, and in the highest state of cultivation, there the warblers are found, in the greatest variety of species, and the greatest number of individuals. Even their voices partake of the characters of their localities. The nightingale sings more sweetly over the gravel in Surrey, than over the clay in Middlesex.

"There are considerable differences of appearance in the warblers, answering to the haunts in which they are found; but there seems a general likeness through all the genera. They are delicate in their outlines, without any of the full or abrupt curves that are found in many other genera. Their plumage is delicate, and, though there be some exceptions, their colours are sub-dead, and without any very strong markings or contrasts. The feathers on the shoulders and the wing coverts are short, so that the wings are light. Their whole expression is soft, but not dull; and their manners, though gentle, are rather sprightly. They have not, indeed, any organs which can be regarded as offensive weapons; their bills are tender, suited only for the capture of insects and their larvae, or for bruising berries, or other small pulpy fruits. They are not all song birds, but they comprise the finest of our songsters, and their notes run more on the minor keys than those of any other birds."—Vol. I. p. 313.

The warblers, besides the nightingale, include the sedge and reed songsters, the red-start, the white-throat, the petty-chape, titmouse, black-cap, &c. The thrush, with its beautiful mellow wildness, sings to us nine months out of the twelve. Now for the sky-lark, respecting whose movements, during its song, Mr. Modie enters into some curious particulars.

"Larks, from their vast numbers, flock much and fly far in the winter, and flock more to the uplands in the middle of England, where much rain usually falls in the summer, than to the drier and warmer places near the shores; but so true are they to their time, that, be it in the south, the centre, or the north, the lark is always ready on the first gleamy day of the year to mount to its watch tower in the upper sky, and proclaim the coming of the vernal season. It is in fact more joyant then in the sun, more inspirable by the life which the solar influence diffuses through the atmosphere, than almost any other creature: not a spring air can sport, not a breeze of morn can play, not an exhalation of freshness from opening bud or softening clod can ascend, without note of it being taken and proclaimed by this all-sentient index to the progress of nature.

"And the form and manner of the indication are as delightful as the principle is true. The lark rises, not like most birds, which climb the air upon one slope, by a succession of leaps, as if a heavy body were raised by a succession of efforts, or steps, with pauses between; it twines upward like a vapour, borne lightly on the atmosphere, and yielding to the motions of that as other vapours do. Its course is a spiral gradually enlarging; and, seen on the side, it is as if it were keeping the boundary of a pillar of ascending smoke, always on the surface of that logarithmic column, (or funnel rather,) which is the only figure that, on a narrow base, and spreading as it ascends, satisfies the eyes with its stability and self-balancing in the thin and invisible fluid. Nor can it seem otherwise, for it is true to nature. In the case of smoke or vapour, it diffuses itself in the exact proportion as the density, or power of support in the air diminishes: and the lark widens the volutions of its spiral in the same proportion; of course it does so only when perfectly free from disturbance or alarm, because either of these is a new element in the cause, and as such must modify the effect. When equally undisturbed, the descent is by a reversal of the same spiral; and when that is the case, the song is continued during the whole time that the bird is in the air.

"The accordance of the song with the mode of the ascent and descent, is also worthy of notice. When the volutions of the spiral are narrow, and the bird changing its attitude rapidly in proportion to the whole quantity of flight, the song is partially suppressed, and it swells as the spiral widens, and sinks as it contracts; so that though the notes may be the same, it is only when the lark sings poised at the same height, that it sings in a uniform key. It gives a swelling song as it ascends, and a sinking one as it comes down; and if even it take but one wheel in the air, as that wheel always includes either an ascent or a descent, it varies the pitch of the song.

"The song of the lark, besides being a most accessible and delightful subject for common observation, is a very curious one for the physiologist. Every one in the least conversant with the structure of birds, must be aware that, with them, the organs of intonation and modulation are inward, deriving little assistance from the tongue, and none, or next to none, from the mandibles of the bill. The windpipe is the musical organ, and it is often very curiously formed. Birds require that organ less for breathing than other animals having a windpipe and lungs, because of the air cells and breathing tubes with which all parts of their bodies (even the bones,) are furnished. But those diffused breathing organs must act with least freedom when the bird is making the greatest efforts in motion; that is, when ascending or descending: and in proportion as these cease to act, the trachea is the more required for the purposes of breathing. The sky lark thus converts the atmosphere into a musical instrument of many stops, and so produces an exceedingly wild and varied song—a song which is, perhaps, not equal either in power or compass, in the single stave, to that of many of the warblers, but one which is more varied in the whole succession. All birds that sing ascending or descending, have similar power; but the sky-lark has it in a degree superior to any other."—Vol. II. p. 6.

Mr. D'Israeli, in the second volume of his Curiosities of Literature, lately republished, (p. 69.) has a quotation about the lark, from the fantastic, but not unpoetical pages of the old French poet, Du Bartas, in which he thinks the imitation of the bird's song not a happy one. The mode of attempting to do justice to the song is not a happy one, nor in the finest taste; but it appears to us, that with allowance for the conceit, and keeping in mind the liquid sharpness of the French pronunciation, especially in the last line, the "echo to the sense" is really not unhappily sounded. Here are the lines. Translation is out of the question:—

La gentil alouette, avec son tirelire,
Tirelire, a lire, et tirelire tire,
Vers la voute du ciel, plus son vol vers ce lieu Vire et desire dire, adieu Dieu, adieu Dieu.

"The lark that tirra-lirra chaunts," says Shakspeare. For an ode to the sky-lark, full of the bird's own extatic spirit, see the poems of Mr. Shelley. Spenser has a charming image of Cupid bathing and dressing his wings, under the eyes of a weeping beauty:—

The blinded archer-boy
Like lark in shower of rain,
Sate bathing of his wings;
And glad the time did spend
Under those crystal drops,
Which fell from her fair eyes,
And at their brightest beams
Him preyed* in lovely wise.

Our present week is rich in birth-days.

April 16, 1588. At Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, whence he is called the Philosopher of Malmesbury, Thomas Hobbes, who originated much of the philosophy that was afterwards broached with more popularity by Locke and others, the supposed opinions of their master on questions of religion and government having kept his name in the back-ground. Though fearless in intellect Hobbes was personally, a timid man, and very anxious to keep clear of church and state troubles. He was one of the ornaments of the tribe of smokers, being fond of soothing his meditations with a pipe. His attempts at poetry form an extraordinary and ludicrous contrast with his prose works. Dryden good-naturedly says that he took to poetry when he was too old; but the truth is, his philosophy was too material to make a poet of. He wanted the fine elements of imagination and sentiment. The following (from memory) is a specimen or two of his translation of Homer, one of the most ridiculous mistakes ever committed by a great man. Speaking of the sound of Apollo's arrows in his quiver, as the god moved along in his wrath, (which is a passage prodigiously noble and characteristic in the Greek,) he says—

His arrows chink as often as he jogs!

and in another fine passage, one of the very finest of antiquity, where Jupiter with the knitting of his immortal brows makes Olympus tremble—he says in his fantastic rhymes,— —Thewith his great black brows he nodded

Wherewith affrighted were the powers divine,
Olympus shook at shaking of his godhead,
And Thetis, from it, jump'd into the brine!

to wit, plunged into the ocean!

April 17, about 497 before the Christian era, at a village near Athens, Socrates, the founder of the philosophy of good sense, who taught us what to do in our houses and social intercourse, not forgetting the hopes to which Nature herself, and a sense of the invisible world, incline the aspirations of men.

To sage philosophy next lend thine ear,
From heav'n descended to the low-roof'd house
Of Socrates; see there his tenement,
Whom, well inspired, the oracle pronounced
Wiseest of men.

April 18, 1483, at Urbino, in Italy, Raphael (Raffaello Sanzio) the prince of painters; so called, because he possessed the greatest of requisites for the art of painting in their highest characters, particularly that of expression, or the power of exhibiting the thoughts and emotions of men in the face and figures. And he could do this alike in gentle subjects and in grand. Raphael was as prosperous in fortune as in art, and appears to have been beloved by every body; but died young—at the age of thirty-seven; yet he produced an astonishing heap of works. But this it is to have a pursuit which we perfectly love. "And the more a man does," says Mr. Hazlitt, "the more he can do;" which is a saying that looks like a contradiction, but, on a little inspection, will be found to contain a very evident and encouraging truth. Habit produces readiness. An excellent idea of one of Raphael's finest productions, the death of Ananias, has been given in one of the energetic wood-cuts of the Penny Magazine.

April 21, 1563, at Delft, in Holland, Hugo Grotius, a statesman, theologian, and law writer, all (considering the time he lived in) on the side of liberality and a Christian benevolence. During the struggles in his country with a less generous system, he got into prison, and his wife delivered him by an ingenious stratagem, putting him into a chest which used to go to and fro between him and his friends with books in it. Grotius had a fine taste in poetry, and was of social and pleasant manners. A French writer, who often supped with him, says that he never called his servants by their names, but if he wanted to speak to any of them, used to cry "Hop!" Probably this was nothing more than the old cry of our gentry to their servants—"Hob, there!" "As for the rest," says this writer, "he was the honestest man in the world."

PAGANINI.

FROM AN UNPUBLISHED POEM BY THE EDITOR.

So play'd of late to every passing thought
With finest change (might I but half as well
So write!) the pale magician of the bow,
Who brought from Italy the tales, made true,
Of Grecian lyres; and on his spheric band,
Loading the air with dumb expectancy,
Suspended, ere it fell, a nation's breath.

He smote,—and clinging to the serious chords
With godlike ravishment, drew forth a breath,
So deep, so strong, so fervid thick with love,
Blissful, yet laden as with twenty prayers,
That Juno yearn'd with no diviner soul
To the first burthen of the lips of Jove.

The exceeding mystery of the loveliness
Sadden'd delight; and with his mournful look,
Dreary and gaunt, hanging his pallid face
Twixt his dark flowing locks, he almost seem'd,
To feeble or to melancholy eyes,
One that had parted with his soul for pride,
And in the sable secret liv'd forlorn.

But true and earnest, all too happily
That skill dwelt in him, serious with its joy;
For noble now he smote the exulting strings,
And bade them march before his stately will;
And now he lov'd them like a cheek, and laid
Endearment on them, and took pity sweet;
And now he was all mirth, or all for sense
And reason, carving out his thoughts like prose
After his poetry; or else he laid

His own soul prostrate at the feet of love,
And with a full and trembling fervour deep,
In kneeling and close-creeping urgency,
Implored some mistress with hot tears; which past,
And after patience had brought right of peace,
He drew, as if from thoughts finer than hope,
Comfort around him in ear-soothing strains
And elegant composure; or he turn'd
To heaven instead of earth, and rais'd a pray'r
So earnest vehement, yet so lowly sad,
Mighty with want and all poor human tears,
That never saint, wrestling with earthly love,
And in mid-age unable to get free,

Tore down from heav'n such pity. Or behold
In his despair, (for such, from what he spoke Of grief before it, or of love, 'twould seem)
Jump would he into some strange wail uncouth
Of witches' dance, ghastly with whinings thin
And palsied node—mirth wicked, sad, and weak.
And then with show of skill mechanical,
Marvellous as witchcraft, he would overthrow
That vision with a shower of notes like hail,
Or sudden mixtures of all difficult things
Never yet heard; flashing the sharp tones now,
In downward leaps like swords; now rising fine
Into some almost tip of minute sound,
From which he stepp'd into a higher and higher
On viewless points, till laugh took leave of him:
Or he would fly as if from all the world
To be alone, and happy, and you should hear
His instrument become a tree far off,
A nest of birds and sunbeams, sparkling both,
A cottage-bow'r: or he would condescend,
In playful wisdom which knows no contempt,
To bring to laughing memory, plain as sight,
A farm-yard with its inmates, ox and lamb,
The whistle and the whip, with feeding hens
In household fidget muttering evermore,
And rising as in scorn, crown'd Chanticleer,
Ordaining silence with his sovereign crow.
Then from one chord of his amazing shell
Would he fetch out the voice of quires, and weight
Of the built organ; or some two-fold strain
Moving before him in sweet-going yoke,
Ride like an Eastern conqueror, round whose state
Some light Morisco leaps with his guitar;
And ever and anon o'er these he'd throw
Jets of small notes like pearl, or like the pelt
Of lovers' sweetmeats on Italian lutes
From windows on a feast-day, or the leaps
Of pebbled water, sprinkling in the sun.

One chord effecting all:—and when the ear
Felt there was nothing present but himself
And silence, and the wonder drew deep sighs,
Then would his bow lie down again in tears,
And speak to some one in a pray'r of love,
Endless, and never from his heart to go:
Or he would talk as of some secret bliss;
And at the close of all the wonderment
(Which himself shar'd) near and more near would come Into the inmost ear, and whisper there
Breathings so soft, so low, so full of life,
Touch'd beyond sense, and only to be borne
By pauses which made each less bearable,
That out of pure necessity for relief
From that heap'd joy, and bliss that laugh'd for pain,
The thunder of th' uprolling house came down,
And bow'd the breathing sorcerer into smiles.

GOODNESS AND PLEASURE.

Conclusion of last week's Extract from Mr. Bentham's unpublished Work.

Praise and Censure.—In the conveying approbation to another for meritorious conduct, let the expressions be warm and cordial. Let the recompense be as much as the circumstances of the case justify. Sincerity and candour, indeed, are modifications of veracity; or rather veracity is a modification of sincerity; but veracity has its shapes more or less attractive; and when it has the matter of pleasure at its disposal, let its distribution be made as welcome as possible to the receiver. That a favour denied may be made, by the grace of its denial, almost as pleasurable as a benefit conferred, has almost passed into a proverb; and that the language of approval may lose all, or almost all its acceptableness by its forms of expression, or manner of utterance, is within the observation of every man's experience. Let your praise then, when given, be given with all the accompaniments which make praise most delightful. The exercise which conveys approbation is in itself most salutary. Let it be the expression of truth combined with warm-heartedness; one sentence so characterized, will be worth many in which such qualities are wanting.

And where extra-regarding prudence* requires that disapprobation should be conveyed to another, let only so much of pain be created as is necessary for the accomplishing the object you have in view. If you create too little pain, indeed, that which you do create is wasted; because the purpose for which it was created fails. But the common error is on the other side. Vindictiveness frequently mingles with the rewards of justice. The disposition of power to display itself, usually leads to the infliction of more suffering than prudence or benevolence warrant. And in ordinary cases, disapprobation is conveyed in that moment when passion has enfeebled the power of judging how much of pain is demanded. As a general rule, avoid the expression of disapprobation when you are angry. The violent expressions to which irritation gives birth, are those which will be least adapted to the end; for the blindness of anger prevents it from seeing and seizing the fit object for the accomplishment of its end.

Love of having the "last word."—Some men have a failing which is a source of great annoyance to others, and for which they pay the penalty by making the conversation less agreeable, and even at times making their conversation intolerable; it is the habit of sticking for the final word. Right or wrong in the controversy, subdued or victorious, there are persons who insist on exercising the petty and vexatious despotism of uttering the last sentence that is uttered. This disposition is the out-break of pride in a very offensive shape; it is the usurpation of dominion over the self-love of other men, on a ground where men are ordinarily most sensitive. It is, in fact, a determination to humiliate him with whom you have been holding intercourse—to humiliate him, not by the success of an irresistible argument, but by the intrusion of a tyrannic power. Avoid then the act, lest the act should create the habit; and if the habit exist, extra-regarding prudence requires that it should be got rid of. Watch yourself, and inquire if any friend on whose sincerity you can rely—inquire, if you are quite sure that you will not be hurt by his reply, whether the infirmity is exhibited by, or has been observed in you; and if it be, correct the infirmity.

Discovery of the valuable part of the minds of others.—Acts of benevolence cannot be better exercised on occasions where we are forced, as it were, into the company of others, than by the choice of pleasurable topics of conversation. A little attention will discover those topics. To detect what are the peculiar riches of another man's mind, or experience, or knowledge, is among the happiest of resources. Its exercise is alike complimentary to the other party, and instructive to ourselves.

* By "extra-regarding" prudence, the author means prudence as regards others, and its re-action on ourselves.

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 16, 1834.

NOT only do we continue to receive from our correspondents the most animating expressions of kindness, but the press, of all parties, has honoured and delighted us with a singular unanimity of encouragement. We are aware how much of this honour is done us for our good intentions; and how natural it is for men of spirit and talent, to let their praises run over in full measure when they are pleased; but we are the more delighted with their approbation for those very reasons, because it shews what a fund of good will there is towards a good intention, in the bosoms of all men, especially the ablest; and how ready they are to confirm by their own actions (the most valuable of all proof), any genuine evidences of belief in the possibility of a more harmonious world.

To the Times for setting the powerful example of its good will; to the Morning Chronicle, which (we understand) followed it, (though our old brother book-worm, and able, and estimable friend, the Editor, would not have required any such stimulus to his good-nature); to a notice so deeply kind, that it becomes us to be silent before it, in the classical pages of the Examiner; to a very particular one, calculated to be extremely useful, in the Spectator; to another, of singular gallantry and handsomeness on the part of the Age, which we are quick to acknowledge; to the Northampton Herald for a paragraph in which we recognize the friendly and graceful mind of a writer in another journal; to the Bucks Gazette for sending us its brotherly furtherance of the paragraph; to other papers, which we have heard of, but cannot with certainty specify; and last, not least, to our modest but valued friend the Ladies' Penny Gazette, whose verses on the occasion, for the sake of the genuine things they contain, we would extract into our Journal, if we had not retained some little modesty of our own,—to these, and all friends, we return our best thanks; and we return them, not only for our own sakes, however flattered and animated, but for the sake of that humanity at large which such evidences of good will tend to promote, and which, we hope and believe, will every day more and more be drawing the world together, to compare notes for its advancement. We have nothing to do with politics in this journal, in a certain sense, directly or indirectly; but the fact is, that Politics, in their noblest and most universal sense, have to do, remotely or otherwise, with every fresh movement in society, small as well as great; and it is in the name of a large principle, and not of our own little pretensions, we speak, when we say, that even from so small a seed as we have attracted this sunshine of good-will to, some others may arise, which may be transplanted, from time to time, and from spot to spot, till they unite with the harvests of greater cultivators, and of awful toil, to clothe the world in gladness.*

In our last week's article, under the present head, we entered too much into critical details on particular subjects. It is not our object to do this, though we may be occasionally tempted to it (as we were then) by a particular book or picture. The main objects of our Journal are explained by the general appearance of it, and by its resemblance in certain points to Chambers's Edinburgh Journal. In the articles under the head of London, which are an addition to the plan of that paper, we do not profess to give reviews, or to notice everything; but simply to catch the spirit of what is passing, sometimes as persons present, sometimes as mere recorders of the leading opinions of the town; though always with an attention and responsibility of our own. We write them chiefly for our friends in the country, and would have them be regarded as the letters of a London correspondent, who makes the subjects of them a portion of his ordinary communications by the post, having friends who like to know a little of what is going forward, on points interesting to the advancement of knowledge.

We have to commence then our memorandums of the London week, with another congratulation on the increasing exchanges of good offices between England and foreign countries. The cause is no greater, this time, than an acknowledgment on the part of the University of Tübingen, in Wirtemberg, of the receipt of a "Collection of Historical Documents," from the Speaker of the English House of Commons, "printed under the direction of the Record Commission." But even this is an addition to the stock of promises for the world, and for the growth of general intelligence and good will. How much better to see the official authorities of the globe corresponding with one another on the subject of books and useful presents, instead of requesting to know which means to insult the other first, and when they shall go to war, and play all sorts of absurd enormities!

The opera season is improving by the addition of Mademoiselle Giulietta Grisi, and the return of our old acquaintances Rubini and Tamburini, the one with his rubies of notes, of which he is a little too lavish; the other with a talent for almost anything, at once brilliant and solid. Mademoiselle Grisi (whom we have not heard) is highly praised by the newspapers.

* We understand (for we have not yet seen the articles) that to the list of our kind contemporaries and good wishers, we are to add the Weekly Dispatch and the Literary Gazette, but that the latter objects to our entire abstracts of new novels, as doubting whether they are entirely fair. This, to be sure, is a consideration "to give us pause." We can only say, that we will enquire into it amongst the parties most concerned, and if we have made an erroneous judgment of their feelings on the point, make haste to alter it, and act accordingly.

A masquerade is occasionally got up at this theatre, but with little success. One has just taken place. Our beloved countrymen, in fact, as a body, are not yet lively and off-hand enough in the art of sociality, to make these exhibitions tell. They want a few more London Journals! together with some other things which graver journals will help to bring them. We never saw an English masquerade but once, and then its mirth was so melancholy, that it made us go away. Half of the people seemed "afraid of committing themselves," and the other half bent upon showing that they were simply not afraid. There was no genuine vivacity in any quarter. Even a real pantomime-clown who was there, gave but one somerset, and then stood still for the evening, with his hands in his pockets, as if petrified by the place.

They understand Mathews, however,—the masterly exhibitions of the humorous and absurd in the person of one man, who has all the show to himself; and accordingly they are now flocking to a selection from his former best pieces, at the Adelphi Theatre; we need not say with what delight. You may go to see whole comedies in which all the persons concerned do nothing worth seeing. Mathews is a whole comedy in himself, of many persons; and all his characters have something good in them, mostly a great deal that is admirable. Face, manner, mind, are all done to the life.

Of Paganini and his marvellous violin which is now to be heard at the Adelphi, glorifying, praying, laughing, lamenting, making love, we dare not trust ourselves to speak in these brief notices. But we have given an extract, in another column, from a manuscript we have by us, in which there is an attempt to express some of the feelings he has given us every time we heard him. We are sorry to observe by the newspapers, that he has just fallen ill.

WE see, in the news from Scotland, that at the interment of the venerable widow of Burns, ("bonnie Jeanie Armour," who, we believe, made him a very kind and considerate wife,) the poet's body was for a short time exposed to view, and his aspect found in singular preservation. An awful and affecting sight! We should have felt, if we had been among the bye-standers, as if we had found him in some bed in the night of time and space, and as if he might have said something! grave but kind words of course, befitting his spirit, and that of the wise placidity of death: for so the aspect of death looks. A corpse seems as if it suddenly knew everything, and was profoundly at peace in consequence.

THE water-colour exhibition, in Bond-street, was meant as a kind of supplement to the one in Pall Mall east. There are few very few pictures in the room worth seeing; and those one would wish to see in some better place. V. Bartholomew has presented us with some of beautiful, lively colours. How lively those parrots! how beautifully intense that convolvulus! There are some landscapes by the same artist in the room; but in scenery, that liveliness of colour for which he is remarkable in his flowery pieces, is not to be perceived. Sidney Shepherd is fertile but more tasty than powerful. Barbank has furnished some very clever, highly-finished studies of animals. His large picture is not so good. Two 'Studies of Pigs,' by J. Thorpe, are admirable; we can only object to the background, which is a little too forward. Scene from Moore's 'Lalla Rookh,' of the dead Arab girl at the bottom of the sea, by Kearney, is exceedingly fanciful and pretty, with a nice feeling of colour. 'Absent, but not forgotten,' does great credit to the youth of the artist, Miss Fanny Corbeaux; though the perspective of the table is somewhat out of order. The lady in the picture is a little like the fair painter. 'Just Caught,' being captive fish, and a fruit-piece, by Spry, are near Bartholomew in brilliancy of colour. And last, for a bonne-bouche, Lance's 'Study of Fruit' is rich, brilliant, and fresh as nature.

Our limits restrict us to noticing the most striking pictures in the collection, or we should have mentioned a few others; while, on the other hand, we could wish that some of the attempts in the room had been left out altogether. They are surely not "weeds of glorious feature," but "weeds that have no business there."

We spoke in our last of cheap music. There is to be a grand Musical Festival. Sincerely do we hope that in addition to the other merits of its arrangement, we may have the pleasure of announcing that such a scale of prices has been determined on as will admit all classes to a participation. If so, it will be a most happy opportunity for those, whose only incapacity for music is an incapacity to enrich their taste by the payment of seven and sixpence, at the door of a Concert Room. The price for seats of the best kind, on each morning, is to be fixed, we understand, at one guinea. This may not be unreasonable, considering what is offered, and who are likely to be subscribers; but from this price downwards we trust we shall hear of various terms of admission, calculated to the means of all ranks of people. Why should there not be a shilling gallery? Though it were amongst the very rafters of the ceiling, who would not be glad to see it filled with happy faces?

MONSIEUR DUPONT.

ABSTRACT OF THE NOVEL OF THAT NAME BY THE CELEBRATED PAUL DE KOCK, WHICH HAS NOT YET BEEN TRANSLATED IN THIS COUNTRY.

PAUL DE KOCK is the novelist of Parisian middle life, and with due allowance for the caricature to which comic novelists are subject, is famous for the truth and humour of his portraits, for the vivacity of his incidents and dialogue, for a certain Voltairian turn in his style, an abundance of sense, of good nature, and now and then no little pathos. Two of his best novels have been made known to the English public by the excellent translations, entitled Andrew the Savoyard, and the Modern Cymon. The novel of which we here give an abstract is not one of his best; but it happened to be near at hand, and the author writes nothing which does not contain amusement and character; as the reader will see by our sketch. Madame Moutonnet, who persuades her husband she is "a fine woman," because she is large, and who is jealous of him though she never loved him—the little old clerk who has been trained into slavery without being reconciled to it, and who is tricked out of his involuntary coach and dollar—and the grand but mortified Monsieur Dupont, with his double watch-chain and his eyes a-top of his head, who is so astonished to find out that his wife loves him, and breaks his neck to return to her, are all portraits after general, as well as Parisian, life, though strongly and amusingly marked with the characteristics of their own country.

M. Eustache Moutonnet was a rich laceman of the Rue Saint-Martin. He was a man much esteemed in his business, for he had never let his bills be protested, or failed in his engagements. For thirty years that he had been in business, he had regularly attended to his concern from eight o'clock in the morning till eight o'clock at night. He kept the day-book and ledger himself; Madame Moutonnet carried on the correspondence out of doors, and transacted business with the dealers; the shop and till were confided to the care of Mademoiselle Eugénie Moutonnet.

M. Moutonnet, notwithstanding the grandeur of his position, could not be said to command in his own house; his wife ruled, ordered, and disposed of every thing. When she was in a good humour (a rare occurrence) she would allow her husband to go and take his cup of coffee, provided that he went to the coffee-house at the corner of la Rue Mauconill, because there they gave plenty of sugar with their coffee, and M. Moutonnet always brought home three lumps to his wife.

This regulated life did not prevent our portly laceman from finding himself the happiest of men; so true is it, that 'what is one man's meat, is another man's poison.' Moutonnet was a man of simple, peaceable tastes, and, like a child, it was necessary to his happiness to be led.

Madame Moutonnet was past forty; but she had made up her mind to stop the encroachments of time at thirty-six. Madame Moutonnet was never pretty, but, being a large woman, she had persuaded Moutonnet that he had a very fine woman for his wife. She was no coquette, but she desired to bear the bell for wit and beauty. She had never loved her husband; but would have torn out his eyes had he ever dared to prove unfaithful. Madame Moutonnet was very jealous of her rights. In fact she herself was a very "dragon of virtue." The fruit of this convenient union of domination and docility, was one pretty, unaffected, sensible, and tender-hearted girl, eighteen years of age at the commencement of our story, fond of her father and afraid of her mother. A kindly, stout young woman, named Jeanne, and Bidois, an old clerk, completed the domestic establishment of the Moutonnetts.

One day, at dinner, when Moutonnet was plying his knife and fork with vigor, that he might return presently to his ledger, Madame Moutonnet, "assuming an air almost amiable," said to her husband, "Monsieur Moutonnet, to-morrow is the day of Saint Eustache." "No! really!" said the laceman, trying to seem astonished, though for eight days past he had kept a strict watch upon the barometer, to see if the weather promised to be fine on his name-day. "Are we so near the 20th?" "Yes, sir, to-day is the 19th of September." "You are right, my dear." "I never forget that day, sir." "You are very good, Madame Moutonnet; and you know I never forget Saint Eustache;—dear heart!" "We are not talking at present of Saint Eustache, sir, but of Saint Eustache, which we shall keep to-morrow." "You are right, my dear." "I have arranged a little pic-nic party for the Wood of Romainville; does that suit you, sir?" "How, my dear? suit me! I am delighted!—the Wood of Romainville, you know, I was always fond of!"

"We are not talking of lovers, Monsieur Moutonnet; you are always so foolish!" "My dear, it is the fault of Saint Eustache now." "Recollect yourself, sir; and a severe look made M. Moutonnet comprehend that his daughter sat next him, and could understand all he said upon such forbidden subjects; and so the good man was silent, and his wife continued:—"I have invited a good deal of company for to-morrow, and I have endeavoured to make a good choice among our acquaintance. I think you will be satisfied with my choice." "My dear, you know that I always am!" "Let me speak, M. Moutonnet; if you interrupt me so every instant, we shall never have done." "You are right, my dear." "Let us see who will be there.—First, there will be we three, and Bidois: I shall not take Jeanne, because I do not wish to leave the house empty; I should not be easy. M. Bidois will carry the baskets; besides, you know, it amuses him." "Yes, ma'am," said the old clerk, forcing a smile to hide the face he could not help making at the notion of carrying the baskets. "I warn you, Monsieur Bidois, that they will perhaps be a little heavy to-morrow, for we shall be a great many, and, except bread and wine, which we shall get at the guard-house, we shall take every thing with us,—but, you are strong, you are active." "And I shall be able to relieve you too, sometimes," said M. Moutonnet. "Not at all, sir," said Madame; "I do not intend that; I do not wish you to tire yourself in the morning; by evening you would be good for nothing." "You are right, my dear." "Well, then, return to our company: we shall have M. Bernard, the toyman, and his wife, their daughter Mimi, and their little clerk, Estève. Monsieur Bernard is a very agreeable man, full of wit and gaiety. When he is in company, he sets every thing going, and that is what we shall want; if we had no one but you, Monsieur Moutonnet, to amuse the company!"—"Hut, my dear, it appears to me—" "Hush! I am going on: Madame Bernard is far from having her husband's spirit, though she has plenty of pretension, and is for ever putting in her word."

In addition to these, M. Gerard, a perfumer, his wife, his sister, and little boy came to the pic-nic; and M. Dupont and M. Adolphe Dalville, a clerk in a neighbouring linendraper's, are introduced, to enlarge the party beyond the fatal number of thirteen.

M. Dupont was a flourishing grocer, about forty years of age, living in the Rue aux Ours. He wore a queue and powder, because he thought it became him, and because his periquier told him that it gave him an air of distinction. His sky-blue coat and yellow waistcoat gave him a sort of fantastical appearance that quite agreed with the astonished expression of his eyes at the top of his head. He caressed with complacency two watch-chains that hung at his waist-band, and every word he spoke was listened to attentively; he believed himself seducing and witty, having all the self-sufficiency of folly supported by riches; in fine, he was a bachelor of great importance to all who had daughters to marry.

The day is fine, and the pic-nic prospers by favour of the relaxed severity of Madame Moutonnet. The first thing proposed upon entering the wood is a game at hide-and-seek. Eugénie Moutonnet and Adolphe Dalville have some time regarded each other with an eye of inclination, though the vigilance and austerity of the lady's mother have prevented any familiar intercourse. The opportunities of hide-and-seek however enable them to avow a mutual passion, and swear eternal constancy. After dinner, during which Madame Moutonnet is incensed against her husband for attempting to carve a fowl, and quarrels with the toyman's wife who assists him, the younger part of the company join a village dance. The spirited toyman, something exalted by drinking, provokes the villagers to thrash him. This unpleasant circumstance draws upon him the displeasure of Madame Moutonnet, already angered against his wife, and she is at last enraged to that degree, that a total breach takes place between the families. A storm separates the remaining company into two parties, and the Moutonnet family with young Dalville seek shelter at a coffee-house. Adolphe goes out to find a coach, and Bidois is sent out soon after to assist in the search; Dalville however, with great zeal, succeeds in finding one first, and he and the Moutonnetts leave the inn, without waiting for Bidois, and, to the great chagrin of the coffee-house keeper, without taking anything; for Madame Moutonnet thought it would be superfluous to do so. Meantime Bidois returns unsuccessful, sheltered, as to his head, by one of the empty baskets. After dinner he had manoeuvred so skillfully as to achieve the loss of the other with some bottles, part of the remains of dinner. Some turkey, and other broken viands are in his pockets, for Madame Moutonnet would have nothing left behind if she knew it. "Where are my friends?" said he, replacing the basket under his arm. "They went away in a coach," said the master of the coffee-house, with a sneer. "Gone—in a coach!—without me!" "They called you. Is not your name Bellois?" "Bidois, if you please." "Bidois, Bellois,—it's the same thing." "No Sir, it's a very different thing." "Well—however, they have gone without you, finding you did not come back." "Gone without me!—let me return on foot in such weather, when I have broken my back all day with carrying their dinners!—Madame Bernard was right in calling Madame Moutonnet a tyrant!" "They can't have got far," said the coffee-house keeper, "and if you run, I dare say you will catch them at the barrier; it was a yellow coach." "Do you think so—Let us see." And Bidois ran out of the coffee-house.

"At length, having passed the barrier, the old clerk sees a hackney coach. 'I see it!' he cried, 'I shall have some rest now; keep it up!' the sight of the coach redoubles his vigour. He jumps forward, running haphazard among the brooks and marshes into which the road-way turned, to the great detriment of his stockings. He overtakes the coach; and it is a yellow one. 'Stop, stop!' cried Bidois, running by the side of the coach, in a voice choked with exhaustion. The coachman, thinking some one was making game of him, paid no attention. 'Will you stop?' cried Bidois, again; 'you have got some people who were waiting for me, and I will give you something to drink.' 'Ah! that's another thing—if they are your acquaintance—' said the coachman, stopping his horses; 'so get up, master.' Bidois did not want this invitation repeated; directly the coach stopped, he ran and opened the door. A cry issued from within. Ah! my God! it is my husband!" said a strange voice. "Her husband!" cried a man; 'quick let us be off!' The opposite door is opened, and the gentleman fled, leaving behind him his hat; while the lady saved herself at the expense of her shawl, her gloves, and her handkerchief, leaving Bidois dismayed upon the steps. 'Hullo! what does this mean, old fellow?' cried the coachman, surprised to see his passengers off in such a hurry. 'Hey! Parbleu!' responded Bidois, 'it means that bad luck follows me every where.—I was mistaken, your passengers were none of my friends.' 'Oh, very well! you're a pretty humbug to play me such a game as this.' 'How do you mean? humbug!—do you think I did it for the pleasure of it?' 'Indeed I do, my man. But, you see, it can't pass in this way. You have frightened the two fares I was carrying, so that they have taken to their heels; but I can't do without my money. Its no use your speaking; I took them up at the pavilion Français, and as that is outside the barrier, they were to give me a dollar; so, now then, you must give me a dollar.' 'I give you a dollar?' 'Yes, my fine fellow, if it's agreeable to ye.' 'Nonsense! you are joking. Why should I pay the fare for people I know nothing about?' 'We are not talking about whys and wherefores; you have made my passengers run away, and you must pay me my fare, or we shall see.' The coachman, fearing that Bidois would run away too, jumped from his box; but the old clerk had no strength left for running, and he quietly suffered himself to be seized by the arm. 'Come, pay us, and have done with it.' 'I will not pay,' said Bidois, with an air of decision; 'for I owe you nothing.' 'Very well! then! let us go back to the guard of the barrier, and there we'll make you understand sense, my little man.' Saying this, the coachman backed his coach, and took Bidois before the clerk of the barrier. 'But,' said Bidois, to the coachman, 'you can pay yourself, for they have left some things in the coach.' 'Do you take me for a pick-pocket? I shall go and give those up to the prefecture.' 'I'll undertake that no one will come to reclaim them.' 'That's no business of mine. What right have you to put people out in this way with your basket cap? I don't wonder you frightened them; they must have taken you for the devil.'

"There was a general laugh at the piteous appearance of Bidois when he heard himself condemned to pay. In rummaging his pocket for his purse, he let fall the remains of the turkey, which he had taken from the basket when he put it on his head. This added to the gaiety of the bystanders. 'It seems the gentleman does not lose any thing when he dines at the eating-house,' said the clerk of the barrier, laughing. 'Sir, that is my affair,' said Bidois, peevishly, putting the bird back into his pocket, 'don't you go and make me pay duty for this turkey's leg.' 'No, Sir, turkeys don't pay duty.' 'That's lucky. Come, coachman, if I pay, I hope at least I may ride.' 'That's all fair.' 'Where were you taking that gentleman and lady to?' 'I was to set them down at the Boulevard du Temple.' 'Very well; you shall set me down at the Porte St. Martin.' 'That will do, come along.' They leave the barrier to go to the coach. It still rained, and Bidois said to himself, 'At least, if I do pay dear for it, I can stretch myself at my ease, and sleep to the Porte Saint-Martin.' Poor Bidois! It was doubtless written in the book of fate that he was not to reach Paris in a coach. Before they had got to where the coach stood, four officers, quicker than the old clerk, came up, opened the door of the coach, and jumped in, exclaiming, 'At last we have found one! this is not bad!' 'What the devil now,' cried Bidois, running to the door, 'they have found one, have they? Very pretty, upon my honour,—stop a moment—Gentlemen, gentlemen,—getting on the steps—this coach has been waiting here an hour—for me.' 'I have no pence, old man,' said one of the officers, taking Bidois for the waterman; which was excusable, seeing how the storm had deranged his dress. 'Another time,' and he pushed him away roughly, shutting the door.

* In France it is the custom, instead of the day on which a person is born, to keep that of the saint whose name they bear.

'One moment, gentlemen! What do you take me for,' cried Bidois, trying to seize the door; 'I am a citizen of Paris; I have engaged this coach, and I have paid for it, and it is mine; you cannot take it.' 'You see we can, for we are in it,' 'You must get out, gentlemen. Coachman! explain it to the gentlemen.' The coachman, enchanted to have got another fare, contented himself with mounting his box without answering poor Bidois, who ran backwards and forwards from the coachman to the door. 'This old fool will stun us with his noise,' said one of the officers. 'Gentlemen, you must get out of my coach.' 'What, give up the coach to you? My fine fellow, if do I get out, it will be to crop your ears. Come, coachman, we are in a hurry, and can't stay listening to this drunken fellow!' 'All right, sir.' And the coachman applied the whip to his cattle. Bidois went and sat down on a post, viewing with an air of consternation, the coach which had taken his dollar, and left him in the middle of the street. At last he got home, and went to bed without a light, lest in getting one he should be stopped by Madame Moutonnet, still to do something more.

Adolphe and Eugenie had sworn eternal fidelity. Their vows, however, did not preserve Adolphe (who is a sort of Tom Jones,) from the perseverance of a young dancer, nor Eugenie from maternal tyranny. One morning, Madame Moutonnet came into her daughter's room, and informed her that M. Dupont was to breakfast with them, desiring her to pay particular attention to her toilette. The foreboding girl dresses slowly, delaying as long as possible her appearance in the breakfast-room. At length she dares delay no longer. Her parents and M. Dupont are already there. "'Come in, my child,' said Madame Moutonnet, perceiving Eugenie trembling at the door; 'Come in. M. Dupont, go and give her your hand.' 'You are right, you are right,' said M. Dupont, leaping to Eugenie, 'that is what I was going to do, when I saw Mademoiselle.' The grocer conducted Eugenie to a chair. She seated herself without saying a word; but the frequent swelling of her bosom shewed that she awaited with anxiety the result of this conference. Meantime her papa, who seemed to wish to say something, but did not dare to break into the conversation, contented himself with coughing in different tones, and taking frequent pinches of snuff. Breakfast is served. Then rain is talked of, then the fine weather, and then the trade of grocery; a part of the conversation in which Dupont makes a figure, taking occasion to make good use of brown sugar and pepper, and mixing it liberally with his discourse. At length Madame Moutonnet made a sign to her husband to keep silence, and addressed Eugenie: 'My child, you are now eighteen years of age, and your education is completed; you know the duties of a counter, and, thanks to my example, I think you understand the management of a home.' 'Yes, certainly,' said M. Moutonnet; 'she is quite able to manage.'—Hush! silence, if you please Monsieur Moutonnet. I early inculcated in you principles of virtue and wisdom, which'—'Madame,' said Bidois, (whose curiosity is excited by the appearance of mystery,) putting his head into the room, 'I cannot exactly make up M. Dupont's account.' 'That will do, that will do, Bidois; we are busy; I will look at it by-and-bye.' 'Oh, very well.' Bidois went away against his will; but he had had time to see every body there, and that was something; upon these premises he could employ himself in making conjectures. 'In short, my child,' continued Madame Moutonnet, 'thanks to my care, you are in a condition to marry, and you will prove yourself worthy of your mother.'—'Yes, my love, she will be worthy of you,' said M. Moutonnet; 'I always'—'Will you be silent, Monsieur Moutonnet? will you let me speak? I never saw you so talkative!—Nevertheless, my child, we should not yet perhaps have thought of marrying you. Seeing your youth, we should doubtless have waited some years, if a brilliant and a solid offer had not been made for you.' Dupont, finding that he was now brought upon the carpet, rocked and fidgeted himself on his chair, turned his eyes about after the most agreeable fashion he could, playing all the while with the chains and trinkets of his two watches. 'Yes, my child, a brilliant offer has been made for you. The person who seeks you in marriage has every right to your affections.' Here Dupont rose, and bowed to Madame Moutonnet. 'A man who joins to an agreeable exterior—(Dupont rises and bows)—those qualities which are essential to render a woman happy!—(Another standing bow from Dupont)—A man of an age befitting a husband; a man who wishes to make you happy, who loves you tenderly; who is rich, very rich; and, what is more, economical, and perfectly versed in business.'—All this while Dupont does nothing but stand up and bow.—'A man, in short, in whom I know no defect.'—Here Dupont, sitting down too suddenly, rolled on to the floor. Bidois, hearing a noise, pretended that he thought he was called. He assisted the grocer to regain his seat; and the future bridegroom, to avoid the like accident, determined to hear Madame Moutonnet to an end, quietly on his chair. 'In fine, my child,' continued Madame Moutonnet, when the storm was over, 'in the portrait which I have drawn, I do not doubt you will recognise Monsieur Dupont, our sincere friend;—well, you are not deceived; it is he who has asked your hand, and it is he to whom we have determined to marry you.' The result of this discourse is a fainting fit on the part of the poor girl, who endeavours to avert her calamity in vain. Nor is Adolphe, who makes a frantic appeal to Madame Moutonnet, more successful; he is dismissed, and Eugenie locked up in her chamber. The wedding-day approaches. 'M. Dupont had already made his purchases. He had bought the wedding present, into which he insisted on thrusting some packets of Bayonne chocolate, and pâté de guimauve. Eight days beforehand he ordered an entire suit of clothes for himself; he engaged his perquiquier to invent something new for his head; he purchased some new trinkets for his watches, which, with the old ones, made such a noise, that he could be heard a hundred yards off, so that every one drew out of his way, thinking that it was a horse with bells. M. Dupont was enchanted at making such a sensation, and he smiled at all the world, and all the world smiled at him.' He engages more rooms over the shop he occupies, to enlarge his apartment; and takes into his service Jeanneton, who has been dismissed by Madame Moutonnet, being suspected, with reason, of favouring the younger lover. Jeanneton has the address to persuade Dupont, that she has left her place for the sake of following her young mistress. At length, the wedding-day has positively come. 'From five o'clock in the morning Dupont was beside himself; he had bathed and scrubbed himself nobly, and settled his head-dress. He walked up and down, from room to room, all about his lodging; he ran backwards and forwards between his shop and his looking-glass, now calling upon Jeanneton, now upon his shop-boys, to assist him at the one or the other; for the first time in his life, perhaps, he forgot the price of sugar and coffee. What with going and coming, and running about, the grocer managed to get over the time, till it became necessary for him to put on his new suit; black coat, waistcoat, and small clothes, white silk stockings and buckled shoes. Dupont spread them all out before him, and stood for an instant in admiration. 'Decidedly there is nothing wanting,' said he, applying himself to the duty of putting them on. The coat and waistcoat do very well, but the small-clothes are rather tight. 'Deuce!' said Dupont kicking to stretch them a bit, 'they pinch a little. My knees feel as if they were held in a vice! Certainly, they set all the better for it; not a fold; they fit like a glove!' The grocer calls Jeanneton and his apprentices. 'How am I?' 'Superb, sir.' 'And the cut?' 'Admirable.' 'You seem to have a little difficulty in walking, sir,' said Jeanneton. 'Ah! that is my small-clothes; but I hope they will be better when I have worn them a little; besides, I have no other black ones, and one can't be married in yellow small-clothes. But, they suit me, don't they?' 'Admirably, sir.' 'Well, I am ready. Let's be off—my gloves!—my hat!—nosegay?—Are the three glass coaches at the door?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Have the coachmen nossegays?' 'Yes, sir.' 'That's right.' Do they give them to the horses.' 'Not commonly; but if you wish it, sir, some can be fastened to their ears.' 'Let 'em; it will be more handsome, more brilliant. Faith, one is not married every day, and I wish my marriage to be talked of—Joseph, run and buy some branches of orange flowers, and have them put to the horses' heads.' 'Yes, sir; and to their tails!' 'A bunch of amaranths to each tail. I like to do things in grand style.'—

Dupont is married to Eugenie. Meantime Adolphe has heard that his father is sick. He hastens to him, and finds him in a consumption. At length the disease approaches a crisis, and Adolphe watches over him with the tenderest care. One night M. Dalville, feeling easier, persuades his son to seek a few hours repose. Long watching and exhaustion threw Adolphe into a profound sleep, which lasted till late in the following day. What is his astonishment on waking to find his father's hand in his, but cold, and motionless. The father has come to die by his sleeping son. Having buried his father, he returns to Paris, where the news of Eugenie's marriage drives him to despair. Soon after, he hears news of an uncle who has died abroad, and left him a large fortune. In acts of benevolence, and new affections, he strives to forget his first love. Eugenie, though married to Dupont, and living in his house, insists upon being her own mistress, and, with Jeanneton's assistance, who had already procured her a separate apartment, manages to preserve her fidelity to Adolphe, till the unexpected sight of her early lover throws her into a dangerous illness. Dupont studies in vain to please her; and when at length her illness postpones his hopes sine die, he sets off on business to Marseilles. Eugenie recovers, and chances to see Adolphe escorting, with unequivocal assiduity, another lady, to whom in fact he was about to be married. This works such a change in her sentiments, that she writes a kind letter to call home her well-meaning, though troublesome husband. 'My wife! a letter from my wife!' cried the grocer, 'what can that mean? She must be at the point of death!' He reads, and his astonishment increases at every word. 'Hereafter you will find in me a submissive wife.'—'Good heaven! Is it possible! How reflecting! A "submissive wife!" Ah! it is absence that has done this. My wife adores me, now she sees me no longer. Poor little dear!—A submissive wife!' Dupont is intoxicated; he jumps up, and runs like a madman to his landlady, tells her to pack up, and then flies to the post-house, where he arrives panting and blowing. 'Quick! quick!' cried he, 'I want some horses, a coach, postillions!'—'Where is the gentleman going?' 'To Paris.' 'When does Monsieur wish to set out?' 'Instantly; my wife is waiting for me. What is the quickest mode of travelling?' 'Faith, sir, going post is as quick as any.' 'Post! Very good; I go post.' 'Will you take a chaise?'

'A chaise! two if it is necessary.' 'How many horses?' 'How many can you put to?' 'Two, three, or four, as you like.' 'I'll have five then; and you had better put them all one before the other, that they may run the faster.' 'It would be impossible to drive them, sir.' 'Put them all abreast, then.' 'Why, sir, then we could not fasten them to the coach.' 'Well, put them how you like; I don't care how they go, provided they go like the wind.' 'Will you have two postillions?' 'Three, and a courier to go before. My wife is waiting for me, and I am in haste.' The chaise, postillions, courier, all come to the door. He jumps in. Such an extraordinary turn-out puzzles the neighbours. 'Is it a prince incognito? an ambassador? a general? or any other great man?'—'Who is it, postillions?' They answer, 'It is a wholesale grocer going to his wife.' Dupont pays like a prince, and his courier announces his arrival at the inns with great importance. The innkeepers make great preparations. Fires crackle, spits turn, all the saucepans are on the stoves, and the scullions at their places; the servants hasten to prepare a room for the illustrious traveller. A man who has a courier does not dine at the common table, and, as he does not stop the night, they must repay themselves for it in the dinner-bill. The sound of horses and whips announces the arrival of the great man. The master, cap in hand, goes out to receive him. The maids adjust their dress, the ostlers quit their horses, the travellers fill the windows from the top to the bottom of the house, the peasants and idlers of the town flock about the gate. Dupont alights, and his unmaiestic figure surprises the assembled gazers. He insists on taking a hasty snack in the outer room. 'If, my lord—Monsieur—your greatness, would go into the inner room, where there is a dinner laid out.' 'No occasion for so much trouble, my dear sir, I am very well here.' 'Will Monsieur dine?' 'Why, I am hungry. The coach has jolted me exceedingly, and that gives one an appetite. I think I should like a morsel of something.' 'The dinner of Monsieur the traveller is prepared.' 'Ah! Parbleu! There is no occasion for this ceremony. Let me have a plate of potatoes and a bit of Gruyere cheese, with half a bottle of wine.'—'How, sir?' 'I ask you for a plate of potatoes, and some Gruyere, — but let it be good; for I understand it; if you have not not got any good, I can send you some famous cheese.' At length the speed at which he travels, breaks down the coach. A bright idea strikes him. His courier is always in advance; therefore horseback is quicker travelling than riding in a coach. He buys his courier's horse, boots, spurs, and whip; and half citizen, half courier, pursues his uxorious race to Paris. He finds horseback not so easy as he took it to be, and can scarcely keep his seat. He soon loses a boot, then another, and at last poor Dupont and his horse jump down a quarry. This is a more tragical ending to the farce than the good-natured eccentric deserves. It serves, however, to free Eugenie, who is, a year after, united to Adolphe Dalville, whose half-and-half attentions had disgusted his other mistress so much, that he obtained the dismissal he had already wished. Madame Moutonnet is charmed at her daughter's marrying a man of fortune; and Bidois becomes his steward, and teaches his tenants arithmetic.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

IV.—THE TRAGEDY OF GUERNSEY.

THE tragical history which we give in our present number, has not so fixed and intense an air with it as the two in our last, but it is so very dramatic, that if Fate could be supposed to have an eye to such results, we could fancy the circumstances to have taken place, purely in order that they might give a lesson from the stage. In truth, they have been dramatised more than once, and, we believe, more than once told otherwise; but the following is the best account of the story we have met with. It is (with little variation) by the same author as furnished us with the case of Mr. Barnard and the Duke of Marlborough. We shall speak of him by and bye;—he was a sort of mystery himself.

John Andrew Gordier, a respectable and wealthy inhabitant of Jersey in the early part of the eighteenth century, had, for several years, paid his addresses to an accomplished and beautiful young woman, a native of the island of Guernsey; and having surmounted the usual difficulties and delays of love, which always increase the value of the object in pursuit, the happy day for leading his mistress to the altar at length was fixed. After giving the necessary orders for the reception of his intended wife, Gordier, at the time appointed, in full health and high spirits, sailed for Guernsey. The impatience of a lover on such a voyage need not be described; hours were years, and a narrow channel between the islands, ten thousand leagues. The land of promise at length appears, he leaps on the beach, and without waiting for refreshment, or his servant, whom he left with his baggage, sets out alone, and on foot, for the house he had so often visited, which was only a few miles from the port. The servant, who soon followed, was surprised to find his master not arrived; repeated messengers were sent to search and enquire, in vain. Having waited in anxious expectation till midnight, the apprehensions of the lady and her family were proportionate to the urgency of their feelings, and the circumstance of the case.

The next morning, at break of day, the appearance of a near relation of the missing man, was not calculated to diminish their fears. With evident marks of distress, fatigue, and dejection, he came to inform them that he had passed the whole of the night in minutely examining, and in every direction, the environs of the road by which Gordier generally passed.—After days of dreadful suspense, and nights of unavailing anxiety, the corpse of the unfortunate lover was at length discovered in a cavity among the rocks, disfigured with many wounds; but no circumstance occurred on which to ground suspicion, or, even to hazard conjecture against the perpetrator of so foul a murder. The regret of both families for a good young man thus cut off in meridian of life and expectation, by a cruel assassin, was increased by the mystery and mode of his death. The grief of the young lady not being of that species, which relieves itself by shew and exclamation, was, for that very reason, the more poignant and heartfelt; she was never seen to shed a tear, but doubled the pity for her fate by an affecting patience. Her virtues and her beauty having attracted general admiration, the family, after a few years, was prevailed on to permit Mr. Galliard, a merchant and native of the island, to become her suitor, hoping that a second lover might gradually withdraw her attention from brooding in hopeless silence over the catastrophe of her first. In submission to the wishes of her parents but with repeated and energetic declarations that she never would marry, Galliard was occasionally admitted; but the unhappy lady, probably from thinking it not very delicate or feeling in relation of her murdered lover to address her, found it difficult to suppress a certain antipathy, which she felt whenever he approached. It was possible also, that, although hardly known to herself, she might have entertained a worse suspicion. At all events, the singular but well-authenticated circumstance of her antipathy was often remarked, long before the secret was revealed; it was a more than mental aversion, and was said to bear a near resemblance to that tremulous horror and shivering, which seizes certain persons of keen sensibility and delicate feelings at the sight of some venomous creature, abhorrent far their own nature and likeness. But such was the ardour of passion, or such the fascinating magic of her charms, repulse only increased desire, and Galliard persisted in his unwelcome visits. Sometimes he endeavoured to prevail on the unfortunate young woman to accept a present from his hands. Her friends remarked that he was particularly urgent to present her with a beautiful trinket, of expensive workmanship and valuable materials, which she pointedly refused, adding, that it would be worse than improper in her to encourage attentions and receive favours from a man, who excited in her mind sensations far stranger than indifference, and whose offers no motive of any kind could prevail on her to accept.

But Galliard, by the earnestness of his addresses, by his assiduities, and by exciting pity, the common resource of the artful, had won over the mother of the lady to second his wishes. In her desire to forward his suit, she had taken an opportunity, during the night, to fix the trinket in question on to her daughter's watch-chain, and forbade her, on pain of her displeasure, to remove this token of unaccepted affection.

The health of the lovely mourner suffered in the conflict; and the mother of the murdered man, who had ever regarded her intended daughter-in-law with tenderness and affection, crossed the sea which divided Jersey from Guernsey to visit her. The sight of one so nearly related to her first, her only love, naturally called forth ten thousand melancholy ideas in her mind. She seemed to take pleasure in recounting to the old lady, many little incidents which lovers only consider as important. Mrs. Gordier was also fond of enquiring into and listening to every minute particular, which related to the last interviews of her son with his mistress.

It was on one of these occasions that their conversation reverted, as usual, to the melancholy topic; and the sad retrospect so powerfully affected the young lady, whose health was already much impaired, that she sunk in convulsions on the floor. During the alarm of the unhappy family, who were conveying her to bed, their terror was considerably increased by observing that the eyes of Mrs. Gordier, were fearfully caught by the glittering appendage to the lady's watch; that well-known token of her son's affection, which, with a loud voice, and altered countenance she declared he had purchased as a gift for his mistress, previously to his quitting Guernsey. With a dreadful look, in which horror, indignation, wonder, and suspicion were mingled, she repeated the extraordinary circumstance, as well as the agitated state of her mind would permit, to the unhappy young lady, during the interval of a short recovery.

The moment the poor sufferer understood that the jewel she had hitherto so much despired, was originally in the possession of Gordier, the intelligence seemed to pour a flood of new horror on her mind; she made a last effort to press the appendage to her heart; her eyes, for a moment, exhibited the wild stare of madness, stung as she was to its highest pitch by the horrible conviction; and crying out, "Oh, murderous villain!" she expired in the arms of the by-standers.

It is hardly necessary further to unfold the circumstances of this mysterious assassination; Gordier, in his way from the port to his mistress's house, had been clearly way-laid by Galliard, murdered and plundered of the trinket, in the hope that after his death he might succeed to the possession of a jewel far more precious.

Galliard, being charged with the crime, boldly denied it, but with evident confusion and equivocation; and while the injured family were sending for the officers of justice, he confirmed all their suspicions by suicide, and by a violent-tempered letter of confession.

V. VI. TWO STORIES OF REVERSION, CLERICAL AND FISCAL.

We add the following by way of farces after our Tragedy.

He who has been half his life (quoth our authority) an attendant at levees, on the faith of an election promise, a watering-place squeeze of the hand, or a race-ground oath; or, he, who vegetating on a fellowship, with vows long plighted to some much loved fair, is waiting, or watching, or wishing for, the death of a hale rector, at fifty-four; may, perhaps, be interested or amused by the following little narrative, the merry catastrophe of which took place at the time recorded.—The incumbent of a valuable living in a western county, had for some years awakened the hopes and excited the fears of the members of a certain college, in whom the next presentation was vested; the old gentleman having already outlived two of his proposed successors. The tranquil pleasures of the common room had very lately been interrupted or animated by a well-authenticated account of the worthy clergyman's being seized with a violent and dangerous disease, sufficient, without medical aid, to hurry him to his grave. The senior fellow, who, on the strength of his contingency, had only the day before declined an advantageous offer, was congratulated on the fairness of his prospects, and the after dinner conversation passed off without that uninteresting nonchalance for which it was generally remarkable.

The pears, the port wine, and the chesnuts being quickly dispatched, the gentleman alluded to hurried to his room; he ascended the stairs, tripped along the gallery, and stirred his almost extinguished fire with unusual alacrity; then drawing from his portfolio a letter to his mistress, which, for want of knowing exactly what to say, had been for several weeks unfinished, he filled the unoccupied space with renewed protestations of undiminished love; and he spoke with raptures (raptures rather assumed than actually felt, after a sixteen years' courtship) of the near approach of that time, when a competent independence would put it into his power to taste that first of earthly blessings, nuptial love, without the alloy of uncertain support. He concluded a letter, more agreeable to the lady than any she had ever received from him, with delineating his future plans, and suggesting a few alterations in the parsonage-house, which, though not a modern building, was substantial, and in excellent repair; thanks to the conscientious and scrupulous care of his predecessor, in a particular, to which, he observed, so many of the clergy were culpably inattentive.—The letter was sent to the post, and after a third rubber at the warden's (who observed that he never saw Mr. * * * so facetious), a poached egg, and a rummer of hot punch, the happy man retired to bed in the calm tranquillity of long delayed hope, treading on the threshold of immediate gratification.

Patiently at first, and then impatiently, waited he several posts, without receiving further intelligence, and filled up the interval as well as he could in settling his accounts as bursar; * getting in the few bills he owed, and revising his books; which, as the distance was considerable, he resolved to view before he left the university. Considering himself now as a married man, he thought it a piece of necessary attention to his wife, to supply the place of the volumes he disposed of, by some of the miscellaneous productions of modern literature, more immediately calculated for female perusal.

At the end of three weeks, a space of time, as long as any man of common feelings could be expected to abstain from enquiry; after being repeatedly assured by his college associates that the incumbent must be dead, but that the letter announcing it had miscarried, and being positively certain of it himself, he took pen in hand, but not knowing any person in the neighbourhood of the living, which he hoped so soon to take possession of, he was for some time at a loss to whom he should venture to write on so important a subject.

In the restlessness of anxious expectation, and irritated by the stimulants of love and money—in a desperate and indecorous moment, he addressed a letter officially to the clerk of the pariah, not knowing his name. This epistle commenced with taking it for granted that his principal was dead; but informing him, that the college had received no intelligence of it, a circumstance which they imputed to the miscarriage of a letter; but they begged to know, and if possible by return of post, the day and hour on which he departed; if, contrary to all expectation and probability, he should be still alive, the clerk was in that case desired to send without delay, a particular and minute account of the state of his health, the nature of his late complaint, its apparent effects upon his constitution, and any other circumstance he might think at all connected with the life of the incumbent.

On receiving the letter, the ecclesiastic subaltern immediately carried it to the rector's, who, to the infinite satisfaction of his parishioners, had recovered from a most dangerous disease, and was, at the moment, entertaining a circle of friends at his hospitable board, who celebrated his recovery in bumpers.

After carrying his eye over it in a cursory way, he smiled, read it to the company, and, with their permission, replied to it himself, in the following manner:

* Treasurer of the college.

"S—e, November 1, 1736.

"Sir—My clerk being a very mean scribe, at his request I now answer the several queries in your letter directed to him.

"My disorder was an acute fever, under which I laboured for a month, attended with a delirium during ten days of the time, and originally contracted, as I have good reason for thinking, by my walking four miles in the middle of a very hot day in July.

"From this complaint, I am perfectly recovered by the blessing of God, and the prescriptions of my son, a doctor of physic; and I have officiated both in the church, and at funerals in the church-yard, which is about three hundred yards from my house. The report of my relapse was probably occasioned by my having a slight complaint about three weeks ago; but which did not confine me.

"As to the present state of my health, my appetite, digestion, and sleep are good, and in some respects, better than before my illness, particularly the steadiness of my hands. I never use spectacles, and I thank God, I can read the smallest print by candle light; nor have I ever had reason to think that the seeds of the gout, the rheumatism, or any chronic disease, are in my constitution.

"Although I entered on my eighty-first year the second of last March, the greatest inconvenience I feel from old age is a little defect in my hearing and memory. These are mercies, which, as they render the remaining dregs of life tolerably comfortable, I desire with all humility and gratitude to acknowledge; and I heartily pray that they may descend, with all other blessings, to my successor, whenever it shall please God to call me. I am, sir, your unknown humble servant,

R— W—."

"P. S. My clerk's name is Robert D—: your letter cost him four-pence, to the foot post who brings it from S—e."

Such an epistle, from so good and excellent a character, and under such circumstances, could not fail producing unpleasant sensations in the breast of the receiver, who was not without many good qualities, and, except in this one occasion (for which love and port must be his excuse) did not appear to be deficient in feeling and propriety of conduct.

The purpose of this article will be fully and effectually answered, if fellows of colleges, and expectants of fat livings, valuable sinecures, and rich reversions, may happily be taught to check the indecorous ardour of eager hope; lest they meet with the rebuff given by an old Nottinghamshire vicar, whose health was more robust, and manners less courteous than those of the Dorsetshire clergyman.

This testy old gentleman, after recovering from a short illness, was exasperated by invidious, often repeated, and selfish inquiries after his health; and in the heat of irritation, ordered a placard with the following words, to be affixed to the chapel door of the college, to which the vicarage belonged:—

"To the Fellows of * * * * College.

"Gentlemen,—In answer to the very civil and very intelligible inquiries which you have of late so assiduously made into the state of my health, I have the pleasure to inform you that I never was better in my life; and as I have made up my mind on the folly of dying to please other people, I am resolved to live as long as I am able for my own sake. To prevent your being at any unnecessary trouble and expense in future on the subject, I have directed my apothecary to give you a line, in case there should be any probability of a vacancy: and am, your humble servant,

*****"

A laughable story was circulated during the administration of the old duke of Newcastle,* and retailed to the public in various forms. This nobleman, with many good points, and described by a popular contemporary poet, as almost eaten up by his zeal for the House of Hanover, was remarkable for being profuse of his promises on all occasions, and valued himself particularly on being able to anticipate the words or the wants of the various persons who attended his levees, before they uttered a syllable. This weakness sometimes led him into ridiculous mistakes and absurd embarrassments; but it was his passion to lavish promises, which gave occasion for the anecdote about to be related.

At the election for a certain borough in Cornwall, where the ministerial and opposition interests were almost equally poised, a single vote was of the highest importance; this object the duke, by certain well-applied arguments, by the force of urgent perseverance, and personal application, at length attained, and the gentleman recommended by the treasury, gained his election.

In the warmth of gratitude for so signal a triumph, and in a quarter where the minister had generally experienced defeat and disappointment, his Grace poured forth acknowledgments and promises, without ceasing, on the fortunate possessor of the casting vote; called him his best and dearest friend; protested that he should consider himself as ever indebted to him; that he could never do enough for him; that he would serve him by night and by day.

The Cornish voter, in the main an honest fellow, "as things went," and who would have thought himself already sufficiently paid, but for such a torrent of acknowledgments, thanked the duke for his kindness, and told him, "that the supervisor of excise was old and infirm, and if he would have the goodness to recommend his son-in-law to the commissioner, in case of the old man's death, he should think himself and his family bound to render government every assistance in his power, on any future occasion."

"My dear friend, why do you ask for such a trifling employment?" exclaimed his grace, "your relation shall have it at a word speaking, the moment it is vacant." "But how shall I get admitted to you, my lord? for in London, I understand, it is a very difficult thing to get a sight of you great folks, though you are so kind and complaisant to us in the country." "The instant the man dies," replied the premier, (used to, and prepared for the freedoms of a contested election) "the moment he dies, set out post haste for London; drive directly to my house, by night or by day, sleeping or waking, dead or alive,—thunder at the door; I will leave word with my porter to shew you up stairs directly, and the employment shall be disposed of according to your wishes, without fail."

The parties separated; the duke drove to a friend's house in the neighbourhood, where he was visiting, without a thought of seeing his new acquaintance till that day seven years; but the memory of a Cornish elector, not being loaded with such a variety of objects, was more attentive. The supervisor died a few months afterwards, and the ministerial partisan, relying on the word of a peer, was conveyed to London by the mail, and ascended the steps of a large house, now divided into three, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, at the corner of Great Queen Street.

The reader should be informed that precisely at the moment when the expectations of a considerable party of a borough in Cornwall, were roused by the death of a supervisor, no less a person than the king of Spain was expected hourly to depart: an event in which all Europe, and particularly Great Britain, was concerned.

The Duke of Newcastle, on the very night that the proprietor of the decisive vote was at his door, had sat up, anxiously expecting dispatches from Madrid, wearied by official business and agitated spirits, he retired to rest, having previously given particular instruction to his porter, not to go to bed, as he expected every minute a messenger with advices of the greatest importance, and desired he might be shewn up stairs, the moment of his arrival.

His grace was sound asleep, for with a thousand singularities and absurdities, of which the rascals about him did not forget to take advantage, his worst enemies could not deny him the merit of good design, that best solace in a solitary hour; the porter settled for the night in his chair, had already commenced a sonorous nap, when the vigorous arm of the Cornish voter roused him effectually from his slumbers.

To his first question, "Is the Duke at home?" the porter replied, "Yes, and in bed; but he left particular orders that come when you will, you are to go up to him directly." "God for ever bless him! a worthy and honest gentleman," cried our applicant for the vacant post, smiling and nodding with approbation, at a prime minister's so accurately keeping his promise, "How punctual his Grace is; I knew he would not deceive me; let me hear no more of lords and dukes not keeping their words; I believe, verily, they are as honest, and mean as well as other folks, but I can't always say the same of those who are about them." Repeating these words as he ascended the stairs, the burgess of  was ushered into the duke's bed-chamber.

"Is he dead?" exclaimed his Grace, rubbing his eyes, and scarcely awaked from dreaming of the King of Spain, "Is he dead?" "Yes, my lord," replied the eager expectant, delighted to find that the election promise, with all its circumstances, was so fresh in the minister's memory. "When did he die?" "The day before yesterday, exactly at half-past one o'clock, after being confined three weeks to his bed, and taking a power of doctor's stuff, and I hope your Grace will be as good as your word, and let my son-in-law succeed him."

The duke, by this time, perfectly awake, was staggered at the impossibility of receiving intelligence from Madrid in so short a space of time, and he was perplexed at the absurdity of a king's messenger applying for his son-in-law to succeed the King of Spain. "Is the man drunk or mad? Where are your dispatches?" exclaimed his Grace, hastily drawing back his curtain, when instead of a royal courier his eager eye recognized at the bed-side the well-known countenance of his friend in Cornwall, making low bows with hat in hand, and hoping "my lord would not forget the gracious promise he was so good as to make in favour of his son-in-law at the last election of *****"

Vexed at so untimely a disturbance and disappointed of news from Spain, he frowned for a few minutes, but chagrin soon gave way to mirth at so singular and ridiculous a combination of opposite circumstances, and yielding to the irritation, he sank on the bed in a violent fit of laughter, which, like the electrical fluid was communicated in a moment to the attendants.

[ADDITION TO THE ARTICLE ON MR. BARNARD AND THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH].

A correspondent, whose letter was among the most welcome we have received, and from whom we shall be glad to hear in future, concludes his communication as follows:—

The north east corner. The house is still standing. It is one man with the passage under the side of it.

"Allow me to point out a little error in your "Romance of Real Life," which I think renders it less romantic than the reality. You state that the Duke of Marlborough survived till 1817, whereas it appears from Smollett, that he died in the course of the very year in which the letters were written. The words of the historian are, "On the whole it is surprising that the death of the duke, which happened in the course of this year, was never attributed to the secret practices of this incendiary correspondent, who had given him to understand that his vengeance, though slow, would not be the less certain," vol. xii., p. 275. If I remember rightly, the same statement is made in the first volume of the Annual Register, but I cannot at this moment refer to it."

We have referred to the Annual Register, and to the Index of that work, and still find ourselves in some perplexity; for though we think our correspondent must be right, both from what he has quoted out of Smollett, and because the duke is plainly the one referred to in the Index as the second Duke of Marlborough, yet it would seem by the place in which the story is put in the register, as though the circumstance had occurred in November, 1758; whereas this duke died the month previous at Munster, in Germany. We can only conclude, that the place was an improper one, and that the date implied should have been that of the year before; and this seems the more likely, inasmuch as the author of the Lounger's Common-place Book (from whom we repeated the story) evidently had it from the Register, and probably mistook the date in consequence. On the other hand, the duke could not have died, as Smollett says he did, "in the course of the year in which the letters were written," for his death is dated October, and the first letter November. The duke who succeeded, was a Knight of the Garter, as his father had been. The Lounger says that the nobleman in question, was Master General of the Ordnance. Did the son succeed the father in that office? We strongly incline to our correspondent's emendation, and agree with him as to the improvement of the story by it; for though the father died of a fever said to be contracted "by the fatigues of a campaign," the lovers of romance could easily attribute the fever to a prison. Perhaps our correspondent, (if he has time) or some other instructed reader, will kindly settle this question for us.

TABLE-TALK.

WIRTEMBERG WINES.—The wines of Stuttgart are famous for their bad and acrid quality. A pleasant German traveller lately informed us, that there is a proverbial saying there, of two of the sourest of them; to wit, that the one is like a cat going down your throat; and the other, the same cat being drawn back again by the tail.

Pleasing Regrets. Even when defeated and mortified, the social feelings are not wholly unpleasing; for the French Actress's exclamation, while speaking of an unfaithful lover's once deserting her, was quite natural. "Ah! c'étoit le bon temps! j'étois bien malheureuse." ("Ah! those were fine times! I was so unhappy.") Sharp's Letters and Essays in Prose and Verse (just published). The exclamation, however gaily put, is the more affecting, when we consider the probable heartlessness of the actress's life at the time she uttered it; and how delightful to the memory even the pains of a real affection had become, when compared with the pleasures of dissipation.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Popular Library of Instruction" will be published regularly on the 1st of every Month, at 6d. each Vol.

LETTERS TO SUCH OF THE LOVERS OF KNOWLEDGE AS HAVE NOT HAD A CLASSICAL EDUCATION.

LETTER II. ANACREON.

We intended to have begun these letters with the oldest and greatest of the Greek poets, Homer; but the want of a book or two prevents us, and we turn for consolation to Anacreon, also an old poet, who gives it us abundantly. So much so, that we no sooner think of him, than war and its heroics, even in Homer, seem ridiculous; and the only sensible thing in life (provided we were Greeks) appears to be, to sit drinking wine under a myrtle tree, crowned with roses, and admiring a pretty girl.

Even Anacreon, however, though of a genius pretty obvious to most readers who are not blinded by mere scholarship, contrives to be misunderstood by great numbers who fancy themselves intimate with him. It has been said of ladies when they write letters, that they put their minds in their postscripts—let out the real object of their writing, as if it were a second thought, or a thing comparatively indifferent. You very often know the amount of a man's knowledge of an author by the remark he makes on him, after he has made the one which he thinks proper and authorized. As for example, you will mention Anacreon to your friend A. in a tone which implies that you wish to know his opinion of him, and he shall say—

"Delightful poet, Anacreon—breathes the very spirit of love and wine. His Greek is very easy."

All the real opinion of this gentleman respecting Anacreon lie in what he says in these last words. His Greek is easy; that is, our scholar has had less trouble in learning to read him than with other Greek poets. This is all he really thinks or feels about the 'delightful Anacreon.'

So with B. You imply a question to B. in the same tone, and he answers, "Anacreon! Oh! a most delightful poet Anacreon—charming—all love and wine. The best edition of him is Spalletti's."

This is all that B. knows of Anacreon's "love and wine." "The best edition of it is Spalletti's;" that is to say, Spalletti is the Anacreon wine-merchant most in repute.

So again with C. as to his knowledge of the translations of the "delightful poet."

"Translations of Anacreon! Delightful poet—too delightful, too natural and peculiar to be translated—simplicity—naïveté—Fawkes's translation is elegant—Moore's very elegant, but diffuse.—Nobody can translate Anacreon. Impossible to give any idea of the exquisite simplicity of the Greek."

This gentleman has never read Cowley's translations from Anacreon; and if he had, he would not have known which part of them was truly Anacreontic, and which not. He makes up his mind that it is impossible to give "any idea of the exquisite simplicity of the Greek," meaning by that assertion, that he himself cannot, and therefore nobody else can. His sole idea of Anacreon is, that he is a writer famous for certain beauties which it is impossible to translate. As to supposing that the spirit of Anacreon may occasionally be met with in poets who have not translated him, and that you may thus get an idea of him without recurring to the Greek at all, this is what never entered his head: for Nature has nothing to do with his head; it is only books and translations. Love, nature, myrtles, roses, wine, have existed ever since the days of Anacreon; yet he thinks nobody ever chanced to look at these things with the same eyes.

Thus there is one class of scholars who have no idea of Anacreon except that he is easy to read; another, who confine their notions of him to a particular edition; and a third, who look upon him as consisting in a certain elegant impossibility to translate. There are more absurdities of pretended scholarship, on this and all other writers, which the truly learned laugh at, and know to be no scholarship at all. Our present business is to attempt to give some idea of what they think and feel with regard to Anacreon, and what all intelligent men would think and feel, if they understood Greek terms for natural impressions. To be unaffectedly charmed with the loveliness of a cheek, and the beauty of a flower, are the first steps to a knowledge of Anacreon. Those are the grammar of his Greek, and pretty nearly the dictionary too.

Little is known of the life of Anacreon. There is reason to believe that he was born among the richer classes; that he was a visitor at the courts of princes; and that agreeably to a genius which was great enough, and has given enough delight to the world, to warrant such a devotion of itself to its enjoyments, he kept aloof from the troubles of his time, or made the best of them, and tempted them to spare his door. It may be concluded of him, that his existence, (so to speak) was passed in a garden; for he lived to be old; which in a man of his sensibility and indolence, implies a life pretty free from care. It is said that he died at the age of eighty-five, and was then choaked with a grape-stone; a fate generally thought to be a little too allegorical to be likely. He was born on the coast of Ionia (part of the modern Turkey,) at Teos, a town south of Smyrna, in the midst of a country of wine, oil, and sunshine; and thus partook strongly of those influences of climate which undoubtedly occasion varieties in genius, as in other productions of nature. As to the objectionable parts of his morals, they belonged to his age and have no essential or inseparable connection with his poetry. We are therefore glad to be warranted in saying nothing about them. All the objectionable passages might be taken out of Anacreon, and he would still be Anacreon; and the most virtuous might read him as safely as they read of flowers and butterflies. Cowley, one of the best of men, translated some of his most Anacreontic poems. We profess to breathe his air in the same spirit as Cowley, and shall assuredly bring no poison out of it to our readers. The truly virtuous are as safe in the pages of the London Journal as they can be in their own homes and gardens. But cheerfulness is a part of our religion, and we chuse to omit not even grapes in it, any more than nature has omitted them.

Imagine then a good-humoured old man, with silver locks, but a healthy and cheerful face, sitting in the delightful climate of Smyrna, under his vine or his olive, with his lute by his side, a cup of his native wine before him, and a pretty peasant girl standing near him, who has, perhaps, brought him a basket of figs, or a bottle of milk corked with vine leaves, and to whom he is giving a rose, or pretending to make love.

For we are not, with the gross literality of dull or vicious understandings, to take for granted every thing that a poet says, on all occasions, especially when he is old. It is mere gratuitous and suspicious assumption in critics who tell us, that such men as Anacreon passed "whole lives" in the indulgence of "every excess and debauchery." They must have had, in the first place, prodigious constitutions, if they did, to live to be near ninety; and secondly, it does not follow that because a poet speaks like a poet, it has therefore taken such a vast deal to give him a taste, greater than other men's, for what he enjoys. Redi, the author of the most famous Bacchanalian poem in Italy, drank little but water. St. Evremond, the French wit, an epicure professed, was too good an epicure not to be temperate and preserve his relish. Debauchees, who are foxhunters, live to be old, because they take a great deal of exercise; but it is not likely that inactive men should; unless they combined a relish for pleasure with some very particular kinds of temperance.

There is generally, in Anacreon's earnest, a touch of something which is not in earnest,—which plays with the subject, as a good-humoured old man plays with children. There is a perpetual smile on his face between enthusiasm and levity. He truly likes the objects he looks upon, (otherwise he could not have painted them truly) and he will retain as much of his youthful regard for them as he can. He does retain much, and he pleasantly pretends more. He loves wine, beauty, flowers, pictures, sculptures, dances, birds, brooks, kind and open natures, every thing that can be indolently enjoyed; not, it must be confessed, with the deepest innermost perception of their beauty (which is more a characteristic of modern poetry than of ancient, owing to the difference of their creeds) but with the most elegant of material perceptions,—of what lies in the surface and tangibility of objects,—and with an admirable exemption from whatsoever does not belong to them,—from all false taste and the mixture of impertinences. With regard to the rest, he had all the sentiment which good nature implies, and nothing more.

Upon those two points of luxury and good taste the character of Anacreon, as a poet, wholly turns. He is the poet of indolent enjoyment, in the best possible taste, and with the least possible trouble. He will enjoy as much as he can, but he will take no more pains about it than he can help, not even to praise it. He would probably talk about it, half the day long; for talking would cost him nothing, and it is natural to old age; but when he comes to write about it, he will say no more than the impulse of the moment incites him to put down, and he will say it in the very best manner, both because the truth of his perception requires it, and because an affected style and superfluous words would give him trouble. He would, it is true, take just so much trouble, if necessary, as should make his style completely suitable to his truth; and if his poems were not so short, it would be difficult to a modern writer to think that they could flow into such excessive ease and spirit as they do if he had not taken the greatest pains to make them. But besides his impulses, he had the habit of a life upon him. Hence the compositions of Anacreon are remarkable, above all others in the world, for being "short and sweet." They are the very thing, and nothing more, required by the occasion; for the animal spirits, which would be natural in other men, and might lead them into superfluities, would not be equally so to one, who adds the indolence of old age to the niceties of natural taste: and therefore as people boast, on other occasions, of calling things by their right names, and "a spade a spade," so when Anacreon describes a beauty or a banquet, or wishes to convey his sense to you of a flower, or a grasshopper, or a head of hair, where it is; as true and as free from every thing foreign to it, as the thing itself.

Look at a myrtle-tree, or a hyacinth, inhale its fragrance, admire its leaves or blossom, then shut your eyes, and think how exquisitely the myrtle tree is what it is, and how beautifully unlike every thing else,—how pure in simple yet cultivated grace. Such is one of the odes of Anacreon.

This may not be a very scholastic description; but we wish it to be something better; and we write to genial apprehensions. We would have them conceive a state of Anacreon, as they would that of his grapes; and know him by his flavour.

It must be conceded to one of our would-be scholarly friends above mentioned, that there is no translation, not even of any one ode of Anacreon's, in the English language, which gives you an entirely right notion of it. The common-place elegancies of Fawkes (who was best when he was humblest, as in his ballad of "Dear Tom, this brown jug") are out of the question. They are as bad as Hoole's Ariosto. Mr. Moore's translation is masterly of its kind, but its kind is not Anacreon's; as he would, perhaps, be the first to say, now; for it was a work of his youth. It is too oriental, diffuse, and ornamented; an Anacreon in Persia. The best English translations are those which Cowley has given us, although diffuseness is their fault also; but they have more of Anacreon's real animal spirits, and his contentment with objects themselves, apart from what he can say about them. Cowley is most in earnest. He thinks most of what his original was thinking, and least of what is expected from his translator.

We will give a specimen of him presently. But it is not to be supposed that we have no passages in the writings of English poets, that convey to an unlearned reader a thorough idea of Anacreon. Prose cannot do it, though far better sometimes as a translation of verse, than verse itself, since the latter may destroy the original both in spirit and medium too. But prose, as a translation of verse, wants, of necessity, that sustained enthusiasm of poetry, which presents the perpetual charm of a triumph over the obstacle of metre, and turns it to an accompaniment and a dance. Readers, therefore, must not expect a right idea of Anacreon from the best prose versions; though, keeping in mind their inevitable deficiencies, they may be of great service and pleasure to him, especially if he can superadd the vivacity which they want. And he is pretty sure not to meet in them with any of the impertinences of the translations in verse; that is to say (not to use the word offensively) any of the matter which does not belong to the original; for an impertinence, in the literal, unoffensive sense of the word, signifies that which does not belong to, or form a part, of any thing.

The passage quoted in our last London Journal about Cupid bathing and pruning his wings under the eyes of a weeping beauty (the production either of Spenser, or of a friend worthy of him) appears to us to be thoroughly Anacreontic in one respect, and without contradiction; that is to say, in clearness and delicacy of fancy.

The blinded archer-boy, like lark in shower of raine,
Sat bathing of his wings; and glad the time did spend
Under those cristall drops, which fell from her faire eyes,
And at their brightest beams, him pruned in lovely wise.

Milton's address to May-morning would have been Anacreontic, but for a certain something of heaviness or stateliness which he has mingled with it, and the deferential changes of the measure.

Now the bright morning star, day's harbinger,
Com's dancing from the East, and leads with her
The flowery May, who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose.

The dancing of the star, the leading flowery May, the green lap, and the straightforward simple style of the words, are all anacreontic; but the measure is too stately and serious. The poet has instinctively changed it in the lines that follow these, which are altogether in the taste of our author:

Hail bounteous May! that dost inspire
Mirth, and youth, and warm desire:
Woods and groves are of thy dressing;
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing.

then a long line comes too seriously in—

Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee and wish thee long.

We will here observe, by the way, that Anacreon's measures are always short and dancing. One of these somewhat resembles with the shorter ones of the above poem.

Woods and groves are of thy dressing
Hill and dale doth boast thy blessing.

Every syllable, observe, is pronounced.

Dote moi lyren Homeros
Phonies aneuthe chordes.

The o's in the second line of the next are all pronounced long, as in the word rose.

Hyscinthine me rhabdo
Chalepos Eros badios
Ekeleous syntrochasin.

There is a poet of the time of Charles the First, Herrick, who is generally called, but on little grounds, the English Anacreon, though he now and then has no unhappy imitation of his manner. We wish we had him by us, to give a specimen. There is one beautiful song of his, (which has been exquisitely translated, by the way, into Latin, by one of the now leading political writers,*) the opening measure of which, that is, of the first couplet, is the same as the other common measure of Anacreon:—

Their eyes the glow worms lend thee,
The shooting stars attend thee,
And the elves also
Whose little eyes glow
Like the sparks of fire, befriend thee.

He ge melaina pinel,
Pinel de dendre auten,
Pinel thalassa d'auras,
He d'Elton thalasson.

Suckling, a charming off-hand writer, who stood between the days of Elizabeth and the Stuarts, and partook of the sentiment of the one and the levity of the other, would have translated Anacreon admirably. And had Anacreon been a fine gentleman of the age of Charles the First, instead of an ancient Greek, he would have written Suckling's ballad on a wedding. There is a touch in it, describing a beautiful pair of lips, which, though perfectly original, is in the highest Anacreontic taste:—

Her lips were red, and one was thin,
Compared with that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly.

Beauty, the country, a picture, the taste and scent of honey, are all in that passage. And yet Anacreon, in the happy comprehensiveness of his words, has beaten it. The thought has got somewhat hacknied since his time, the hard, though unavoidable fate of many an exquisite fancy; yet stated in his simple words, and accompanied with an image, the very perfection of eloquence, it may still be read with a new delight. In his direction to a painter about a portrait of his mistress, he tells him to give her "a lip like Persuasion's,"

Prokaloumenon philema—
Provoking a kiss.

The word is somewhat spoilt in English by the very piquancy which time has added to it; because it makes it look less in earnest, too much like the common language of gallantry. But provoking literally means calling for—asking—forcing us, in common gratitude for our delight, to give what is so exquisitely deserved. And in that better sense, the word provoking is still the right one.

Shakespeare's serenade in Cymbeline might have been written by Anacreon, except that he would have given us some luxurious image of a young female, instead of the word "lady."

Mark, hark, the lark at heav'n's gate sings
And Phoebus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chalked flowers that lie,
And winking mary-buds begin
To open their golden eyes:
With every thing that pretty been,
My lady sweet, arise.

Lilly, a writer of Shakespeare's age, who perverted a naturally fine genius to the purposes of conceit and fashion, has a little poem beginning—

Cupid and my Campaspe played
At cards for kisses, which Anacreon might have written, had cards existed in his time. But we have it not by us to quote. Many passages in Burns's songs are Anacreontic, inasmuch as they are simple, enjoying, and full of the elegance of the senses; but they have more passion than the old Greek's, and less of his perfection of grace. Anacreon never suffers but from old age, or the want of wine. Burns suffers desperately, and as desperately struggles with his suffering, till we know not which is the greater, he or his passion. There is nothing of this robust-handed work in the delicate Ionian. Nature is strong and sovereign in him, but always in accommodating unison with his indolence and old age. He says that he is transported, and he is so; but somehow you always fancy him in the same place, never quite carried out of himself.

Of Anacreon's drinking songs, we do not find it so easy to give a counterpart notion from the English poets, who, though of a drinking country, have not exhibited much of the hilarity of wine. Their port is heavy, compared with Anacreon's Teion. Shakespeare's will not do at all; for Anacreon's Bacchus is the perfection of elegant mythology, particularly comme il faut in the waist, a graceful dancer, and beautiful as cheerfulness. In all Anacreon's manners, and turn of thinking, you recognise what is called "the gentleman." He evidently had a delicate hand. The "cares" that he talks about, consisted in his not having had cares enough. A turn at the plough, or a few wants, would have given him pathos. He would not have thought all the cares of life to consist in its being short, and swift, and taking him away from his pleasures. If he partook however of the effeminacy of his caste, he was superior to its love of wealth and domination. The sole business of his life, he said, was to drink and sing, perfume his beard, and crown his head with roses; and he appears to have stuck religiously to his profession. "Business," he thought, "must be attended to." Plato calls him "wise;" as Milton calls the luxurious Spenser "sage and serious." The greatest poets and philosophers sometimes "let the cat out of the bag," when they are tired of conventional secrets.

Plump Bacchus with pink eyes

* See a periodical publication in two volumes, called the Re-actor, which contained some of the first public essays of several eminent living writers.

This bottle's the sun of our table,
His beams are rosy wine;
We, planets that are not able
Without his help to shine.

These verses of Sheridan are Anacreontic. So is that couplet of Burns's,—exquisitely so, except for the homeliness of the last word:

Care, mad to see a man so happy,
E'en drown'd himself amidst the nappy.

One taste, like this, of the wine of the feelings gives a better idea of Anacreon's drinking songs than hundreds of ordinary specimens.

But we must hasten to close this long article with the best Anacreontic piece of translation we are acquainted with;—that of the famous ode to the Grasshopper by Cowley. Anacreon's Grasshopper, it is to be observed, is not properly a Grasshopper, but the Tettix, as the Greeks called it from its cry,—the Cicada of the Roman poet, and Cicala of modern Italy, where it sings or cricks in the trees in summer-time, as the grasshopper does with us in the grass. It is a species of beetle. But Cowley very properly translated his Greek insect as well as ode, into English, knowing well that the poet's object is to be sympathized with, and that if Anacreon had written in England, he would have addressed the grasshopper instead of the tettix.

We have marked in Italics the expressions, which, though original in Cowley's version, are purely Anacreontic, and such as the Grecian would have delighted to write. The whole poem is much longer than Anacreon's, double the size; but this, perhaps, only justly makes up for the prolongation afforded to all ancient poems, by the music which accompanied them. There is not a Cowlesian conceit in the whole of it, unless the thought about "farmer and landlord," be one, which is quickly forgiven for its naturalness in an English landscape; and the whole, from beginning to end, though not so perfectly melodious, runs on with that natural yet regulated and elegant enthusiasm, betwixt delight in the object and indolent enjoyment in the spectator, which has been noticed as the characteristics of the sprightly old bard. The repetition of the word all is quite in the poet's manner; who loved thus to cram much into little, and to pretend to himself that he was luxuriously expatiating;—as in fact he was, in his feelings; though, as to composition, he did not chuse to make "a toil of a pleasure."

Happy insect! what can be
In happiness compared to thee?
Fed with nourishment divine,
The dewy morning's gentle wine,
Nature waits upon thee still,
And thy verdant cup does fill?
'Tis filled wherever thou dost tread
Nature's self's thy Gaiymede.
Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing,
Happier than the happiest king.
All the fields which thou dost see,
All the plants belong to thee;
All that summer hours produce,
Fertile made with early juice,
Man for thee does sow and plow,
Farmer he, and landlord thou!
Thou dost innocently joy;
Nor does thy luxury destroy;
The shepherd gladly heareth thee,
More harmonious than he.
Thou country hind with gladness hear,
Prophet of the ripened year!
Phoebus is himself thy sire
Thou Phoebus loves, and does inspire;
To thee, of all things upon earth,
Life is no longer than thy mirth.
Happy insect, happy thou!
Dost neither age nor winter know;
But when thou'rt drunk, and danc'd, and sung Thy fill, the flowery leaves among (Voluptuous, and wise withall, Epicurean animal!)
Sated with thy summer feast,
Thou retirest to endless rest.

FOURTH WEEK IN APRIL. BUTTERFLIES AND ELECTRIC SILK.

THE butterflies now come out, hatching of their more numerous brethren in May, and tickling or tickled by the air and flowers,—we hardly knew which it looks most. They seem as if they could not fly an inch for joy, without making all sorts of starts and antics,

Quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles, as though they were intoxicated with suddenly emerging out of their strange death-like prison, into the liberties of light and love. We should like to hear what the de-spisers of colours and gaiety have to say to the manifest delight which nature takes in painting the butterflies and flowers, to say nothing of fields, skies, and other trifles, and the whole starry heavens. The rainbow, too, is a pretty sweep of a painter's brush; and there are the sunrises and sunsets. We have seen the latter in the Mediterranean, finer than Claude's. But we must have "an article" on this subject.

A great deal of pains has sometimes been taken to show that the butterfly undergoes no real change from its caterpillar and pupa state, all its wings, &c., being included in its several succession of forms, like a lady who should be full-dressed for a ball, while wrapped up in her night-gown. As if that, (supposing it to be true, and the question is still undecided,) made any difference in the wonder! We like these getters rid of mysteries! To change internally, they think, is really surprising; but to change only in outward guise, and to carry all your future clothes and wings with you, packed up, first in a sort of feeding machine on sixteen legs, then in a kind of living coffin, boxed up and senseless, and then suddenly waking, and getting upon six legs instead of sixteen, and dancing up into the air, ready for all sorts of ethereal pranks, this they count nothing, or at best, as an explanation of the whole mystery. As if there were any explanation in the matter! or the mystery were not as great as ever; or any one thing not as wonderful as any other.

For our parts, with all our love and admiration of nature, and something like a visiting acquaintance with her, we really are not in her secret in this matter, and can do nothing but be astonished at her beauties, and thankful for the brilliant baubles she gives to the presumptuous and supercilious. We see nothing more wonderful in change than in creation, and nothing at all in the modern accounts of the butterfly to set aside our belief in the good instinct of the old Greek symbol (the butterfly for the soul), and that beautiful question of Dante's, which he puts with such a noble simplicity, and such a divine impartiality between small ideas and great.

Non v' accorgete noi, che noi siamo vermi,
Nati a formar l'angelica farfalla!

Paragorice, Canto X.

Perceive ye not, that we are worms, we men,
Born to compose the angelic butterfly!

We must return to this subject another time. Meanwhile we give a curious extract from the third volume of Captain Brown's Book of Butterflies (just published), relating to the marvels of the moths who furnish us with silk stockings. The reader will there see the extraordinary attachments and aversions shown to one another by those very sensitive habiliments, according to their different complexions. If man could discover the secret of electricity, it would seem indeed as if he were becoming intimate with the spirit of the earth.

"The distinctions between those bodies which are capable of being excited to electricity, and those which are only capable of receiving it from the others, appears scarcely to have been ever suspected till about the year 1729, when this great discovery was made by Mr. Gray, a pensioner in the Charter-house. After some fruitless attempts to make metals attractive by heating, rubbing, and hammering, he conceived a suspicion that, as a glass tube, when rubbed in the dark, communicated its light to various bodies, it might possibly, at the same time, communicate its power of attraction to them. In order to put this to the test, he provided himself with a tube three feet five inches long, and near an inch and one-fifth in diameter; the ends of the tube were stopped by cork; and he found that when the tube was excited, a down feather was attracted as powerfully by the cork as by the tube itself. To convince himself more completely, he procured a small ivory ball, which he fixed at first to a stick of fir, four inches long, which was thrust into the cork, and found that it attracted and repelled the feather even with more vigour than the cork itself. He afterwards fixed the ball upon long sticks, and upon pieces of brass and iron wire with the same success; and lastly attached it to a long piece of packthread, and hung it from a high balcony, in which state he found that, by rubbing the tube, the ball was constantly enabled to attract light bodies in the court below.

His next attempt was to prove whether this power could be conveyed horizontally, as well as perpendicularly. With this view he fixed a cord to a nail which was in one of the beams of the ceiling; and making a loop at that end which hung down, he inserted his packthread, with the ball which was at the end of it, through the loop of the cord, and retired with the tube to the other end of the room; but in this state he found that the ball had totally lost the power of attraction. Upon mentioning his disappointed efforts to a friend, it was suggested that the cord which he had used to support his packthread, might be so coarse as to intercept the electric power; and they accordingly attempted to remedy this evil by employing a silk string, which was much stronger in proportion than a hempen cord. With this apparatus the experiment succeeded far beyond their expectations. Encouraged by their success, and attributing it wholly to the fineness of the silk, they proceeded to support the packthread, to which the ball was attached by very fine brass and iron wire; but, to their utter astonishment, found the effect exactly the same as when they used the hempen cord; the electrical virtue utterly parted away; while, on the other hand, when the packthread was supported by a silken cord, they were able to convey the electric virtue seven hundred and sixty-five feet.

It was evident, therefore, that these effects depended upon some peculiar quality in the silk, which disabled it from conducting away the electrical power, as the hempen cord and the wire had done.

The accidental discovery of Mr. Gray led to the knowledge of the non-conducting powers of various other substances; and since the nature of electricity has been more deeply investigated, the true electric properties of most substances have become known, and are now divided into electrics and non-electrics. The following substances are among the principal conductors of the electric fluid; namely, stoney substances in general, more especially those of a calcareous nature, such as lime, marble, &c., sulphuric acid, black pyrites, black lead, alum, charcoal, all the metallic ores, the animal fluids, and all other fluids, except air and oils.

The electric bodies are those substances, which when excited, collect or emit the fluid, such as amber, sulphur, jet, glass, and all precious crystallized stones, all resinous compounds, and all dry substances, such as silk, hair, wool, paper, &c.

Silk was first discovered to be an electric by Mr. Gray, in the manner we have already related; but as it was by no means remarkable for emitting sparks, which most commonly engages the attention, its electric virtues were almost entirely overlooked till the year 1759. At that time Mr. Symmer presented to the Royal Society some papers, containing a number of very curious experiments made with silk stockings, in substance as follows:—

He had been accustomed to wear two pair of silk stockings, a black and a white. When these were put off both together, no sign of electricity appeared; but on pulling off the black ones from the white, he heard a snapping or crackling noise, and in the dark perceived sparks of fire between them. To produce this and the following appearance in great perfection, it was only necessary to draw his hand backward and forward over his leg with his stockings upon it.

When the stockings were separated and held at a distance from each other, both of them appeared to be highly excited; the white stocking positively, and the black negatively. While they were kept at a distance from each other, both of them appeared inflated, to such a degree, that they exhibited the entire shape of the leg. When two black or two white stockings were held in one hand, they would repel one another with considerable force, making an angle seemingly of thirty or thirty-five degrees. When a white and black stocking were presented to each other, they were mutually attracted; and if permitted, would rush together with surprising violence. As they approached, the inflation gradually subsided, and their attraction of foreign objects diminished, but their attraction of one another increased; when they actually met they became flat, and joined close together like as many folds of silk. When separated again, their electric virtues did not seem to be in the least impaired for having once met, and the same appearances would be exhibited by them as the first time. When the experiment was made with two black stockings in one hand, and two white ones in the other, they were thrown into a strange agitation, owing to the attraction between those of different colours, and the repulsion between those of the same colour. This mixture of attraction and repulsion made the stockings catch at each other at greater distances than otherwise they would have done, and afforded a very curious spectacle.

When the stockings were suffered to meet, they stuck together with considerable force. At first, Mr. Symmer found they required from one to twelve ounces to separate them. Another time they raised seventeen ounces, which was twenty times the weight of the stocking that supported them, and this in a direction parallel to its surface. When one of the stockings was turned inside out, and put within the other, with the rough sides together, it required three pounds three ounces to separate them. With stockings of a more substantial make, the cohesion was still greater. When the white stocking was put within the black one, so that the outside of the white was contiguous to the inside of the black, they raised nine pounds, wanting a few ounces; and when the two rough surfaces were contiguous, they raised fifteen pounds one pennyweight and a half. Cutting off the ends of the thread, and the tufts of silk which had been left in the inside of the stockings, was found to be very unfavourable to these experiments.

Mr. Symmer also observed that pieces of white and black silk, when highly electrified, not only cohered with each other, but would also adhere to bodies with broad and even polished surfaces, though these bodies were not electrified. This he discovered accidentally, having without design, thrown a stocking out of his hand, which stuck to the paper hanging of the room. He repeated the experiment, and found it would continue hanging nearly an hour. Having stuck up the black and white stockings in this manner, he came with another pair, highly electrified, and applying the white to the black, and the black to the white, he carried them off the wall, each of them hanging to that which had been brought to it. The same experiments held with the painted boards of the room, and likewise with the looking-glass, to the smooth surface of which both the white and the black silk appeared to adhere more tenaciously than to either of the former.

Similar experiments, but with a greater variety of circumstances, were afterwards made by Mr. Cigna of Turin, upon white and black ribands. He took two white silk ribands, just dried at the fire, and extended them upon a smooth plane, whether a conducting or electric substance was a matter of indifference. He then drew over them the sharp edge of an ivory ruler, and found that both ribands had acquired electricity enough to adhere to the plane, though, while they continued there, they showed no other sign of it. When taken up separately, they were both negatively electrified, and would repel each other. In their separation, electric sparks were perceived between them, but when again put on the plane, or forced together, no light was perceived without another friction. When by the operation just now mentioned, they had acquired the negative electricity, if they were placed, not upon the smooth body on which they had been rubbed, but on a rough conducting substance, they would, on their separation, show contrary electricities, which would again disappear on their being joined together. If they had been made to repel each other, and were afterwards forced together, and placed on the rough surface abovementioned, they would, in a few minutes, be mutually attracted, the lowermost being positively, and the uppermost negatively electrified.

If the two white ribands received their friction upon the rough surface, they always acquired contrary electricities. The upper one was negatively, and the lower one positively electrified, in whatever manner they were taken off. The same change was instantaneously done by any pointed conductor. If two ribands, for instance, were made to repel, and the point of a needle drawn opposite to one of them along its whole length, they would immediately rush together.

ROMANCES OF REAL LIFE.

VII.—ST. ANDRÉ THE SURGEON.

NATHANIEL St. André was a native of Switzerland, from which country he emigrated early in life, and, secured the friendship of a wealthy patron, who furnished him with the means of procuring a medical education. He afterwards became a public lecturer on anatomy and a surgeon of eminence in London, a favourite of King George the First, the confidential friend of Lord Peterborough, and was employed by Bolingbroke and Pope. But the fairness of such professional prospects were suddenly clouded, and his character stamped with an indelible impression of ridicule or guilt, by his listening to, and encouraging the impudent imposture of Mary Tofts, a woman who declared, and endeavoured to make the public believe, that she had been actually delivered of rabbits;—a delusion in which Whiston, probably seduced by the credit of St. André, was also involved.

This eccentric divine, on other occasions sufficiently scrupulous, wrote a pamphlet to prove, that the monstrous conception literally fulfilled what had been foretold by the prophet Esdras.

To laugh were want of sentiment or grace,
But to be grave exceeds all power of face.

It is not so easy to account for the conduct of St. André, a man confessedly of strong sense and quick discernment. Of three opinions which prevailed at the time;—that he was disposed to try an experiment on national credulity; that he was corrupted by money; or that he was a man whose ruling passions were excitement and the love of making a sensation, no matter at what expense, the author of this notice strongly inclines to the last.

Professional dexterity, or his skill as a performer on the viol di gamba, introduced St. André to Lady Betty Molyneux; he attended her husband in his last illness; and a marriage indecorously hasty between the widow and the surgeon, with other circumstances never satisfactorily explained, involved them both in the odium of being instrumental in hastening the death of Mr. Molyneux, from whom the Swiss (a base villain, if the charge was true) had received many favours. Their guilt or their innocence, which at a certain period strongly agitated the public mind, must now be determined by a more awful and unerring tribunal. Combined with other unpropitious circumstances, this shocking imputation drove St. André into obscurity. Lady Betty was dismissed from court by Queen Caroline; and an action for defamation, in which a verdict and damages were given in favour of the newly married couple, was not sufficient to restore their reputation.

Chance, inclination, perverseness, necessity or guilt, conspired to keep St. André in hot water for a good part of his life. In the year 1725, before he had been debased by credulity, or abounded, as being suspected of flagrant crime, and in the routine of a lucrative practice, he was roused from his bed at midnight by a stranger thundering at his door, who urgently desired him to visit, without delay, a person who was described as desperately wounded. In the heat of zeal, or the perturbation of broken sleep, St. André neglected that necessary precaution for every medical practitioner, on such occasions, the taking, on all midnight calls from persons he does not know, his own servant with him. After following his unknown guide in the nocturnal gloom, through many an unfrequented court, remote street, and obscure alley, after being conducted, and re-conducted through passages, galleries, and stair-cases, heated, hurried, and confused, he at last found himself in a retired chamber, the door of which being instantly bolted, the affrighted surgeon was threatened with immediate death, if he did not directly swallow the contents of a bowl (of course poisonous) presented to him by two ruffians, with instruments of death in their hands. Having paused for a short time on the horrible alternative, he drank the terrible dose, and with considerable precautions to prevent discovery, was replaced blindfolded at his own door. The condition of a man who had been compelled to take what he considered as poison, need not be described. Without supposing that the drench contained one deleterious particle, the mere idea was sufficient to communicate arsenic, hellebore, and sublimate to his disturbed imagination. Of this extraordinary transaction, an account sufficiently expressive of the terror of St. André, was published in the London Gazette, and a reward of 200*l.* offered by government to any person who would give information that might lead to discovery and conviction; but no discovery was made.

One is sometimes tempted to consider this singular narrative as the fabrication of a restless mind, fertile in invention; the fable of a man, determined at every risk, to present himself as frequently as possible to the public eye, and become the subject of general notice and common conversation; such characters occur in every age. A companion of St. André, who, (in the hope of a legacy which never was bequeathed) endured much of his sarcastic brunt, and satirical sallies, was heard to declare that he had good reason for believing, that the circumstances related by his friend were correct. He added, as indeed the event proved, that there was clearly no poison in the mixture, though made sufficiently nauseous; that the whole was a cruel but harmless effort of ingenious revenge, and meant to torment the surgeon, who had supplanted a friend in the affections of a favourite mistress.

Whatever were the contents of the bowl, he survived its effects, as well as the exhausting consequences of the anxiety he suffered, and the antidotes he swallowed. Finding the metropolis, on many accounts, unpleasant, he retired from public obloquy or private contempt, to a provincial town, where he occupied his leisure hours, and dissipated his superfluous cash in building and planting; but discovered more of whim and caprice than goodness of taste, or correctness of design. Life however was strong in him somehow or other, for he lived to be upwards of ninety.

MR. BARNARD AND THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

The Times alluding to our query upon this point, cuts asunder the difficulty in a very sufficing manner, as follows:—"We observe that the editor seems puzzled about the Duke of Marlborough, who was the subject of an interesting narrative in his first number. He will, on a moment's examination, see that the Duke of Marlborough, who died in 1817, at the age of 78, was only 19 years old in 1758, and could not, at such an early age, be Master General of the Ordnance, or a Knight of the Garter."

ANECDOTE OF SHENTONE'S YOUTH.

In the accounts of celebrated men, we rarely meet with a sufficient number of those personal and domestic particulars, which are so interesting to the common nature of us all, and which are often omitted, especially in history, upon an idle, unphilosophical notion of their being incompatible with the "dignity" of the work! As if anything could be more worth our while to know, than what is calculated to charm one's sympathy with intelligent natures, and humanize and instruct us in our daily life. Perhaps it would not be too much to affirm, that every life which has been written, except at very great length, could be materially enlarged, improved, and rendered a great deal more interesting, by a diligent search into collateral accounts of the person recorded, and into his own writings, whether in prose or in verse. A great deal might be added, for instance, to the lives of most of the English poets. Take the following anecdote, by way of specimen, as an addition to the life of Shentone, not a great poet, it is true, but a very pleasing one, and a man of no ordinary powers of reflection when he chose to set them to work. Every reader of his poem of the School Mistress, and of the acute, and sometimes the deep reflections to be met with in his Essays, would surely be glad of more such memoran-dums of him. It is to be found in a little anonymous book ("Recollections of Some Particulars in the Life of the late William Shentone Esq."), written not long after his death, in defence of him from some of the objections of Dr. Johnson, by his old and fast friend, Richard Graves, the author of the Spiritual Quixote, whom a comfortable parsonage, and a pleasant temper, kept alive till upwards of ninety.

The anecdote will "come home to the bosoms" of hundreds of youths, and older men too, who know what it is to "quarrel and make it up." The poet and his friend were at that time young men from college, and Graves was on a visit to Shentone, at an old family house belonging to the latter, with a rookery to it and other rural appurtenances, where they enjoyed themselves in the sweets of literary companionship.

"At Harborough (says Mr. Graves), Mr. Shentone and I passed a month in a very agreeable loiter; sometimes indeed pursuing the high road to useful science, but more frequently roving amidst the flowery regions of fancy and amusement. We read, however, Boileau, Bohours, Dacier's Terence, and other French critics or entertaining authors; and Mr. Shentone wrote several little pieces of poetry, which I then thought excellent; but most of which, I believe, are now buried in oblivion. As we went out but little, and saw hardly any company, and of course were confined chiefly to each other's conversation, we now and then got into a hot dispute; on which occasions, as Mr. Shentone was generally victorious, he could not submit patiently to a defeat. We were one day engaged in a warm debate, in which, I think, I had the upper hand, and drove my antagonist to a painful dilemma; and with exultation pursued my advantage so far, that Mr. Shentone grew angry, and our trifling dispute terminated on each side in a sullen silence, which, as Mr. Shentone would not vouchsafe to break first, I, from a youthful spirit of independence, disdained to submit; so that, although we ate and drank together, this pouting humour continued, and we never spoke to each other for near two days. At last, as I was never much addicted to taciturnity, and it was pain and grief to me to keep silence, I wrote upon the wall in a summer-house in the garden,

Θίλω, Θίλω μαχήσθαι

which I translated,

"I will, I will be witty."

Under this, Mr. Shentone wrote this distich:

"Matchless on earth I thee proclaim,
Whose will and power I find the same."

This produced a reply on my side; that a rejoinder on his; till at last the ill fated wall was scribbled from top to bottom, which the next morning was succeeded by a laugh at each other's folly, and a cordial reconciliation."

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 23, 1834.

HAVING arrived at the fourth number of our Journal, with the most encouraging prospects of success, we must leave off saying what heaps of kind letters we continue to receive, lest it should look like a system of self-recommendation. But we cannot help once more alluding to them, for fear of seeming ungrateful to the writers; some of whom are as flattering to us by their very names, as all are by their cordiality. One letter, however, is of a nature so publicly as well as privately connected with the subject of a journal of this description, that we must take the liberty, not only of distinctly mentioning it, but of laying it before the reader. We own, that after our first impulse to this effect, we hesitated a moment out of feelings of modesty, and somewhat longer in deference to that of the writer especially as he had given no intimation whether we might so use it or not. Our mind was soon made up by the consideration of the honour which the letter did him, and of the good which must accrue to the public from seeing men, who might be supposed to witness a new Journal of this sort with no friendly feeling, coming forward in so handsome a manner to shew themselves true lovers of the knowledge they advocate, and of the generousities to which it gives rise. Mr. Chambers may over-estimate our abilities, and be too modest respecting his own; but there can only be one opinion respecting the sentiment that impelled him to write his letter. He will be glad to hear, that it is not the first of the kind which we have received. We take the opportunity of stating, that no sooner had our Journal appeared, than the Publisher of the Penny Magazine, who is also, we believe, proprietor of the Printing Machine, or Review for the Many, expressed himself in the most spirited and liberal manner towards the new paper, and took steps to shew that he was in earnest. But Mr. Chambers has written so much at length on the subject, that we feel warranted in calling the reader's attention to his letter, and we think we cannot do better than put it in this part of our Journal, where we are in the habit of noticing any new evidences that transpire, of the growth of intellectual brotherhood:—

LETTER OF MR. ROBERT CHAMBERS OF THE EDINBURGH JOURNAL TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON JOURNAL.

27, Elder-street, Edinburgh,
April 15, 1834.

DEAR SIR,—I take leave to address you in this familiar manner for several reasons. The chief is your kind nature, as exemplified in your writings, which prove you the friend of all mankind; the lesser are your allusions on more occasions than one to writings of mine, when you did not perhaps know the exact name of the author. My purpose is to congratulate you on the first number of your Journal, which I have just seen, and to express my earnest and sincere hope that it will repay your exertions, and render the latter part of your life more prosperous than you say the earlier has been. You will perhaps appreciate my good wishes the more that they proceed from an individual who, according to vulgar calculations, might expect to be injured by your success. I assure you, so far from entertaining any grudge towards your work on that score, I am as open to receive pleasurable impressions from it as I have ever been from your previous publications, or as the least literary of your readers can be; and as hopeful that it will succeed and prove a means of comfort to you, as the most ancient and familiar of your friends. I know that your work can never do by a tenth part so much ill to my brother and myself, as it may do good to you—for every book, however similar to others, finds in a great measure new channels for itself; and still more certain am I, that the most jealous and unworthy feelings we could entertain, would be ineffectual in protecting us from the consequences of your supplanting our humble sheets in the public favour. My brother and I feel much pleasure in observing that a writer so much our senior, and so much our superior, should have thought our plan to such an extent worthy of his adoption, and hope your doing so will only furnish additional proof of the justice of our calculations. This leads me to remark, that, while I acknowledge the truth of your pretensions to having been the reviver of the periodical literature of a former age, and have looked to your manner of treating light subjects as in part the model of our own, I must take this and every other proper opportunity of asserting my elder brother's merit, as the originator of cheap respectable publications, of the class to which your Journal is so important an addition. In the starting of Chambers's Edinburgh Journal in February, 1832, he was unquestionably the first to develop this new power of the printing-press; and, considering that we had some little character (at least in Scotland) to lose, and encountered feelings in our literary brethren little less apt, I may say, to deter us from our object than the terrors which assailed Rodolph in the Witch's Glen (a simile more expressive than it is apt). I humbly conceive that, when the full utility of my brother's invention shall have been perceived by the world, as I trust it will in time, he will be fully entitled to have his claims allowed without dispute.

"That we have regretted to find ourselves the objects of so many of the meaner order of feelings among our brethren, it would be vain to deny. I must say, however, that we would have been ill to satisfy indeed, if the admission of our weekly sheet into almost every family of the middle rank, and many of the lower throughout the country, had not more than compensated us for that affliction. Our labours, moreover, are profitable beyond our hopes, beyond our wants, besides yielding to us a ceaseless revenue of pleasure, in the sense they convey to us of daily and hourly improving the hearts and understandings of a large portion of our species. That you may aim as heartily at this result, and be as successful in obtaining it, is the wish of

"Dear Sir,

"Your sincere Friend and Servant,

"ROBERT CHAMBERS."

We shall add nothing to this, being naturally willing to leave Mr. Chambers in possession of his pleasant "last word," except that the appearance of the Tatler was antecedent to that of the Edinburgh Journal, and that in the Indicator, and in the Tatler also, (if we recollect rightly,) we professed a wish to extend an acquaintance with matters of intellectual refinement among the uneducated. The zeal of our correspondent, however, in behalf of his brother's claim, is so good a thing for its own sake, that we are far from anxious to contest this point with him; and heartily willing are we to acknowledge, that these gentlemen have had a wider and more popular view of the opening of cheap literature to the many, than we ever had till now. In zeal for the interests of all, we will yield to nobody; but in a knowledge of the best means of extending its operation, others have surpassed us; and we hope to shew, that we have profited by their example. We take this opportunity of observing, that among the foremost, if not the very first, to lower the price of respectable periodical literature, though not professedly to extend it to those who have missed a classical education, was the Athenaeum.

The House of Commons have been discussing a grant of money for the purchase of two pictures for the National Gallery; and all parties, in and out of doors, have accorded with it. We need not say how we rejoice in this harmonious and intelligent view of what in a ruder state of society would be foolishly thought a foolish question. No advantage to the public was left out of sight, commercial, intellectual, or moral; and Tory, Whig, and Radical, all testified to it. One member spoke of the benefits derived to the artisan from the diffusion of the beautiful designs of antiquity: and another gave it as his opinion, that no people in the country derived more pleasure from the exhibition of works of art than the poorer classes.

We believe it. They see and feel in it much more than they at present know. We have seen peasants walking quietly in the Florentine gallery delighted with all they saw, and proud of it; and not an atom is defaced in Florence of the fine sculptures that stand in the open square. The people, being trusted with them, respect them. It will be so in England as the fine arts advance; and their progress is observable in several instances, especially in the popularity of the wood-cuts in the Penny Magazine, which have at once followed and fostered it; busts and statues have taken place of the old dogs and parrots, on the heads of itinerant vendors; and people having once been accustomed to these, will never like anything less—will never return to an inferior taste. The circumstance is good for all parties. It gives a new addition to their world, whatever it be; elevates the depressed (conscious and proud that its fellow-creatures can have created such works); lowers false pride (which can do nothing like them); tends to put hope, and patience, and consideration, and a just sense of human right and enjoyment into conflicting parties of all kinds—humanizes every body. Nothing brutal can do such things, nor remain entire and unmitigated before them. Brute force cannot do them—nor mere power of any sort—mere wealth—mere rank—mere will. But in those rooms, hung with beautiful pictures, rank, riches, and poverty meet together in the very persons of the painters, all swallowed up and forgotten in the gorgeous spirit of their genius. There, besides Titian and Michael Angelo, who were “gentlemen born,” and Raphael, himself the son of a painter, are the “great Caracci,” who were the offspring of a tailor; and Andrea del Sarto, who was another (so called by reason of it, Sarto meaning a tailor); and Tintoretto, which means a dyer; and the magician of light and darkness, Rembrandt, who was the son of a miller; and the “divine Claude Lorrain,” who was bred a pastry-cook, and who has now a whole province to his name, while the princes of Lorrain are forgotten.

“A museum,” say the newspapers, “consisting of many valuable specimens of morbid anatomy, midwifery, and casts, with numerous prints and drawings, has been presented to the London University for the use of the students of the New North London Hospital, which will be opened at Michaelmas with one hundred and ten beds, by Gore Clough, esq., of Upper Norton-street, Fitzroy-square. The preparations are for the most part in excellent preservation, and have been carefully collected at an expenditure of 3,000*l*. The gift of this valuable addition to the Museum of the University, was communicated on Wednesday last to the committee, and it will be deposited in a temporary apartment till the large room about to be fitted up is ready for its reception.” Men are to be envied who can make presents like these.

“The learned and scientific society at Geneva, which corresponds in the nature of its institution with the Royal Society of London, have elected Mrs. Somerville a member,—the first instance of a similar distinction conferred on a female by that learned body.” Mrs. Somerville, wife of Dr. Somerville physician, is the lady so distinguished at present for her knowledge of the sciences. We take it for granted that the Royal Society will follow the example. Ladies have been members of Royal Academies of Painting, and of Societies of Botany, why not of any other institution of art or science? There is more jealousy than any thing else in withholding public honours from the sex, especially when those honours are of a gentle and comparatively private nature, unquestionably fitted for them, and calculated only to do good.

We hope to see the days before long, when audiences will be refined enough to be able to hear public lectures on art and science from the lips of females; which would give the maxims of taste and wisdom, one would think, a peculiar grace. About a hundred years back, a lady named Gaetana Agnesi, was professor of mathematics in the University of Bologna, and read lectures accordingly. Our celebrated English professor, Colson, learnt the Italian language on purpose to translate a work of hers; which was subsequently published in two volumes quarto, by the late Baron Maseres. Our learned readers will be reminded, and our unlearned ones interested to hear, of the famous Hypatia, daughter and successor of Theon, the mathematician at Alexandria, in the days of Theodosius the Second; a female, whose knowledge of the sciences was graced by all the charms of beauty, innocence, and elegant manners. Strange picture, to precede the tragedy of her death! All these attractions which made her admired and beloved of every body not brutalized by intolerance, did not hinder her being torn to pieces during one of the horrible broils that disgraced the unchristian Christians of that day,—frightful perverters of the doctrines of their divine Master, whose tenderness was never more affectingly evinced than towards women. See the account somewhere in Gibbon; or in any dictionary.

We cannot suffer the Fourth volume of Allan Cunningham's edition of Burns to appear, without saying how interesting it is both in poetry and comment. There are two good vignettes, after drawings by Mr. D. O. Hill,—one very pleasant, and striped with sunshine across the tree-bordered road, with one of the poet's bonnie lasses going along with her milk-pail,—the other the field of Bannock-burn, where Bruce dealt that tremendous blow at his assailant before battle, which was the harbinger of his great victory. It was thought, no doubt, in old times, by soldiers and others, that no new glory could come to the field of Bannockburn, unless another victory should happen there. Yet a peasant has touched it with an immortal hand, and made it sing for joy.

MORE ADMIRABLE MAXIMS AND SUGGESTIONS FROM MR. BENTHAM'S UNPUBLISHED WORK.

Absurd Hinderances of Comfort.—How many little pleasures are interfered with by the meddling of unwellcome intruders,—how many checked by the asceticism, or the ill nature, or the ridicule, or the scorn of a bye-stander? How many trifling vexations are aggravated by the dissocial qualities, or heedless deportment of a looker on? At the end of a day how much total loss is there not of happiness by inattention to those small elements of which it is composed? What an aggregate amount is made up of those particles of pain produced by carelessness alone! The time will, perhaps, arrive when all these sources of evil will be investigated, grouped together in their distinguishing characteristics, illustrated by examples, and their inconsistency with virtue be made so apparent, that opinion will take charge of their extirpation,—opinion, which to enlighten and to make influential, is the highest purpose of the moralist.

Right of Reproof.—In ordinary cases, the justifications put forth for the infliction of pain by discourse, are not tenable. It is far from sufficient to say that the assertions made are true; it is far from sufficient to pretend that the person on whom the pain is inflicted deserves the infliction; it is far from sufficient to urge that he is reckless or worthless, or that you deal charitably with his misconduct. Unless you can come and show, that preponderant good is to result from the sufferings you create, your vituperation of your victim, your laudation of yourself, are but vain and wasted words. The right to reprehend is, in itself, a virtual claim to superiority, and a claim which is likely to hurt the pride and vanity of him upon whom it is exercised. Reprehension is awarded punishment: and in proportion to the doubtfulness of the title to arbitrate and condemn, of him who thus takes on himself the functions of condemnner, will be the perils incurred by his own self-interest, from the enmity of the party punished. The extent of his malevolence will be measured by the same standard, and the amount of his usurpation will be measured by the needless severity of his reprehension.

Imperiousness.—This is the attempt to strengthen argument by despotism. Not satisfied even with being right, some men's pleasure seems to consist in putting others in the wrong. They must have a triumph for their dogmatism as well as their reason. They must humiliate while they subdue. They will beat down a companion, even though his downfall should not be needful to their success. Not only shall their opponent be in the wrong, but they will extort from him a confession that he is in the wrong. They condemn him—others condemn! but their tyranny will be satisfied with nothing but a declaration of self-condemnation from the condemned himself.

A form of imperiousness is that of positive and unqualified assertion, which is made more offensive when it contradicts an opposite opinion expressed by another; and the arrogance becomes heightened, if the assertion be of a nature not to be substantiated by proof.

Of the same kind are positive assertions as to matters of fact, not witnessed by the assertor, the proof of which depends upon evidence; assertions making no reference to that evidence, but demanding belief on no other ground than the assertion itself.

Peremptoriness of decision; before an opportunity has been given to others to express their convictions, is a usurpation, shutting the door upon discussion. Peremptoriness of decision, after an opinion has been given by others, is annoying and offensive.

Useless contradiction is another violation of benevolence; it is also an exhibition of folly; for while it manifests impotence, it wounds power.

Assumingness. There is a form of imperiousness somewhat less annoying, but still worthy of discouragement and reprobation, which may be called assumingness. It generally displays itself in the naked and crude assertion of an alleged matter of fact, without reference to any percipient interest. Its pretension is to demand implicit credence.

Advice. Discourse may wound by advice-giving, involving in it the appearance of reprehension, or exhibiting itself in a shape implying the possession of an authority not recognised by the hearer. Even the giving good advice is the assumption of authority on the score of wisdom.

It is Mr. Godwin, we think, who has remarked, that advice is not disliked for its own sake, but because so few people know how to give it. Perhaps the art of giving advice may be summed up in few words, as consisting in accompanying it with a confession of our own imperfections, and an enumeration of the good qualities of the person advised. But “we may have no imperfections to confess, nor the person any good qualities to enumerate!” Oh then, in neither case, we may rest assured, will our advice do any good.

Success. Want of judgment may be evinced, as well by regarding success as improbable where it is probable, as regarding it as probable where it is improbable.

Excellent memorandum for letter-writers. If a friend be permanently distant, do not communicate to him any vexation of yours which he is unable to relieve. You will spare him all the suffering that his sympathy would have excited.

National Prejudices. From the moment in which the exercise of certain expressions of good-will is exclusively directed to the body, the class, or nation to which we belong, and is denied to others, from the moment in which they break out into words and deeds of antipathy, from the moment, in which the fact, that a fellow man speaks a different language, or lies under a different government, constitutes him an object for contempt, abhorrence, or misdoings,—from that moment it is maleficent. A toast for example in America has been given, “Our country, right or wrong,” which is, in itself, a proclamation of maleficence, and if brought into operation, might lead to crimes and follies on the widest conceivable field,—to plunder, murder, and all the consequences of unjust war. Not less blame-worthy was the declaration of a prime-minister of this country, “that England—nothing but England,—formed any portion of his care or concern.” An enlarged philanthropy indeed, might have given to both expressions a Deontological meaning, since the true interests of nations, as the true interests of individuals, are equally those of prudence and benevolence; but the phrases were employed solely to justify wrong, if that wrong were perpetrated by the land or government which we call our own.

Suppose a man were to give as a toast, in serious earnest, “Myself, right or wrong!” Yet the above assumptions of false patriotism both in America and England, are founded on no better principle.

Good Hint to a very Common Error.—If called upon to give an unfavourable opinion as to a saying of any kind, or a work of which you disapprove, do not be forward to communicate your disapprobation, merely because your self-love is flattered by the appeal made to your judgment.

Needless Recurrence to the Past.—Be cautious not to drag forward ill-conduct, which, but for your reference to it, might be forgotten. Except for some obvious purpose of future good, to treasure up in your mind the records of old misdeeds of others, is to sin against prudence and benevolence; it is to make your breast a store-house of pain, to be inflicted on yourself and on others. The expression of dissatisfaction at past ill-conduct, when it has no reference to present ill-conduct, and at the same time is not likely to prevent future ill-conduct, is the creation of misery to no end whatever, or to a bad end. [Goethe in his novel of “Wilhelm Meister,” speaking of a circumstance that had taken place, says, admirably, “For one thing, the evil was already done; and though people of a singularly strict and harsh temper are wont to set themselves forcibly against the past, and thus to increase the evil that cannot be remedied, yet, on the other hand, what is actually done, exerts a resistless effect on most minds. An event which lately appeared impossible, takes place, so soon as it has occurred, with what occurs daily.” Carlyle's Translation. Whittaker and Co. Vol. i. p. 81.]

Admirable Rule for Real or Supposed Grounds of Complaint.—If you imagine you have cause for complaint against any man, on the ground of his misconduct to wards you, and if it appear to you of use that he should be informed of this, take care that the communication be made so as to give him the least possible annoyance; do not convey your expression in a way to make him suppose you think ill of him; so speak that he may regard you as attributing his conduct to a cause in which he is little or not at all to blame. You have asked him, for example, to visit you: he has neither done this, nor sent an answer: he ought to have come, or at least to have given a reason why he would not, or did not come. Impute his neglect to the possible misarrangement of your letter; or if the message was a verbal one, to probable misconception on the part of the bearer; to misconception, or misexpression, or forgetfulness; for, as the effect might have been produced by any of these causes, there is no insincerity in a man's supposing as much.

LEGENDS OF RICHARD THE GOOD, DUKE OF NORMANDY.

FROM THE "LAIS AND LEGENDS OF VARIOUS NATIONS," NO. 2, (JUST PUBLISHED) CONTAINING "LAIS AND LEGENDS OF FRANCE."

It was the custom of Duke Richard of Normandy, called the Good, to ramble about by night as well as by day, and though he met with many phantoms he was never afraid of them. As he was so much abroad in the former season, it was commonly reported that he could see as well in the dark as other men by daylight. Whenever he came to an abbey or a church, he was sure to stop and pray outside, if he could not gain admission within. One night as he was riding along wrapt in meditation, and far from any attendant, he alighted, according to custom, before a church, fastened his horse at the door, and went in to pray. He passed a coffin which lay on a bier, threw his gloves on a reading-desk in the choir, and knelt before the altar, kissed the earth, and commenced his devotions. He had scarcely done so when he heard a strange noise proceeding from the bier behind him. He turned round, (for he feared nothing in the world;) and looking towards the place, said, "Whether thou art a good or a bad thing, be still and rest in peace!" The Duke then proceeded with his prayer, whether it was long or short I cannot tell, and at the conclusion signed himself with the cross saying

Per hoc signum sanctos crucis
Libera me de malignis
Domine Deus Saluta.

Through this sign of the Holy Cross,
Deliver me from the Evil Ones,
Lord God of my Salvation.

He then arose, and said, "Lord into thy hands I commend my spirit." He took his sword, and as he was preparing to leave the church, behold the devil stood bolt upright at the door, extending his long arms, as if to seize Richard, and prevent his departure. The latter drew his sword, cut the figure down the centre, and sent it through the bier. Whether it cried or not I do not know. When Richard came to his horse outside the door, he perceived that he had forgotten his gloves; and as he did not wish to lose them, he returned into the chancel for them. Few men would have done as much. Wherefore he caused it to be proclaimed, both in the churches and in the market places, that in future no corpse should be left alone till it was buried.

Another adventure happened to the Duke, which made people wonder, and which would not so easily have been believed, were it not so well known. I have heard it from many, who had in like manner heard it from their forefathers; but often through carelessness, idleness or ignorance, many a good tale is not committed to writing though it would prove very entertaining. At that time there was a sacristan,* who was reckoned a proper monk and one of good report; but the more a man is praised, the more the devil assaults him, and watches the more for an occasion to tempt him. So it happened to the Sacristan. One day, so the devil would have it, as he was passing by the church about his business, he saw a marvellously fine woman, and fell desperately in love with her. His passion knows no bounds. He must die if he cannot have her; so he will leave nothing undone to come at his end. He talked to her so much, and made her so many promises, that the fair dame at last appointed a meeting in the evening at her own house. She told him that he must pass over a narrow bridge or rotten plank which lay across the river Robec; that there was no other way, and that she could not be spoken with any where else. When the night came, and the other monks were asleep, the Sacristan grew impatient to be gone. He wanted no companion, so he went alone to the bridge and ventured on it. Whether he stumbled or slipped, or was taken suddenly ill, I cannot tell, but he fell into the water, and was drowned.

As soon as his soul left the body, the devil seized it, and was posting away with it to hell, when an angel met him, and strove with him which of them should possess it: wherefore a great dispute arose between them, each giving a reason in support of his claim. Says the devil, "Thou dost me wrong, in seeking to deprive me of the soul I am carrying; dost thou not know that every soul taken in sin is mine? This was in a wicked way, and in a wicked way I have seized it. Now the Scripture itself says, 'As I find thee, so I will judge thee.' This monk I found in evil, of which the business he was about is sufficient proof, and there needs no other." Replies the angel, "Hold thy peace; it shall not be so. The monk led a good life in his abbey, he conducted himself well and faithfully, and no one ever saw ill of him. The Scripture saith, that which is reasonable and right, every good work shall be rewarded, and every evil one punished. Then this monk ought to be rewarded for the good we know he has done; but how could that be if he were suffered to be damned? He had not committed any sin when thou didst take and condemn him. Howbeit, he had left the abbey, and did come to the bridge, he might have turned back if he had not fallen into the river; and he ought not to be so much punished for a sin which he never committed. For his foolish intention alone, thou condemnest him, and in that thou art wrong. Let the soul alone, and as for the strife betwixt thee and me, let us go to Duke Richard, and abide by his opinion. Neither side will have any reason to complain; he will decide honestly and wisely, for false judgment is not to be found in him. To what he says we will both submit without any more dispute." Says the devil, "I consent to it; and let the soul remain between us."

They immediately went to Richard's chamber, who was then in bed. He had been asleep, but just then he was awake and reflecting upon diverse things. They related to him how the monk had left his monastery on an evil errand, how he had fallen from the bridge, and been drowned without doing evil. They desired him to judge which of them should take possession of the soul. Answers Richard, briefly, "Go immediately, and restore the soul to the body; let him then be placed on the bridge, on the very spot from which he tumbled; and if he advances one foot, nay, ever so little, let Nick go and take him away without further hindrance; but if the monk turns back, let him do so unmolested. Neither could say nay to this decision, so they did as he had said. The soul was returned to the body, the body restored to life, and the monk placed on the very part of the bridge whence he had fallen. As soon as the poor fellow perceived that he was standing upright on the bridge, he ran back as quickly as though he had trod on a snake; he did not even stay to bid the devil and the angel good bye. On his reaching the abbey, he shook his wet clothes, and crept into a corner. He was still terrified at the thought of death, and he could not well say whether he was dead or alive. The next morning Richard went to the abbey church to pray. The Duke caused him to be brought before the abbot, "Brother," says Richard, "what think you now? How came you to be taken? Take care another time how you pass the bridge. Tell the abbot what you have seen to-night." The monk blushed, and was ashamed in the presence of his superior and the duke. He confessed all, how he went, how he perished, how the devil had deceived him, and how the duke had delivered him; he related the whole matter, which was confirmed by the noble Richard. Thus was the thing noised abroad and its certainty established. Long after it took place, this saying became a proverb in Normandy, "Sir monk, go gently, take care of yourself when you pass over the bridge."

FRUITS OF PUBLIC SPEAKING.

[To the Editor of the London Journal.]

SIR,—Pursuant to your instructions, I yesterday attended a General Meeting of the Fruits and Vegetables of the United Kingdom, convened at the Three Jolly Gardeners, Portman Market; and am happy to report, notwithstanding the illiberal tone of many of the speeches, that a very high degree of culture was observable in the generality; this is a fact, which in spite of their teeth, cannot be denied.

A general gloom pervaded the aspect of the meeting; though this was somewhat relieved by the female beauty present in the galleries, which were crowded by acions of most of the old stock of the kingdom. Some peareases might be named, nor must "two turn cherries," the rosiest of the race—and a delicate young plum, bursting with sweets, yet in all the immaculate bloom of youth, be forgotten. I was happy to observe, that the lovely duchess PEACH retains all the mellow charm so much admired in her complexion.

Several foreigners of distinction were present, among whom those of the house of ORANGE were most remarkable. With these exceptions the meeting was exclusive à l'outrance; so much so, that the HOR family were stopped at the doors, as they declined entering without their poles, and those gentlemen could not be admitted till the sense of the assembly had been taken. That was soon done. Nothing human was to be seen in this solemn convocation! with the honourable exception in the favour of that useful body—vulgarily styled old apple-women, who had been invited: under the guise of one of these, your reporter made good his entrance.

After a short discussion, Alderman MELON was called to the chair. The portly gentleman excited much merriment in the galleries from the manner in which he rolled to his seat. There was a green and yellow melancholy in his appearance which caused the young ladies to observe that he was a bachelor.

After the chairman had stated the object of the meeting, and implored the attention of the vegetable world to the necessity of union among themselves in these innovating times,

WILD STRAWBERRY arose, and in a rambling speech wished himself to be understood to claim the protection of the laws. Though commonly called Wild, he had sown his wild oats; he now began to look about him, and found that he was superseded and forgotten in the market. He was a great landholder—he had held from time immemorial—it was said that no restraint was put upon him—that he had some of the most lovely spots in England to luxuriate in—but that was 'nt the question; what was the use of his growing, if he was not to be eaten? he claimed a vested right in the stomachs of Englishmen. Alas! he did not speak for himself—his days were numbered—but it was the system of sacrificing the luxuries of units, to happiness of thousands, that he complained of—it was a system by which he was a loser—it was ridiculous! he had been a sufferer—it was flagitious! England would have cause to mourn over the extinction of her wild Strawberry. Why could 'nt men enow what their grandmothers had been but too happy to mumble before them. No! they must run after novelties; he would have them beware of innovations, one HAUTOIS for instance. The speaker closed with some severe reflections on Mr. Willmott. (reiterated cheers.)

GREEN PEAS then rose, and in a small voice, complained of being forced into the market at a season when his forefathers used to be still in the flower of their youth. I suppress some observations made by this speaker on being debarred from the pleasures and flirtations of the garden.

ONION then begged to rise. (A voice, "Onion, you're always a-rising.") Onion however proceeded in a manner that brought tears into the eyes of all present.

One CRAB, a little ill-favoured personage, then got on his stalk. He stated himself to come of a branch of an almost extinct family: he was remarkably sharp and pungent in his observations on the neglect with which he was now treated; he whose name occupied so distinguished a place in the annals of old England—(here the gentleman quoted Shakespeare, in support of his position)—he who, whatever his enemies might say, was so celebrated for the sweetness of his disposition and intrinsic worth. ("Oh, oh!" from a knot of jolly young pippins who had insinuated themselves into the meeting.) He would ask why the insipid CODLING, a fellow of "no mark or likelihood," or the rascally RUSSET, that booby in a brown coat, should find more favour than himself. Neither did he care a fig for the mongrel PHARMACIN. He denounced the fate of all the empires that ever fell, upon England for her desertion of Crab. He should move that a protection duty be laid on all other apples: it was no consequence that people made wry mouths at him; it was a symptom of bad taste, which time would eradicate.

FIG arose to express his wonderment at the personal allusion to himself in the speech of his honourable friend. He would appeal to the meeting, as to which of the two, APPLE or himself, had done the best service to the human race, as far as histories went. He called on CRAB to explain.

CRAB must decline explaining; what he had said, he had said. It was well known that he it was who first introduced FIG and his friends into public life.—High words ensued, and both parties were ordered into the custody of the proper officers.

SUMMER CABBAGE and RED CABBAGE rose together, but they spent the time allotted to speaking in a squabble as to priority. There was much ill blood also displayed between worthy "Master MUSTARD-SEED" and his old rival, one CHARLOCK; MUSTARD was evidently very hot-headed.

MEDLAR next caught the eye of the Chairman. As time was pressing, he would trouble them with a few observations on the change of seasons in England. (Cries of "Question!" and "Go on!") He would be d—d if he'd go on. They must account for the change of climate themselves! MEDLAR sat down evidently much mortified.

The Chairman then arose, and, previously to moving any of the important questions to be submitted, he must be allowed to express his utter abhorrence of those hot beds of corruption, those nurseries of all that is bad, in which jackanapes, calling themselves Melons, were constantly reared. He was a lover of the breath of heaven, and would own himself a very Persian in his adoration of the sun. He was sure he spoke the sentiments of his worthy friend CUCUMBER, whom he had the honour to face.

A variety of resolutions were then put and carried sem com.; said resolutions to be moulded into a petition and presented to the Commons House by any one of the elderly gentlemen before mentioned, who has a seat.

After the Chairman had retired, Deputy-chair CUCUMBER took his place, and proceeded, in a lengthy harangue, to prove the ability of the worthy Chairman—and his own eloquence. In proof, he said, of the respectability of the meeting, he needed only to remind those present of their honourable President, Alderman MELON, whose propriety of conduct and high connections were unimpeachable. In proceeding, the speaker had occasion to direct all eyes to the galleries, in an appeal to their fair occupants, when—shall I proceed—the object of his commendation was observed seated in very familiar chat with Mademoiselle ORLEANS, the ripe young plum! This proceeding of MELON's was taken in high dudgeon by the meeting—it was derogatory! it was indecorous! ELDER-BERRY was observed to look black, and LOVE-APPLE turned pale. A tremendous uproar ensued; in the course of which, your reporter was discovered, and unmasked, and a shower of NUTS fell on his pericranium, like hail on the glass of a green-house. What followed is unknown; but it is presumed that gentler councils prevailed in your Reporter's behalf, as he had the satisfaction to find himself this morning in his own bed!

* Keeper of the church moveables and sacred vessels.

He begs to subscribe himself, Sir,
Your devoted and obedient servant,
T. R.

Any further steps taken in this affair shall be instantly communicated.

ENJOYMENTS AND OBSTACLES;

OR HOW TO MAKE CHEAP PLEASURES COST DEAR TO ALL PARTIES.

"Quid tamen ista velt sibi fabula?"

(Her. 2, Act. 218.)

TRAVELLING on horseback in a remote part of the island, I came one day upon a scene of more than ordinary beauty. A gentle slope in the road gradually unfolded to view a tract of country, of no vast extent indeed, but of a richness and luxuriance not to be surpassed. Spacious meadows divided by hedges full of flowers and song, long fresh grass giving pasture to fat cattle, venerable trees, like aged fathers, spreading forth their charitable arms, and a fine broad river holding its royal course through the midst of all, formed a tout ensemble nowhere to be met but in "merry England." Nor was the next object that presented itself less pleasant nor less English. Many of our prospects in this life are observed to begin well, yet "end"—they say, "in smoke;" but there is one prospect which begins in smoke, and is nevertheless cheering and delightful from the beginning to the end. This is the approach to a country village. First the smoke, then half a cottage seen through trees, then voices, then a cart, then a red sign across a road, severally confirm the joyful assurance which imparts new spirit to man and horse, as they shorten the distance that separates them from their resting place.

Having reached the inn and refreshed myself, I went out on foot to enjoy the scenery a little more at leisure. After pursuing the line of the road for a short way, I reached an eminence from which I again caught a view of the river, the beautiful pastures on either side, and rich wood beyond. Feeling inclined for a pleasant ramble, I began to look about for a stile or a break in the hedge, by which I might quit the road. But stile there was none, and for the hedge, though I tried at various points to effect a passage, I only succeeded in stinging my hands with the nettles, and tearing my clothes amongst the briars. The sight of a gateway a little further on presently relieved me; I proceeded towards it, but to my disappointment, instead of affording the accommodation I looked for, it was fenced round about with brambles in such a manner as to form a barrier impenetrable as the hedge itself. My spirit of opposition began to be roused; I had wished before, now I was resolved to get into the fields; at first my idea was simply to saunter along the hedge-row, and listen to the birds, now I began to think of nothing less than piercing the wood, and exploring the banks of the river. And as "where there's a will there's a way," I did not fail to invent the means which the genius loci refused, and soon found myself placed within reach of all the beautiful objects I had been admiring.

My first movement was in the direction of the wood, which I felt disposed to visit partly from the heat of the day, and partly for the sake of botanical research. I had only entered it a few minutes, when I heard some rustling among the bushes near to me, and the next moment two men each with a gun in his hand, started up in confusion, and scampering off at full speed, were almost instantly out of sight. Reaching the spot from which they had issued, I found a hare, two rabbits, and a brace or two of partridges on the ground, besides several articles of use lying strewed about, which sufficiently convinced me that the men were poachers who had, no doubt, mistaken me for a gamekeeper, and preferred flight to encounter.

This reminded me that I was myself trespassing, and having no wish to meet with gamekeepers at that moment, nor to be convicted of poaching on circumstantial evidence, I retreated whence I came, and taking another course, made towards a long sloping field which I saw at some distance, and from which I promised myself I should behold some points of the prospect to peculiar advantage. So I should if I could have obtained entrance to it, but upon a nearer approach, I found it was separated from me by a stone wall mounted with broken glass. As I stood looking up in disappointment at this mortifying obstruction, I caught the voices of two boys at the other side talking to one another in a low tone, and from the few words I could overhear, I found they were secretly discussing and arranging the best means of capturing something—but whether birds-nests or apples, I could not ascertain.

Proceeding along by the side of the wall, I reached the river. Here two objects caught my attention; the first was a crowd of little naked boys, some in the water, some running about on the banks, some dressing; and the second was a printed board, on which "Notice was given that all persons found bathing in that part of the river," and so forth, should be "punished with the utmost rigour of the law." The boys did not appear to see me, and really they were in such evident enjoyment of perfect happiness that I wished them not to see me, for fear they should take me for the author of that awful proclamation, and be put to flight in consequence. Therefore I evaded their notice, and pursued the river in the contrary direction.

Having proceeded the distance of about half a mile, I came in sight of an angler who was seated in full employ, with all the nicemackery of his amusement about him, and so absorbed in what he was doing that I came close behind him without his perceiving me. "What sport, to day?" I said, by way of opening the conversation. Taken by surprise, he gave such a start that I thought he would have tumbled into the water. Upon seeing me, his face, at first full of perplexity, relaxed into an easier expression, and upon my begging that I might not disturb him, he said, "Oh no, sir, you don't disturb me. I perceive you are a stranger," and he resumed his rod. But his manner convinced me that he was where he had no business to be, and that when surprised by my approach he had imagined he was detected. He probably anticipated that I should make this inference, for he presently urged me with many entreaties to accept of some fish, which I could not help looking upon as a kind of hush-money.

It was now getting late, and I began to turn my steps towards the inn, following the directions of my friend the angler, who took the greatest pains to oblige me, and gave me all possible instruction respecting lanes and fields. Nevertheless I experienced all the same kind of difficulties and obstructions on my return that had beset me before. High fences, fortified gates, stone walls, broken glass, &c., that might almost make one suppose the country was invaded by an enemy, encountered me in all directions. Having made my way through one of the inclosures, I just perceived, as I was leaving it, that "spring-guns and man-traps" were "set in these grounds," and had to be grateful for having neither been killed nor maimed for life, in the course of my walk. It was nine o'clock when I reached the inn, where, after paying a visit to the manager, I sat down to my own supper, in company with two or three other persons; my host soon added himself to the party, of which I was not sorry, since he seemed as willing to give information as I was to receive it.

"Yours is a beautiful part of the country," I said.

"Yes, sir; our travellers always admire it."

"But it seems we are only intended to peep and go on," I continued; "I never saw grounds so determinedly closed up, so hermetically sealed against all entrance."

"Why, sir, there's plenty of fences and such like," said my host, "but between ourselves I don't see much use they are of, for our people hereabouts are a queer set; night or day abber out of the preserves, always after mischief, and my lord might as well try to shut the birds out of his park as them."

In reply to my inquiries, he informed me that the surrounding lands were divided between two proprietors, a noble earl and an M. P., whose estates joined each other; that they were both of them considered proud and oppressive masters; were rigid conservators of every exclusive right, and immoderately severe to all offenders.

"Nevertheless, now, I think there's not so much poaching in all the rest of the county as there is three miles round my house," said my host.

"Nor so much sheep-stealing," said a little fat man, who sat smoking his pipe in an opposite corner.

"Nor so much trout caught without a license," exclaimed another person.

"Nor so many corn fields trampled down," added a farmer.

"Nor so much mischief done altogether," summed up my host.

The same night I was roused out of my sleep by a noise in the house, and upon inquiring in the morning what had been the cause of the disturbance, learnt that some travellers had called to give information that murder had been committed in the neighbourhood, and it was subsequently found that a desperate affray had taken place between a party of poachers and two gamekeepers, in which a man had been killed on both sides, and a third lay so grievously wounded that his life was despaired of.

Next day I proceeded on my journey.—I had travelled without stopping ever since an early hour, and it was now evening, a glowing autumnal sun almost verging on the horizon, when on reaching the summit of a steep hill I again came in for a prospect which seized me with delight. But the character of the scenery was in every respect totally different from that before which I had paused the previous day. Instead of highly cultivated grounds and rich plantations, a wild expanse of heath lay before me, without a single vestige of human life or human habitation, but beautiful in its rudeness, and glorious in its freedom. All hill and dale, you could fancy that the sea during a storm had been suddenly transmuted with all its waves into so much solid land, Heath and fern and the mountain violet, and the little harebell were to be seen on every side mingling their pleasant company, and what contributed above all to the fine wild character of the scene, various clumps of noble fir trees from different parts of the heath moved their stately heads at one another. The blue margin of distant hills crowned a picture nearly panoramic. I don't know how it was, but I felt no particular desire to stray from my path just then; I say I don't know how, for I own it occurred to me as a strange thing that I should not. The day before, when it was as much as ever I could do to get off the road at all, I seemed to have taken a special fancy for rambling; now, with miles of open country before me, I seemed content to enjoy the prospect without exploring it.

After pausing thus for a few minutes to satiate my admiration, I moved slowly forwards over a little strong road that crossed the heath, looking to the right and to the left at every step, that nothing in that exquisite scene might escape me. One thing remarkable soon excited my observation; this was the amazing number of hares and rabbits, that sported about the bushes like children in a nursery; nor seemed less trusting, for they frequently came within a yard of me; and one or two of them even ran under the horses' legs. Yet I never attempted to strike them down, nor did I feel any disposition for pursuit, as I do not frequently go after game. I should not think it worth while to remark this circumstance, but that I am obliged to confess, that, on the preceding day, excited, perhaps, by the example of the men whose successful exploits in the wood I had been a witness to, and partly, I fancy, because every prize is "sweeter for the theft," I did aim a blow, though without effect, at a rabbit that sprang up near me. Proceeding a little further I began to catch the delicious music of moving water that more and more audibly bubbled and tumbled until I reached what proved to be a vigorous mountain stream, clear, fresh, joyous as youth, in which I counted a greater number of the finest trout and gudgeon within a few seconds than I ever remembered to have seen before. I had sympathized on the former day in the pleasures both of the bathers and the angler, and could very willingly have joined either of them; but, ample as the means of indulgence now were, it so happened that I did not experience the same inclination. I seemed to be too grateful for all that I might do, to do any thing.

I had now nearly cleared the heath, and was approaching a few humble dwellings that lay on the borders of it, when I came up with a hearty intelligent-looking old man, whom I found binding faggots on the road-side.

"Good evening, father," I said, "I presume you belong to this hamlet; if so, I could wish to follow your employment for the sake of its situation."

"It is a pleasant country, sir," he replied.

"Aye, that it is," said I, "and what a famous rabbit warren you have got, and what a famous trout stream! Yet one thing strikes me as very remarkable; pray tell me, is the heath always so free from visitors as I see it to-day? I should have expected it would be filled with people from morning till night, considering all that it affords; instead of which I have not met a single human being for the last four miles. But it is not usually so, I fancy?"

"Why, sir, you see, we are rather lonely," said he, "I don't think more than a dozen people come over the heath all the week through. To be sure there's a few sporting gentlemen generally visit us for a few days in the season, and we pick up a little money amongst us by serving them with victuals and things, but there's nobody comes about here, sir, in a regular way."

After a few further inquiries I parted from the old man, and getting into the main road again, started off at a round pace in hopes to reach the next town before nightfall.

But may not this example, thought I when I had leisure to reflect, furnish an evidence in favour of that liberty, which is only demanded rudely because it is withheld arrogantly? Is it in the nature of man to commit outrages when in a state of enjoyment? No. Then make men happy, and fear not to make them free. Our desires increase in an inverse ratio to their indulgence.

A pleasure hung out of our reach, acquires to our imagination a new and peculiar excellence, a relish that it had not before; the wish grows to a want, the want becomes a necessity. Let those who are in authority show themselves intent upon opposing our inclinations, and the result is, that we are incited to seek after and to demand much more than we should otherwise have thought of. A mighty power, that ought to sleep, was awakened the other day; that popular indignation, which could not be long withstood.* The machinations of its opposers were set at naught, their threats were laughed at, their power openly defied, and we all know the consequences. It is the same in small things as in great. Let blessings which can be bestowed on all, be liberally bestowed, and they will be enjoyed peacefully and in moderation. Where much is granted, little is abused. We are a fidgety and fanciful people: therefore, while we hear of privileges and advantages that are not for us, we set no bounds to our opinion of their importance; we are likewise a determined and powerful people, therefore, when we have set our hearts upon an object, no matter what it is, that object, by hook or crook, cost us what it may, we follow and obtain; but, lastly, we are a just and reasonable people; therefore, when we see we are in possession of our proper comforts and our proper freedom, we shall know we have got all that we need have, and feel no desire left but to live together in peace and obey the laws. TABLE-TALK.

QUEEN ELIZABETH.—In her evasive answers to the commons in reply to their petitions to her majesty to marry, she has employed an energetic word. "Were I to tell you that I did not mean to marry, I might say less than I did intend; and were I to tell you that I do mean to marry, I might say more than it is proper for you to know; therefore I give you an answer, Answerless I—D'Iscardi."

A PEDIGREE OF BOMB STANDING.—The newspapers speak of a descendant of the great Chinese philosopher Confucius, now living at the remote period from his ancestors of nearly 2400 years! for Confucius was contemporary with Pythagoras! Socrates came a little after him. Here is a pedigree! When this gentleman hears of the old families in Europe, he must look upon them as people of yesterday. He is a magistrate of the humbler order, but has no other rank. His descent, however, is so much respected, that whenever he visits the neighbouring town, the governor orders the gates to be thrown open; an honour, which the worthy magistrate has the modesty to decline.

IVY DOES NOT MAKE HOUSES DAMP.—I was some time in the last summer, with a number of others, inspecting the repairs of a public building from the western gable of which (by the way, the part most exposed in our climate to rain and storm) a complete covering of ivy, of several years growth, had been unnecessarily just cut and torn down; when I observed that this was a most unwise and uncalled for proceeding. At my opinion respecting it, the gentlemen present expressed surprise, saying that it must occasion internal damp; all, with the exception of one,—who agreeing in opinion with me, said that the driest part of his house was that which was many years covered with ivy, and that it was evident that this must be the case, as the inside part of the ivy by the wall was covered with cobwebs, and just as dry in the wettest weather as the back of a stove; which, as I then and frequently before observed, was a natural consequence easily accounted for, from the self-evident facts, that the ivy leaves, hanging one over another from the ground to its highest points of ascent, not only prevent the rain beating against the wall, but carry away the drip from it, and that the small clasping fibres which the ivy shoots into the crevices of the wall to support its ascent, acting like so many roots thirsting for the nourishment of moisture, must draw away any occasional damp which the walls might be naturally supposed to imbibe or attract from the earth or the atmosphere. In addition to the foregoing observations, I shall merely say, that the wall of the room in which I sleep, which is exposed to the north-west, and was some years since exceedingly damp, being neither externally plastered, rough-cast, nor weather-slatted, is, for the few last years, since nature has clothed it in a delightful evergreen coat of ivy, perfectly dry: nay, even the glass and frame of the upper window-sash, which I suffered the ivy to cover for a year or two, I found, on removing it, in the last summer, covered with dry dust and cobwebs, and without the smallest appearance of having ever been wet through their verdant cloak.—Communicated by Charles A. Drew, Esq., to the Magazine of Botany and Gardening, edited by Professor Rennie.

The Sugar Cane in Leicestershire.—A friend, lately returned from a journey in the North, informs us, that in sinking for coal at a mine on the estate of Mr. Stevenson, the celebrated engineer, at Whitwick, in Leicestershire, a very curious and perfect specimen of petrified sugar-cane has been dug up, having all the knots and marks of the reed perfectly obvious to sight. We have ourselves seen a small fragment of it, which, except in point of colour and substance, seems to have lost little of its original nature in the course of transformation. This is another evidence added to the many that have been before adduced, in favour of the theory, now pretty generally adopted, we believe, which makes this world to have undergone an imperceptible revolution in the course of ages, gradually converting the character of its various climates from hot to cold, and from cold to hot, and thus more and more shifting its axis, until, for aught we know, Arctic and Antarctic may change places, sandy deserts harden into a surface for the reception of Polar bears; iceburghs melt into streams that shall float the negro's bark; nay, all this may have happened before! The shadows of B itons may not always have fallen to the north. At any rate, it appears unquestionable that this country did once enjoy a larger share of the sun's favours than it does at this day; that things grew and creatures lived in the land, which now grow and live far to the South, and which shrink from the present climate of England, whenever a reconciliation is attempted, as if "old acquaintance was forgot." All things seem to tend to this conviction, and the above is a further testimony in its favour. Let us hope that if the world is thus turned about to the sun, and genially toasted in successive quarters all round, a time may come, in the progress of ages and the stars (which are also understood to be moving forward somewhere) when the globe we live on shall be completely done; not in the present bad sense of the word, but the good old toasting one; and that the earth, knowledge, and happiness will be all ripe together. We may arrive, however, at that consummation without all being tropical.

A COMPLETE, YET PUZZLING ANSWER.—"Did you or did you not speak of me, sir, the other night?" said a peremptory gentleman to a fellow collegian, (now eminent in the state.) "I did or did not speak of you," said the respondent.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much devoted to technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Popular Library of Instruction" will for the future be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

old religion of the season, and heaping ourselves and our children with blossom enough to make a bower of the breakfast-room: so that we only preach what we have practised. If we were happy, it added to our happiness, and was like a practical hymn of gratitude. If we were unhappy, it helped to save our unhappiness from the addition of impatience and despair; and we looked round upon the beautiful country, and the world of green and blossom, and said to ourselves, "We can still enjoy these. We still belong to the paradise of good-will."

Therefore we say to all good-willers, "Enjoy what you can of May-time, and help others to enjoy it, if it be but with a blossom, or a verse, or a pleasant thought. Let us all help, each of us, to keep up our spark of the sacred fire—the same, we may dare to believe, which fires the buds themselves, and the song of the birds, and puts the flush into the cheek of delight, and hope, faith, and charity into the heart of men: for if one great cause of love and good-will does not do this, what does, or what can?"

May, or the time of the year analogous to it, in different countries, is more or less a holiday in all parts of the civilized world, and has been such from time immemorial. Nothing but the most artificial state of life can extinguish, or suspend it: it is always ready to return with the love of nature. Hence the vernal holidays of the Greeks and Romans, their songs of the swallow, and vigils of the Goddess of love; hence the Beltein of the Celtic nations, and the descent of the god Krishna upon the plains of Indra, where he sported, like a proper Eastern prince, with sixteen-thousand milk-maids; a reasonable assortment.

In no place in the world, perhaps, but in England (which is another reason why so great and beautiful a country should get rid of the disgrace), is the remnant of the May-holiday reduced to so melancholy a burlesque as our soot and tinsel. The necessities of war and trade may have produced throughout Europe a suspension of the main spirit of the king, and a consciousness that the means of enjoyment must be restored before there can be a proper return to it. We hope and believe, that when they are restored, the enjoyment will be greater than ever, through the addition of taste and knowledge. But meanwhile, we do not believe that the sense of its present imperfection has been suffered anywhere else, to fall to a pitch so low. In Tuscany, where we have lived, it has still its guitar and its song; and its jokes are on pleasant subjects, not painful ones. We remember being awakened on May-day morning, at the village of Mariano near Fiesole, by a noise of instruments, and merry voices, in the court of the house in which we lodged,—a house with a farm and vineyard attached to it, where the cultivator, or small farmer, lived in a smaller detached dwelling, and accounted to the proprietor for half the produce,—a common arrangement in that part of the world. The air which was played and sang was a sort of merry chaunt, as old perhaps as the time of Lorenzo de Medicis; the words to it were addressed to the occupiers of the mansion, and the neighbours, or any body who happened to shew their face; and they turned upon an imaginary connexion between the qualities of the person mentioned and the capabilities of the season. We got up, and looked out of window; and there, in the beautiful Italian morning, under a blue sky, amidst grass and bushes, and the white out-houses of the farm, stood a group of rustic guitar-players, joking good humouredly upon every one who appeared, and welcomed as good humouredly by the person joked upon. The verses were in homely couplets; and the burden or leading idea of every couplet, was the same. A respectable old Jewish gentleman, for instance, resided there; and he no sooner shewed his face, than he was accosted as the patron of the corn-season,—as the genial influence, without whom there was to be no bread!

Ora di Maggio fiorisce il grano,
Ma non può estrarre senza il Sior Abramo.

Now in May time comes the corn; but, quoth he, though come I am,
I should never have been here, but for Signor Abraham.

A lady put forth her pretty laughing face (and a most good tempered woman she was). She is hailed as the goddess of the May-bush.

Ora di Maggio viene il fior di spina,
Ma non viene senza la Signora Allegrina.

Now in May-time comes the bush, all to crown its queen—
But it never would, without Signora Allegrina.

A poor fellow, a servant, named Giuseppino or Peppino (Joe) who was given to drinking (a rare thing in Italy) and was a great admirer of the fair sex (a thing not so rare) crosses the court with a jug in his hand. It was curious to see the conscious but not resentful face with which he received the banter of his friends.

Ora di Maggio fiorisce amor e vino,
Ma ni l'un ni l'altro senza il Sior Peppino.

Now in May time comes the flower of love and wine also;
But there is neither one nor t'other, without Signor Joe.

With this true bit of a taste of May for the reader's ruminations, we close our present article. It would be an "advancement" to look out of a May-morning in England, and see guitar players instead of chimney-sweeps.

FIRST WEEK IN MAY.

We have anticipated in our first article, the remarks on the season under this head. We can add little for the present, except to say, that the first week of May is full of human as well as other glory; for on the fourth day of the month, according to the necessary allowance made for the change from Old to New Style, was born Fielding; and on the fifth was born SHAKESPEARE. We write his name large, that we may sound it with what trumpet we can, being unable to indulge ourselves with saying more. We only wish we could lift it in flame and beauty upon every house in England, the most universal of illuminations, as he was of poets. And Fielding, who was a bit of a prose Shakespeare too, and whose Parson Adams Shakespeare would have loved, should have his illuminations also.

As we spoke of electricity in our last, and nature is beginning to luxuriate now, and to electrify us (according to the philosophers,) in more ways than we are aware of, we shall follow up our "sympathies of the silk stockings," with a subject of extraordinary capillary attraction from the pages of a work just published, written by Mr. Peter Cunningham, a surgeon in the navy, author of the well-known "Two Years in New South Wales."

Mr. Cunningham is evidently a man of a very quick, exploring, and active turn of mind, but whether he does not take a little too much for granted in some of his promises, and indulge his vivacity and vigour in too great, kangaroo-like leaps over his ground, clearing away more distance than objection, may be made a doubt. At all events, he is very startling and entertaining; and wherever electricity is concerned, especially in the hands of so bold an investigator, one always feels somewhat in the situation of the people who were present at the dissection of the galvanized dead body, which rose up and seemed about to speak. We hardly know what astounding secrets are not about to be laid open to us. It is but fair to recollect, that the strangeness and apparent ludicrousness of a continuation of ideas in philosophical statements is no disproof of their soundness; however, ingenuity without proof, may be no proof of the right of asserting them. Mr. Cunningham is, doubtless, content, that we should be amused as well as astonished at the coveries he reports to us respecting the connexion between a man's hat and his conceptions, and the necessity of giving a rub to one's hair in order to brush up our faculties.

"Electro-magnetism is most readily attracted, as well as carried off, by pointed substances; and hence, the readiness with which the human body is heated or cooled by simply exposing the hands or the feet (pointed substances) to the fire or the cool air. The air is also a pointed substance; and as nothing was made by the Great Creator in vain, we may be assured that use, and not ornament, was the purpose for which it was intended, and that the above purpose was that of transmitting electro-magnetism to the body, our own feelings, as well as reasoning from facts, daily presented to our view, sufficiently convince us of. To what else can we ascribe that writhing and creeping, as well as bristling-up kind of sensation in the hair of the head, universally felt when strong emotions move us, and so frequently alluded to by poets and pencilled by painters? To what else can we ascribe the curious fact of every diseased blotch or pimple in cutaneous affections, having invariably a hair in its centre, or of the hair of the head being bleached white by great mental emotion in a single night, a circumstance so analogous to the destruction of vegetable colours by the electro-magnetic currents of the galvanic trough, as to leave scarce a doubt of the hair owing the sudden destruction of its colour to similar currents rushing through it."

"The different colours and constitutions of the hair in different people must necessarily have an important influence upon the mind and the temperament, on account of the different proportions of electricity and magnetism which the above coloured hairs transmit, and the different rapidities with which they transmit them. In the woolly head of the negro the Creator has drawn a distinct line of difference between the black and white races; for wool being a bad electric conductor, his brain is therefore supplied with but a bare electric sufficiency to make the mental line between him and the next order of animals broadly visible, while the abundance of straight regularly constituted hair over his body shows his corporeal powers to equal at least those of the white, inferior though his mental powers be. The curly state of his head hair is attributable, I conceive, to the above more difficult electric introduction, the electricity naturally twisting it about in the efforts to make an entrance, and thus eventually regulating its form. If the negro race, therefore, are ever to be elevated much above their present state, it must be by submitting themselves to the tutelage of less woolly and curly heads than their own, as the better haired Indians of Peru found it their interest to do with the golden-haired children of the Sun, the value of whose hair they so highly appreciated as to endeavour to preserve it by severe laws, prohibiting their incas intermarrying with any but the golden-haired stock. Black bodies having a strong electric affinity, by means of which they transmit electricity more readily than any other species of colour; hence dark haired people, as well as animals, are observed to be harder than the white haired, from their bodies being kept in a more equable temperature, in consequence of the readiness with which electricity can be acquired and parted with; while the tardy escape of it through the bad-conducting white hair, is apt to throw the body into an inflammatory fever, when any violent bodily exertions are made. The black haired will then also be enabled to rouse their mental energies more suddenly, and to a higher pitch of excitement, as well as to cool them down more rapidly than the white-haired, who receiving electricity slowly are slowly excited, and by also parting with it slowly, are slowly cooled."

The Celtic and other dark-haired races are therefore, I conceive, capable of excitement to higher pitches of intellectual energy than the Gothic, fair-haired race; but, then, the electricity exciting these, being as readily parted with as received, renders this excitement to be as easily dissipated as it was conjured up, preventing them, then, from mastering any great object requiring a continued effort of the mind, like the fair-haired Goths, who, when once excited, can keep this excitement more steadily up, from the greater power they have of retaining the electricity on which it depends. As white hairs, however, progressively grizzle the head of the dark-haired man, his judgment and perseverance progressively increase also, until the white hairs gain too great an ascendancy over the dark; while the minds of the fair-haired are generally at the highest pitch of energy when middle age commences. A mingling of the blood of the two races must naturally, therefore, generate a cross breed blending the qualities of the two; and, I believe it will be found that to this cross-breed we are indebted for the greater portion of the highest works in literature, science, and art. On the Continent, the authors of the above have been principally born at no great distance on either side of the Rhine, where these two races have mingled most, the far north or far south on either side (except Spain, from Gothic invasion), have produced few men to compare with the medium between, and even those few might be cross breeds. In England, nearly all the eminent men have been natives of the country south of the Trent, where the Celtic or Roman blood has been more intermingled; while, in the northern parts, where the purer Gothic prevails, although there has been little distinguished talent, yet there has always been more general good sense, good judgment, and prudential, peaceful behaviour than in the south, than of late years, when the greater Celtic intermixture in the various parts, has engendered a more combustible spirit among them. Wales has produced no very eminent original genius; Ireland cannot boast of one with an initial Celtic O' or Mac; and nearly all the Scottish men of note have Saxon names. While, however, the improvers of the inferior animals, have already benefitted them immensely by scientific crossings, the improvement of the first of all, man, has been left wholly to chance, by which his mental and muscular powers have not been advanced in proportion to those of the brute creation over whom he rules. Speaking more nationally, were the dark-haired Celts of the United Kingdom but whitened with a dash of the fairer Saxon, and the latter again enbrowned with a dash of the former, a great improvement would be effected in both; the Saxon would have more life infused into him, and the Celt more judgment and prudence.

The effects of intense electric transmission causing an early whitening of the hair of those addicted to much mental thought, or in whose minds grief or anxiety have sown their cackling seeds, is curiously exemplified by the head of hair insulated by the hat retaining its colour longer than the hair not so insulated; thus the hair upon the temples and other parts not covered by the hat becomes grey much earlier than that over the places covered by it: the hair upon the latter, however, falling off much sooner, on account of the electric-magnetism which retains it in vigour, and for whose transmission it was solely formed, no longer obtaining a passage in sufficient quantity through it. In woman, on the contrary, grey hairs not only make their appearance less early, but are nearly equally diffused, at the commencement of the blanching over every part of the head; on account of their more porous and airy head-dresses admitting a freer electro-magnetic access to every portion of the head hair. But this is not the worst as regards man, for as reason leads us to believe that the brain was divided into different parts performing different functions, which parts must necessarily receive as well as emit the electro-magnetism on which their excitements depend through their immediate hairy coverings, so by the insulation (imperfect though it may be) of these cerebral parts, they will not only be prevented from obtaining that puberty, if I may so term it, which they would otherwise have arrived at, but have their functions impeded and weakened whenever covered by the hat. Every man must have often felt how much clearer his ideas flow when his head is uncovered, than when his hat is on, which he instinctively finds necessary to lift up every now and then, and give his hair a rub, in order to make them glide brighter and smoother along. Oily substances, by their electric attractions and magnetic repulsions causing electricity to prevail over magnetism in the bodies conducting the latter, hence the benefit which the hair derives by unctuous applications to it when it begins to dry up through long continued or intense electro-magnetic transmission, which fitting it to be a better magnetic conductor than an electric one, enables it now to conduct in greater quantity the very substance eventually destined to effect its destruction.

Mr. Cunningham's speculations on hair conclude with the startling announcement, enough to make all elderly gentlemen's locks stand on end, (till they get colouring bottles to allay them,) that grey hairs are not a consequence, but a cause of age. He treats age rather as a disease than a necessity, at least under its present circumstances; a proposition to which there can be no objection, provided he will find a cure for it. And to speak seriously as well as in levity, we are among those who are for seeing no end to philosophical speculations, however startling. Truth and advancement profit by them, somehow or other. There are very startling things in the philosophy of Bacon; and some of Lord Worcester's speculations, accounted the most impossible, are becoming common-place now.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

VIII.—MADAME VILLACERFE AND MONSIEUR FESTEAT.

THIS story has been related a long time ago by one of our classical authors; but it is worth repeating, partly because it is told with real earnestness and in his style, by the present writer, and partly because he obtained his particulars from a connexion with one of the parties. The catastrophe is one of the most affecting in the world. Nothing can be conceived more frightful than the situation of the lover, both before and after the death of his mistress. One almost wishes that she had been less amiable and generous, or affected to be so; and thus have given him less occasion to adore her memory, and despair over his mistake.

Madame Villacerfe, was a French lady of noble family, dignified character, and unblemished life, whose remarkable and tragic death was distinguished by an evenness of temper and greatness of mind, not usual in her sex, and equal to the most renowned heroes of antiquity. The short history of this excellent woman is, I believe, generally known, and will probably be recognized by many of my readers; but she is so striking an example of philosophic suffering, Christian fortitude, generous forbearance, and angelic love, without the least possible alloy of selfishness or sensuality, that the affecting circumstance cannot, in my opinion be dwelt on too long, or repeated too often.

An early and mutual affection had taken place between this lady and Monsieur Festeau, a surgeon of eminence in Paris, but from the insurmountable obstacles which in those days (A. D. 1700) so strictly guarded superior rank from intermingling with plebeian blood, all further intercourse was prevented than animated civilities when opportunities offered, and soft but secret wishes. The lover would have perished rather than by a rash proceeding degrade the object of his tenderest affections in the eyes of her family and the world, and his mistress, taught by love, the omnipotent leveller of all distinctions, though she felt too powerfully the merit of her admirer, who in the scale of unprejudiced reason far outweighed a thousand fashionable pretenders to frivolous accomplishments and superficial attainment; resolved

After some years past in what may be called a defeat rather than a struggle of the passions; after a glorious victory of duty and honour; which surely affords a durable and exalted pleasure far beyond the gratification of wild wishes and misguided appetites, Madame Villacerfe from an indisposition which confined her to her chamber, was, by the prescription of her physician ordered to be bled. Festeau, as surgeon to the family, was sent for, and his countenance, as he entered the room, strongly exhibited the state of his mind. After gently touching her pulse, and a few professional questions, in a low hesitating voice, he prepared for the operation by tucking up that part of a loose dress which covered her arm; an interesting business to a man of fine feelings, who had long laboured under the most ardent attachment to his lovely patient, whose illness diffused an irresistible softness over her features, and lighted up the embers of an affection, suppressed, but never extinguished. Pressing the vein, in order to render it more prominent, he was observed to be seized with a sudden tremor, and to change his colour; this circumstance was mentioned to the lady, not without a fear that it might prevent his bleeding her with his usual dexterity. On her observing, with a smile, that she confided entirely in Monsieur Festeau, and was sure he had no inclination to do her an injury, he appeared to recover himself, and smiling, or forcing a smile, proceeded to his work, which was no sooner performed, than he cried out,—"I am the most unfortunate man alive! I have opened an artery instead of a vein."

It is not easy to describe his distraction or her composure. In less than three days the state of her arm in consequence of the accident, rendered amputation necessary, when so far from using her unhappy surgeon with the peevish resentment of a bare and little mind, she tenderly requested him not to be absent from any consultation on the treatment of her case; ordered her will to be made, and after her arm was taken off, symptoms appearing which convinced Festeau and his associates, that less than four-and-twenty hours would terminate the existence of one who was an ornament to her sex. The voice, the looks, the stifled anguish of her lover, as well as of her own feelings, convinced her of the approaches of death, an opinion which her earnest and solemn entreaties, entreaties on her death-bed, not to be disregarded, obliged her friends to confirm. A few hours before the awful moment of dissolution, that period which none can escape, and the fear of which bold bad men only affect to despise, she addressed the disconsolate surgeon in the following words:—

"You give me inexpressible concern for the sorrow in which I see you overwhelmed, notwithstanding your kind efforts to conceal it. I am removing, to all intents and purposes I am removed from the interests of human life, it is, therefore, highly incumbent in me to think and act like one wholly unconcerned in it. I feel not the least resentment or displeasure on the present occasion. I do not consider you as one by whose error I have lost my life; I regard you rather as a benefactor, who have hastened my entrance into a blessed immortality. But the world may look upon the accident, which, on your account alone, I can call unfortunate, and mention it, to your disadvantage. I have, therefore, provided in my will against any thing you may have to dread from the ill-will, the prejudices, or the selfish representations of mankind."

This pattern for Christians, this example for heroes, soon after expired. A judicial sentence, devoting his fortune to confiscation, and his body to exquisite tortures, could not have produced keener sensations of misery and horror, than Festeau felt during her address, which was an emanation of celestial benignity, an anticipatory revelation, a divine ray from the spirit of that God who inspired and loved her, and in whose presence she was shortly to triumph and adore.

But when he contemplated her exalted goodness and unparalleled magnanimity in suffering pain and mortal agonies, inflicted by an unhappy man, who of all others, loved and doated on her most, when he saw her dying look, and heard that groan, which is repeated no more; sick of the world, dispirited with human life and its vain pursuits, angry beyond forgiveness with himself, he sunk into the settled gloom, and long melancholy of despair.

This is one of the many instances in which a little forethought, and a small share of prudence, would have prevented such serious evil and irretrievable calamity. I have said in a former article, that love, though not curable by herbs, may be prevented by caution, and as it was impossible that Madame Villacerfe's relations could be entire strangers to the partiality of Monsieur Festeau, they should industriously have prevented all intercourse between the young people. The agitated frame and deranged appearance of her lover, observed previous to the catastrophe, by a gentleman nearly related to the lady, from whom I tell the story, pointed him out as the most improper man alive for medical or surgical assistance, which requires coolness, dexterity, and a steady hand, and a collected mind.

IX.—A PRINCE AGAINST HIS WILL.

ACCORDING to our former dramatic fashion, we again give a farce after our tragedy. The hero is not a farcical man himself; he is very much of a gentleman, and was an unwilling contributor to the entertainment, the obstinate comedy of which was ultimately as ludicrous and amusing to himself, as it is to his readers. The anecdote is taken from the journey of the Hon. Keppel Craven in the Neapolitan territory.

There are several monasteries in Brindisi; in the church belonging to one of these, called Santa Maria degli Angeli, I was directed to visit and admire a very fine piece of carving in ivory. After I had bestowed my tribute of praise on this piece of workmanship, and on the pulpit, which is gilt and richly decorated in very good taste, I was requested by a priest to favour the Lady Abbess and some of her sisterhood with my presence at the grate, which divides the church from the convent. I complied, and after a short conversation in the course of which, joy at seeing me, respect towards my person, and gratitude to my family, were declared in the most extraordinary terms; I was entreated to go round to the interior gate and accept of some refreshments. I found from my host and the Sotto Intendente of the town, who were my companions, that I could not decline accepting this civility. In my way to the gate, the unexpected cordiality of this reception was explained to me by the information, that this convent derived its foundation from the illustrious house of Bavaria, and that, as the heir-apparent of the kingdom had lately been expected at Brindisi to embark for Greece, it was probable that the Abbess had taken the first stranger she had ever seen in her life, for the royal personage to whose progenitors the whole community owed such unqualified reverence and gratitude. On my rejoicing the good sisters in the outward part of the monastery, into which they invited me to enter, my first care was to undeceive, and to apologise for having accepted of honours due to rank so much superior to my own. Though evidently much disappointed, their kindness did not abate, and the coffee and cakes which they had prepared were distributed to us with great civility, by the young pensionaries, who received their education in this monastery, and whose beauty and unaffected manners were equally attractive. Having understood that I had the honour of being acquainted with the prince whom they had so anxiously expected, they loaded me with inquiries relative to him, and appeared much satisfied by the manner in which I answered them. After this, I took my leave, as it was almost dark.

Having, on the following morning, completed my tour of the town, and an examination of all it contained worthy of inspection, I determined to set off for Mesagne, only eight miles distant, after dinner to avoid the heat. During the repast, the same priest who had accosted me in the church the preceding day, made his appearance with a second invitation to call upon the abbess and the nuns before I set off, and accept of some refreshments. I endeavoured to decline the proposal thinking it might be the means of retarding my departure; but I was assured it would mortify if not insult the sisterhood, and as their habitation lay in my way out of the city, I might order my horses to the convent door, and not suffer above ten minutes' delay by my complicity; this I accordingly promised and proceeded to the monastery, attended by the gentleman in whose house I had been lodged, and the Sotto Intendente, who had dined with us. We found the outward gate open, and had scarcely passed the threshold when the abbess and the elder portion of the community rushed from the inner court, and led, I may almost say dragged me into the cloister calling upon my astonished companion to follow, as it was a day of exultation for the monastery, and all rules and regulations should be dispensed with. It was evident that the splendour of royalty once again shone on my brow, and that notwithstanding my wish to preserve the strictest incognito, the distinctions and honours due to the blood of Otho of Wittelsbach, must, in this instance at least, be rendered to his descendant, in spite of his assumed humility. This determination shewed itself in a variety of forms, with such prolonged perseverance, that the ludicrous effects which it at first produced were soon succeeded by more serious sensations of impatience and annoyance. Before I could utter my first protest against the torrent of tedious distinction, which I saw impending over my devoted head, I was surrounded on all sides by the pensionaries, who, to the number of thirty, presented me with flowers, and squabbled for precedence in the honours of kissing my princely hands. This was by no means the least distressing ceremony I was to undergo, and for an instant I felt the wish of exerting the prerogatives of royalty, either by prohibiting the exercise of this custom, or render it more congenial by altering the application of it. I seized the first opportunity of requesting my companion to interfere in behalf of my veracity, when I assured them that I was only an English traveller, which my letters of recommendation, describing my name and condition, could testify. The smile of good-humoured incredulity played on the lips of my auditors, who replied that they would not dispute my words, but should not be deterred by them from giving way to the joy which ought to signalize a day which must ever be recorded in the annals of their establishment. They added, that it would be useless for me to contend against the ocular proofs they had obtained of my quality and birth; and when they enumerated among them the air of dignity which I in vain endeavoured to conceal, the visible emotion I experienced on beholding the arms and escutcheons of my ancestors in the church, and my constantly speaking Italian though I affirmed that I was English, I own that I was struck dumb by the contending inclination to laugh or be serious. My host, who was brother to the lady Abbess, begged I would exert my complaisance so far as not to resist their wishes, as it would be put to a shorter trial by compliance than opposition, and I therefore yielded, after a second solemn protestation against the distinctions thus forced upon me. These consisted in a minute examination of the whole monastery.

To quit the object of no common choice,
In mild submission to stern duty's voice,
The much lov'd man with all his claims resign,
And sacrifice delight at duty's shrine.

beginning with the belfry, to which I was conducted by the pious sisterhood, singing a Latin hymn of exultation. I had scarcely put my head into it when a sudden explosion, for I can give it no other term, took place of all the bells, set in motion by the pensionaries who had preceded us; after which, I was successively led to the kitchen, the refectory, the dormitory, Abbess's apartment, the garden, and lastly the sacristy, where I was desirous to rest. I looked round to implore the aid and compassion of my force, when I found myself sitting in a huge crimson velvet chair, richly gilt, and surmounted with a royal crown. Here I again manifested some symptoms of rebellion, but found it necessary to stifle them, when the opening of several large cases informed me that a display of all the relics was going to take place. These were numerous, and, as I was informed chiefly the gifts of my great grandfather when the convent was endowed, though several had been since sent by my less distant progenitors. Bones and skulls of saints, whose names were as new to me as they would be, were they enumerated to the readers, passed in rotation before my eyes: these were generally preserved in purple velvet bags, embroidered with pearls; and the different vessels and ornaments used in the rites of the catholic church, were of the most costly materials, and exquisite workmanship, all of which, by turns, were offered as presents to me.

Among the relics which were named to me, I remember some fragments of the veil and shift of the Virgin Mary, a thumb of St. Athanasius, a tooth of the prophet Jeremiah, and some of the coals which were used to roast St. Lorenzo. Many of these memorials were offered me to kiss, and the last mentioned articles were accompanied by the observation that they had been the means of converting a sceptic by sticking to and blistering his lips; I own I felt a sort of momentary hesitation, as they were presented to me, and withdrew them with a degree of promptitude hardly compatible with a disbelief in their verity.

By this time all the stronger emotions I at first had felt had vanished, and a sullen impatience had succeeded, which was not removed by the presence of the vicar, an infirm old personage, who, I believe, had been called from his death-bed to give additional solemnity to the scene, and who joined the holy sisters in the chorus of praises which they lavished on my family, and the titles they bestowed on me, among which that of majesty was of the most frequent occurrence. After this devotional exhibition, I was crammed with coffee, rosolio, brandy, and cakes, and my pockets were stuffed full of oranges and lemons, among which I afterwards discovered, to my great consternation, a pair of cotton stockings, and two of woollen gloves. After a trial of an hour's duration, I was allowed to depart amidst the blessings of the community, but another ordeal awaited my patience, in a visit to a convent of Benedictine nuns, who were under the special protection of the vicar, and who would, as he assured me, die of jealousy and mortification if I denied them the same honour which I had conferred on those of the Madonna degli Angeli.— Luckily, the order was poor, and as I had not the same claims on their gratitude and reverence, I escaped with fewer ceremonies, and the loss of much less time. There was nothing remarkable in this monastery, except the columns, which surround the cloisters:—they were amongst the smallest, and of a more fantastic construction than any I had ever beheld, and evidently of a very early date.

On leaving this building, I found my horses in the street, where they had been waiting a considerable time; and while taking leave of my companions I began to breathe at the prospect of emancipation from all the painful honours, to which I had fallen a victim, and to anticipate the pleasures of a cool evening ride, when my annoyances were renewed by a speech of the commandants, who, with a solemnity of tone and audibility of voice, calculated to produce the deepest impression on a crowd of about five hundred persons assembled round my horses, informed me, that he had hitherto spared my feelings and controlled his own by avoiding to intrude upon the privacy which I was desirous of assuming, but at the moment of parting he felt justified in giving vent to a public declaration of the sentiments of respect and veneration which he entertained for my family, and those of gratitude he should ever cherish for the truly dignified condescension with which I had treated him. I was speechless, and scarcely collected enough to listen to the conclusion of his harangue, which informed me that he had communicated a telegraphic account of my arrival to the commandant of the district, and would now transmit a similar notification of my departure to the commander in chief, to whom he trusted I would express my satisfaction of his conduct. The last words concluded with a genu-flexion, and a kiss respectfully imprinted on my hand, while I hastily mounted my horse, and hurried from this scene of ludicrous torment, which, however it was decreed should not terminate here; for on looking about me as I quitted the town-gate I beheld my host and the Sotto Intendente on horseback on each side of me, and found that this singular infatuation had extended its power over their minds, and that they were determined to accompany me as far as Mesagne, and thereby leave no honour unperformed which they could bestow on my exalted rank.

On reaching the open plain I resolved to make one more effort to liberate my person from the continuation of this novel kind of persecution, which might, for aught I knew, extend itself over the remainder of my journey; and after another solemn protestation against the name and title thus forcibly imposed upon me, I conjured my two satellites by all that was merciful to give up their project of attending me, representing that the day was far advanced, that we could with difficulty reach Mesagne before dark, and that their return might consequently be attended with great inconvenience, if not danger. My host, who, I then perceived, had too liberally participated in the homage offered me by his sister in the seducing semblance of rosolio and liqueurs, was obstinately bent on non-compliance, and merely answered my earnest remonstrance by a repetition of the words, altesse inutile! I concluded therefore that all appeal to him would be fruitless, and confined my renewal of them to his companion, whose involuntary distortions of countenance, and occasional contortion of body, induced me to suspect that the motion of a horse was very uneasy, if not unusual to him. On my observing that he looked pale since we had begun our ride, he owned that he had not been on horseback for several years, that he was besides in no very robust state of health, and that the paces of the animal he mounted were somewhat rough; but added, that he knew his duty too well to allow such trifling inconvenience to deter him from fulfilling it to its utmost extent, and that he therefore should not attend to my injunctions of returning, unless they were delivered in the form of a peremptory command, which, issuing from the lips of royalty, he would not presume to disobey. For once then I resolved to assume the dictatorial tone of princely authority, and with as grave a countenance as I could put on, ordered him to return to Brindisi. He pulled off his hat, kissed my hand, and after expressing his thanks for my considerate condescension, united to many pious wishes for my prosperous journey, he allowed me to continue it, and turned his horse the other way, while I urged mine on at a brisk trot, in hopes of reaching Mesagne before night.

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 30, 1834.

We desire, in this part of our Journal, to pay all the respect we can to the memory of Mr. Nicholas Gouin Dufief, lately deceased in this country,—a gentleman, whom we had not the honour of knowing personally, nor even in the most important of his writings; but whose laborious career of literary public spirit was encouraged by leading men of all parties, and whose exquisite French and English Dictionary (for we do not hesitate to call it so) would alone give him a claim to the regard of all lovers of knowledge. A book altogether so beautifully “got up” for general use, we never beheld, whether we consider the remarkable abundance of its contents, its utility to all kinds of readers, the most technical included, or the perfection of neatness exhibited in its type, arrangement, and very boarding. Let any body but look into and handle it, and see if we say too much. But what completed the charm of even a Dictionary in our eyes, was the motto which the liberal and spirited man put into the title-page:—

Even the elegant singularity of Mr. Dufief's putting his coat of arms in this title-page, with its motto of Semper Fidelis—Always Faithful (to the Bourbons, to wit) did not disconcert us with its innocent party appearance; for a man, who is really zealous for the good of all his fellow-creatures, as he was, has as much right to his political predilections as to the family affections in which he was brought up; and though we may not agree with this person or that in his estimate of the objects of his predilection, (any more than he with ours), we heartily sympathize with every genuine and honourable feeling about it, and with the colourings of fancy and love which it acquires in passing through his mind. Such men take the common light of day, and turn it, like cathedral windows, into the hues of heaven.

An unknown correspondent, who has our best thanks for the information, tells us that Mr. Dufief was born at Nantes, of a royalist family, who suffered bitterly from the French Revolution, and were driven into exile. His father, a knight of Saint Louis, was one of the last defenders of the royal cause among the noblesse in Brittany; his mother was a kinswoman of the famous general Charette, with whom, like the Du Pins and Joan of Arcs of old, (while her husband was fighting in Germany) she actually served at the head of troops of her own raising, and was present at more than one hundred engagements! Madame Dufief was ultimately obliged to fly with her children into Jersey. M. Nicholas Dufief went to America; and being under the necessity of learning the English language, was led, by the disadvantages he experienced, to turn (like a proper genius in his vocation) those very disadvantages to account, and produced in consequence the system of French tuition which has acquired celebrity under the title of “Nature Displayed in her Mode of Teaching Language to Man,” &c. In this work, to the merit of which we regret that we cannot add the testimony of our own experience (as we never saw it) he is understood to have followed, and worked out, the principles laid down by Locke, Condillac, D’Alembert and other philosophers; and that his work is in no need of the testimony we are unable to give it, is evident from the favourable opinions expressed of it by men of all parties, wherever French and English are studied together, including that of a man who may be said to have been one of the princes of the human race, in talent as well as position, and who was not quick, we believe, to express himself so strongly of people's merit as he did in this instance,—the late American President Jefferson.

Mr. Dufief terminated an anxious, zealous, and useful career on the 12th of the present month, aged fifty-eight years, having fallen ill on the day his Dictionary was completed, and never having recovered the re-action of a want of excitement. He may be considered, “a martyr” (says our correspondent) “to the cause of Education.” He united, we are told, in a rare but most desirable degree, the habits of a punctual and even precise man of business with the most genuine liberality; and though a party-man and a moralist, abhorred persecution for opinion; exhibiting from first to last (to conclude in the words of our authority) “cheerful application instead of desponding complaint; strict honour and independence instead of subterfuge and servility; and a whole life calculated to excite the esteem and grateful recollection of mankind.”

We take this opportunity of observing, that it is a very remarkable, a very noble, and a very new feature of the age we live in, that the ambition of doing good to mankind is taking place of the more egotistical ambitions of former times, and becoming the ordinary characteristic of active and generous intellects, instead of being confined, as it used to be, to a “martyr” here and there. Sincere public zeal, nay, a zeal for the happiness of all men, is no longer thought unworthy of the most practical understandings: all the real intellects even among the most exclusive parties, are gradually venturing forth, if it be but with a tip end of the hand they write with, to warm themselves at this new sunshine of promise for the world; and it is a wrong to all other parties, nay, to those too (for their ultimate good is concerned in it,) to conceal from the struggling classes the honourable and feeling testimony borne to those who adorn them by the generous enthusiasm of some of the aristocracy. The following tribute to the rising empire of knowledge, with the noble couplet at the end of it, is from a poem written by a man of birth as well genius, who only wants to have given more way to his impulses as a writer, to show how real a spirit of poetry as well as generosity belongs to him. He is speaking of the metropolis.

Wisdom is in her halls: to none refused
Are Wisdom's precious gifts as heretofore,
When clerks their knowledge selfishly misused:
All may the tracts of science now explore:
Perish the vain monopoly of lore!
The gloom-dispelling radiance of the morn
Delighteth not the rising traveller more,
Than it doth glad his heart, that lofty scorn
Recalls from the repellent strength of wisdom lowly born.
CHANDOS LEIGH.

When the rich and the nobly born write in this manner what may not be hoped for by all?

Paganini has resumed his performances at the Hanover Square Rooms, and produced his new modification of the viola, thus making an instrument of his own. We have not yet heard it, while writing this, our Paper going to press too soon; but if the instrument is to be more fitted than others to give effect to what is peculiar in the genius of this great musician, the result must add even wonders to what has been heard before.

INTERVIEW OF MR. FOX WITH BONAPARTE.

THE insertion of Mr. Fox's letter to Lord Grey in our first number, appears to have given so much pleasure, that we have gladly looked out for something more respecting this interesting statesman, to lay before our readers.

Changes of time give a new interest to the scenes of the moral world, as changes of place do to those of a landscape. The following passage in the memoirs of Mr. Fox's latter years, written by his private secretary Mr. Trotter, has appeared, no doubt, often enough in older publications, and may be familiar (at least in general recollection) to many of our readers. But even they will look at it with a new interest, when they consider that not only is Mr. Fox dead, and all that splendid military court scene vanished, and Napoleon himself gone after it, but how he is gone, and what has happened since his ruin, and what new hopes have opened their prospects to the world, such as Mr. Fox loved through all the clouds of party, rank, and office, and such (we suspect) as Napoleon never loved at all, nor believed in.

It is for this reason that we always loved the memory of Fox, however we might venture to think otherwise than he did respecting the means of bringing about the happiness of mankind. That is not the question in these unpolitical pages. But party, &c., were the accidents of his position in society, as they are, more or less, of us all. His heart was a fine, open, manly, unaffected human heart, of the truest order, sensitive to all genial impulses, but not to be moved out of its testimony to what it thought best and truest, by flattery any more than fear; and if Whigs, Tories, and Radicals, were all made up of such people as he, they would soon come to an understanding, and find out which was best for the world. But it is the progress of his beloved books and humanities that must make him so.

What we would most direct the reader's attention to in the following extract, however interesting in other points of view, is the agitation of Bonaparte's nerves, when he found himself standing in the presence of Fox. We have little doubt that it was owing to a consciousness of the sinister views with which he ultimately ruined his own greatness, and the comparative vice and puerility of them, compared with those of the man who stood before him in the simplicity of truth.

As we visited the Museum, (says Mr. Trotter) as often as time could be spared, I recollect one day that all the company were attracted to the windows of the Louvre, by a parade in the Place de Carrousel. The guards, and some other French troops, were exercising. Mr. Fox, with the others, went to the window, but he instantly turned away on seeing the soldiers. This occurred some time before the levee; and on that day, as there was a grand parade, we remained in a private apartment of the Tuilleries till it was over. Buonaparte, mounted on a white charger, and accompanied by some general officer, reviewed his troops, amounting to about six thousand, with great rapidity. The consular troops made a fine appearance, and the whole was a brilliant and animating spectacle. Mr. Fox paid little or no attention to it, conversing chiefly, while it lasted with Count Markoff, the Russian ambassador. I observed Mr. Fox was disinclined not only to military, but to any pompous display of the power of the French government. An enemy to all ostentation, he disliked it every where, but the parade of military troops in the heart of the metropolis, carrying with it more than vain pomp, must naturally have shocked, rather than entertained, such principles as those of Mr. Fox.

On the day of the great levee, which was to collect so many representatives of nations and noble strangers of every country to pay their respects to the First Consul of France, now established as the sole head of government for life, several apartments, having the general name of the Salle des Ambassadeurs, were appropriated for the crowd of visitors at the levee, previous to their being admitted to the First Consul's presence. Lord Holland, Lord Robert Spencer, Lord St. John, Mr. Adair, and myself, accompanied Mr. Fox there. I must acknowledge that the novel and interesting scene amused and interested me to the highest degree. This grand masquerade of life was inconceivably striking—the occasion of assembling, in the old palace of the Bourbons,—the astonishing attitude that France had assumed affected the imagination, and almost overpowered the judgment. A latent smile was often to be caught on the countenances of different intelligent and enlightened men; it said, very significantly, can this be reality? can so wonderful a fabric be permanent?

His toils were now approaching; there was a much greater number of English presented than of any other nation. Mr. Merry, the English Ambassador, appeared on the part of the British government, to sanction and recognize the rank and government of the First Consul! Mr. Merry, whose nation had, under the blind auspices of an intemperate minister, fatally interfered with the internal concerns of a great people, and had vainly attempted to counteract the success of their efforts. What a subject had he for a letter, in the style of Barillon, for the perusal of Mr. Pitt, or his friend Mr. Addington, then acting as Pitt's deputy, or locum tenens, in the government! Mr. Merry!—then acting under Lord Hawkebury, the Quixotic marcher to Paris, which same lord was now receiving a magnificent present of a service of China of unrivalled beauty and elegance, from the same new government and Buonaparte. It would have been an instructive lesson for Mr. Pitt himself, could he invisibly, with Minerva by his side, have contemplated the scene; he might then have studied history, and discovered that such interference and conduct in foreign powers, as that of his and the allied potentates, he had made Cromwell a king, or an emperor, and fixed the succession of his family.

"What think you of all this?" said the chevalier d'Azara, ambassador from Spain, addressing himself to Mr. Fox. The other gave an expressive smile:—"It is an astonishing time," continued he,—"pictures, statues—I hear the Venus de Medicis is on her way—what shall we see next?" A pleasant dialogue ensued; these enlightened statesmen diverting themselves, when scolding and anger could avail nothing. The Turkish ambassador graced the splendid scene; a diminutive figure, accompanied by a suite of fine and handsome men;—he reposed on a sofa;—the heat was excessive, and his cross-legged attitude but little relieved him;—his companion spoke French with great ease; and some of them were fine Grecian figures.

Count Markoff! covered with diamonds, of a most forbidding aspect—of sound sense, however,—malgre, a face no lady would fall in love with, and an ungraceful air. The Marquis Lucchesini! the King of Prussia's Ambassador, who, from an obscure situation, by having become the reader to a minister, was elevated to the corps diplomatique—gaudily dressed—always with several conspicuous colours,—one thought of a foreign bird on seeing him; and his physiognomy corroborated the idea—agreeable, however; pleasing in manners; easy in his temper; and enjoying rationally the amusing scenes around him.

The Marquis de Gallo! the Neapolitan Ambassador—an unmeaning nobleman of the old school,—florid in manner, but not calculated to produce effect in politics or conversation. Have I forgotten the Count Cobenzel! that sage and venerable negotiator was there. A small, emaciated figure,—pale, and worn out with the intrigues of courts, he seemed to have been reserved to witness the scene before us, as a refutation of all his axioms and systems. With excellent good sense, he took all in good part—he was too wise to betray dissatisfaction, and too polite not to bend with the gale. The American Ambassador, Mr. Livingston, plain and simple in manners and dress,—representing his republic with propriety and dignity.—Of these, I believe, M. D'Azara, held the first rank for intellect; he had all the appearance of a man of genius—he seemed very much to enjoy the society of Mr. Fox,—he, and the Count Cobenzel, are both since dead, as, no doubt, are many others of the actors in the grand drama of that day.

The illustrious statesman of England, who that day attracted every eye, is himself withdrawn also from mortal scenes!

A number of English noblemen and gentlemen,—many Russians—Swedish officers, with the white scarf on their arm, also crowded the room. The Cardinal Caprara! representing His Holiness, the Pope, with his scarlet stockings and cap, was to me a novel sight,—he was a polite and dignified ecclesiastic, and, but that I was imbued a little with the prejudice of English historians and other authors, I should have found nothing extraordinary in the respectable cardinal. I am now ashamed that I did.

This grand assemblage was detained a considerable time in the Salle des Ambassadeurs, during which, several servants in splendid laced liveries handed round coffee, chocolate, the richest and finest wines, and cake, upon china, bearing the initial B. without any armorial, royal, or established marks of power. The heat was excessive, and expectation, wearied with the pause, when the door opened, and the Prefet du Palais announced to the Cardinal Caprara, that the first consul was ready, he afterwards called upon M. D'Azara, upon which every one followed without regular order or distinction of rank. As we ascended the great stair-case of the Tuilleries, between files of musketeers, what a sentiment was excited!

As the assumption of the consulship for life was a decided step, tending not only to exclude every branch of the old dynasty, but to erect a new one, every sensible man considered this day as the epoch of a new and regular government. Buonaparte was virtually king henceforth. As we passed through the lofty state rooms of the former kings of France, still hung with the ancient tapestry, very little, if at all, altered, the instability of human grandeur was recalled to the mind more forcibly than it had yet been. The long line of the Bourbons started to the view! I breathed with difficulty! Volumes of history were reviewed in a glance. Monarchs! risen from the mouldering tomb, where is your royal race? The last who held the sceptre dyed the scaffold with his blood, and sleeps, forgotten and unknown, without tomb or memorial of his name! Rapid was the transition succeeding! We reached the interior apartment, where Buonaparte, First Consul, surrounded by his generals, ministers, senators, and officers, stood between the second and third consuls, Le Brun and Cambaceres, in the centre of a semi-circle, at the head of a room! The numerous assemblage from the Salle des Ambassadeurs, formed into another semi-circle, joined themselves to that, at the head of which stood the First Consul.

Buonaparte, of a small, and by no means commanding figure, dressed plainly, though richly, in the embroidered consular coat, without powder in his hair, looked at the first view, like a private gentleman, in different as to dress, and devoid of all haughtiness in his air. The two consuls, large and heavy men, seemed pillars too cumbrous to support themselves, and during the levee, were sadly at a loss what to do—whether the snuff-box or pocket handkerchief was to be appealed to, or the left leg exchanged for the right.

The moment the circle was formed, Buonaparte began with the Spanish ambassador, then went to the American, with whom he spoke some time, and so on, performing his part with ease, and very agreeably—until he came to the English ambassador, who, after the presentation of some English noblemen, announced to him, Mr. Fox! He was a good deal flurried, and after indicating considerable emotion, very rapidly said—"Ah! Mr. Fox!—I have heard with pleasure of your arrival. I have desired much to see you.—I have long admired in you the orator and friend of his country, who, in constantly raising his voice for peace, consulted that country's best interests—those of Europe,—and of the human race. The two great nations of Europe require peace;—they have nothing to fear;—they ought to understand and value one another. In you, Mr. Fox, I see, with great satisfaction, that great statesman, who recommended peace, because there was no just object of war; who saw Europe desolated to no purpose, and who struggled for its relief."

Mr. Fox said little, or rather nothing in reply,—to a complimentary address to himself he always found invincible repugnance to answer; nor did he bestow one word of admiration or applause upon the extraordinary and elevated character who addressed him. A few questions and answers relative to Mr. Fox's tour, terminated the entertainment.

MRS. GORE'S NEW NOVEL.
"THE HAMILTONS."

WE had busied ourselves with preparing this novel for our week's abstract, before we became thoroughly aware of its being a political treatise in disguise—an Abstract, itself, of the mistakes that preceded, and the astonishment that followed, the downfall of Toryism. We found it impossible, however, to give it up, first, because it was Mrs. Gore's; and second, because so good a book was not to be found in the time we had before us; and we reconciled ourselves to our inclinations, in primis, because they were such, and last, not least, because in professing to "sympathize with all," as most truly we do, we here had an opportunity of proving that we do so. In avowing, therefore, that we agree in almost all the opinions of Mrs. Gore's book, and that she is not at all bound to make our admissions in extenuation of the faults of those whom she blames, (especially seeing that all reflective writers like herself really point to the same conclusions, though by another road,) it becomes us, in this Journal, to observe, that Tories, though their system is the most victimizing of all, are themselves victims, in common with every body else of circumstances and education, and partake deeply of those secret cares and disappointments, which all mankind seem destined to share, till all shall feel for all, and contrive to work out the common good. Who, indeed, that reads this sharp and interesting work, or only our abstract of it, can fail to see that it is the system and not the fellow-creatures which the authoress holds up to reprobation; and that these fellow-creatures, like the most uneducated of the classes to whom they think themselves superior, are spoilt each by the other, generation after generation, son by father, father by his father, till "mistake! mistake! only," is the cry of the relieved human heart.

Upon the talents of the fair author we have not time to say what we could wish; but it is impossible to speak of her at all, and not give her our cordial, however poor and brief thanks, for her generous superiority to the conventionalities in which she must have been brought up, (knowing them so well,) and for the evidences she is incessantly manifesting of an universality of reading and thinking, of public and private sympathy, of seriousness and gaiety, of wit, style, womanly grace, and sentiment, which present altogether the most remarkable instance of what is called a masculine understanding in a feminine shape, that we remember to have met with. The present age, has been an age of women as well as of men, in the sense most honourable to both sexes; and the brilliant woman before us has an honourable niche in it to herself.

Scarcely a town in England but possesses its "rich of vantage." Brighton prides itself on its royal marine residence; Oxford upon its University, Birmingham upon its factories of buttons; Chester upon its cellars of cheese; every place upon its something! Laxington, a neat obscure borough, some ten miles N.N.E. of Northampton, had long been accustomed to prize itself upon its gentility. The gentility of Laxington consists in a tory exclusiveness; the whole village is Tory; the Whig interest being represented by the highly respectable Lady Berkeley, the widow of a gallant baronet, who died for his country, and her two daughters. The first germ of the more dreadful intruder, Reform, springs up in the manor-house itself, in the undutiful radical principles of the only son of Mr. Forbes, lord of the manor. A hiatus in the circle of village grandees, made obvious in the emptiness of the long tenantless estate of Weald, is at length supplied, to the great delight of the village at large, in the person of a stirring Tory.

"Weald Park to be let!"—It was something of a degradation to the gentility of the neighbourhood; and the vicar expressed himself severely against the immorality of young Lord Lancashire, on learning that the loss of thirty thousand pounds on the turf was the immediate cause of this declension of dignity. But he spoke with due hesitation; for it was the first time, during a long life, that Dr. Mangles had ventured to find fault with a lord; and he was duly aware that the turf is a vice, of all but right divine, to majesties, royal highnesses, and peers of the realm. Nay, he almost forgave the noble delinquent, on finding that the new tenant of Weald was not only one of his Majesty's ministers, but no less a person than the intimate friend of his honourable patron, the Right Honourable the Earl of Tottenham. The fact was clearly ascertained.—Mr. Smith had been written to.—Mr. Smith's opinion of the manor ascertained;—the lease, for fourteen years, was already in progress of engrossment.

The value of such an accession to the great talkers and little doers of Laxington, may readily be conceived.—Their neighbourly sympathies had, in fact, long required extension. Lady Ashley, the fair widow of Stoke, was almost always resident on the continent. The Cadogans of Everleigh were fonder of London or Brighton than of their hereditary oaks. Old Forbes was getting into his dotage; his only son, a rising lawyer, was rarely seen in Northamptonshire; and, although Lady Berkeley, of Green-oak, and her two handsome daughters were of inestimable value, as the heroines of their romance, not a single man of fortune was to be found in the county worth the attention of either. When it appeared, therefore that Mr. Hamilton, the new tenant of Weald, had a son and daughter of an age to form alliance in the neighbourhood, Lord Lancashire was fairly acquitted. They rejoiced to hear of their new neighbour's man-cook, and were proud of his groom of the chambers; but the prospect of a match for Maria Berkeley, and—who knows?—perhaps a wife for Bernard Forbes,—was fairly worth their both;—Pon. Smith walked over to Green-oak under an umbrella the following morning, during a heavy shower to acquaint Lady Berkeley with the news.

But her ladyship was not the woman to be startled into a confession of satisfaction.

"These Hamiltons will not be here till September," she observed with ostentatious equanimity. "I trust we shall then be at Worthing; if not, I shall have no objection to visit them. Although brought up a staunch Whig, I never allow family politics to interfere with neighbourly sociability. Mr. Hamilton, Tory as he is, may be a very worthy man."

Her pretty daughters, Maria and Susan, well aware that this straw was intended only to mark their mother's sense of superiority to the Smiths, and the patron of the Smiths, Lord Tottenham, smiled over their embroidery. The Berkeley girls were almost as sensible as the coterie of Laxington to the advantage of having young and cheerful neighbours at Weald Park.

Mr. Hamilton, the new proprietor of Weald, was essentially an official man;—had been born in place, bred in place, nurtured in place. His father had lived and died in Scotland-yard, with the word "Salary" on his lips; and young George, at five-and-twenty, the private Secretary of a public minister, trusting to be at five-and-fifty a minister with secretaries of his own, looked upon the treasury as his patrimony,—upon the duties of office as the virtues of his vocation, and upon the stability of Tory ascendancy as upon the immutability of the universe.—The very soul within him was steeped in office!

"From the moment a man of ordinary facilities is thrown into the vortex of official life, all trace of his individual nature is lost for ever!—Thenceforward, he exists but as a cypher of the national debt,—a fraction of administration,—a leaf upon the mighty oak we claim as the emblem of Britain. There is no mistaking an official man. All trades and professions have their slang and charlatanisms; and that of Privy Councillor, although of a higher tone, is a no less inveterate jargon than that of a horse-dealer. Long practice had rendered this dialect a mother-tongue to Mr. Hamilton!—His arguments abounded in ministerial mysticism;—his jokes were parliamentary;—his notes of invitation, formal as official documents. His anecdotes were authenticated by dates; he spoke as if before a committee, or acting under the influence of a whipper-in. He scarcely knew how to leave a room without the ceremony of pairing off, or to hazard an opinion, lest he should be required to justify it to his party."

"To such a man, the incidents of private life were of trivial account. His friends might die when it suited them. Mr. Hamilton was too much accustomed to see places filled up, to fancy any loss irreparable; and, as to births and marriages, they were but drawbacks on the velocity of the great vehicle of public business. All was activity with him and about him."

"Mr. Hamilton's two children alluded to, are a son and daughter, Augustus and Julia; the latter of whom marries a younger son of Lord Tottenham, an empty headed, egotistical young placeman. An attachment arises between Augustus Hamilton and Susan Berkeley, deeper and sincerer on the part of the girl; for Augustus is absent for a long time, to her great dismay and grief. At length however he returns, and succeeds in reassuring her with lame excuses, and equivocal assurances of regard. In fact he is a heartless libertine, who is struck by her beauty, while the purity of her conduct, so much greater than what he is accustomed to encounter, is partly a source of admiration to him, partly of trouble, and ultimately of contempt. The father disapproves of the match. He hastens down to his seat at Laxington to expostulate, à la voce, with his son."

"The explanation was a strong one.—Thirty years of public life had, however, imposed such a restraint on Mr. Hamilton's naturally impetuous temper, that he did not follow the custom of English fathers, on the English stage, by rating his son and heir, as his footman might have rated the butler after a drunken holiday. But the bitter cutting sarcasms of a worldly tongue were more difficult to bear, than an outburst of vulgar indignation. Augustus listened in furious silence, while his father coolly recapitulated all his follies and enormities,—his debts,—his galantries,—his gambling,—his selfishness,—his uselessness,—his ingratitude!—It was a fearful moment. The father insulting his worthless son;—the son secretly despising the scornful father. One reply, however, was uttered audibly enough.—The more Mr. Hamilton reviled him, the more obstinately was Augustus determined to persist in his engagement to Susan Berkeley."

"I have pledged my word," was hisullen and reiterated answer.

"You have pledged it on other occasions, when it proved no very effectual bond," observed his father with equal sangfroid.

"Congratulate me then on the amendment of my morals!" said Augustus, sneeringly. "For once, I am about to perform an honourable action."

"At the suggestion of Sir Edward Berkeley's expected return to England, rejoined Mr. Hamilton, hoping to irritate the young man out of his self possession."

"At the suggestion of my own inclination," replied Augustus, with a kindling eye, but in a phlegmatic tone: "which, as you must be tolerably aware, I am accustomed to treat with the greatest respect. Let us understand each other! my dear father!—I will marry Miss Berkeley, say or do what you please,—I may have behaved like a villain elsewhere; here, allow me to retrieve myself. Your influence with government has, luckily, provided me with competence; and you have, therefore, to choose between provoking a family rupture and the exposure of your affairs for the amusement of the world, or such a compromise as will enable me to afford to your daughter-in-law a place in society worthy of her and of yourself."

Augustus paused; and, instead of a rejoinder, Mr. Hamilton fixed his eyes contemptuously on the opposite wall. He had assumed the pacific attitude of 'Chateaux qui parle et somme qui écoute.' A surrender was no longer hopeless.

"You will admit," proceeded Augustus, "that your peccage is too safe to require a reinforcement of your interest by any measure of mine; and as to fortune, although Miss Berkeley's is almost too trifling for mention to you, whose income counts more than double the principal, you must not forget that she is prudent, economical, unexacting."

"A country girl, without tact, without address!"

"Ask any of the people who were staying here last Autumn, except that venomous guest Varden, and they will tell you, that Lord Shetland and your friend Lord Baldoock thought her prettier and more elegant than Julia. The Marquis was always by her side."

"A new light seemed to break in upon the official man. His stony face grew more complacent as he listened!

"The presence of female society is indispensable to a house like yours. My sister's marriage would have deprived it of its chief attraction in the eyes of whom you are fond of conciliating. Even this new peccage, of which you think so much, what is it in the throng of London society, unless made prominent by the wealth, wit, or beauty of its representatives?"

"I see how it is," said Hamilton, affecting to cede to the force of destiny. "I, who have sacrificed myself, my whole life long, to the interests of my children, shall be compelled to sanction a measure I totally disapprove. Such prospects as you and Julia have thrown away!—My daughter refusing Clancastee, to marry a good looking fool with his maintenance at the minister's mercy; my son neglecting a woman of Lady Ashley's property to marry—"

"A beautiful girl,—the daughter of a man whose monument the nation have placed in St. Paul's."

"And whose widow, in the pension list?"

"Their descent and connections being every way superior to our own."

Having once determined upon permitting the marriage, Hamilton, for the sake of his own dignity, makes liberal allowances to the young couple. "And these gratuities, which, between any other father and son, would have been accorded with grace, and received with gratitude, were announced by the arid-minded Hamilton, in the tone of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, giving out the items of a budget; and accepted with a mis-giving air by the supercilious son."

"I am unfortunately engaged to the Berkeleys this evening," said Augustus, looking at the clock, as if anxious to escape from a disagreeable family scene, "and as I cannot venture to ask you to accompany me—"

"And why not?" interrupted Mr. Hamilton, "do you suppose that, having once given my consent to this imprudent match, I am not prepared to go through the ceremonies usual on such occasions? Do you imagine that I would lend occasion to those cackling idiots at Laxington to send a whisper into the world, through the Tott-nams, that I had been deficient in courtesy to the family of my daughter-in-law?—No, no! Pray do not allow such people as the Smiths and Mangles to despise us for ill-breeding; whatever other bad quality they may have discovered in the family."

And, in pursuance of his system of conciliation, Mr. Hamilton was shortly afterwards seated on Lady Berkeley's sofa, in all the respectability of his white hair and suit of sable,—charming her with his high-bred bow, his mild suavity of accent, his treasury smile, his deference to herself, his paternal tenderness to her daughter. But the hypocrite was taken in his own snare:—he became really pleased with Susan;—he was struck, for the first time, with the singular grace of her manners;—he felt that he should be proud of her—that she would embellish his circle, and do honour to his name. There was nothing to be ashamed of in the connexion. Lady Berkeley, although a bore, was a woman of a distinguished appearance; Marcia was majesty itself. Altogether, for a bad match, it had its extenuations.

"The young couple are married, much to the delight of Lady Berkeley and the distress of Marcia, who imagines her sister would be happier with her plainer, but sincerer, and wiser suitor, Bernard Forbes a rising young barrister."

"The tears on Mrs. Hamilton's Brussels lace veil were soon dry; and, after a month's tour among the Westmoreland lakes, which, the chilliness of the season considered, the bridegroom would not have been sorry to reduce to a fortnight, he assured his wife they should make themselves a laughing-stock to their acquaintance, by prolonging their excursion. Honeymoons, like family mourning, have been abridged 'by authority of the Lord Chamberlain,' and it was only in deference to Susan's charming prejudices, that Augustus had been tempted to respect the old-fashioned custom of a month's seclusion."

"His lordship is just now in the best of humours," said the bridegroom; "ever since he enclosed me the Gazette announcing his elevation to the peerage, he has abounded in lordly courtesy. Let us make the most of it! It disturbs all the habits of his house that we should be absent, now the season has begun. He will not launch his new carriage till you are there to use it, nor commence his official parties—nor do anything he likes. I find he has taken you an opera box, which is more than he did for Julia; and asked the Dutchess of Ptarmigan to present you."

"But must I be presented, and go to the opera immediately? Can we not be quiet for a short time, till I get accustomed to London?"

"As quiet as you please. But, of course, there is but one way of living for people who live in the world. What shall we do with ourselves, if we neither go into society nor receive it at home? And how will you amuse yourself when I am engaged at my club, or some official dinner?"

"I shall amuse myself by waiting till your return," said Susan, smiling. "It will be quite occupation enough; and I hope to see a great deal of Julia. Do you forget what a kind letter your sister wrote me on our marriage?"

"Julia will contrive to make you forget it if you attempt to wean her from society."

"You are thinking of her as Miss Hamilton. But so attached as she is to Mr. Tottenham—"

"You are thinking of her as Miss Hamilton," cried Augustus, laughing. "Julia is at heart a rake, and on that very account she and Tottenham suit each other precisely!"

"But you will be a great deal with me!" inquired Susan, looking anxiously at her husband.

"I shall be constantly with you: unless when I have engagements in town, one has always some engagement or other."

"But shall we not reside sometimes in the country?"

"Of course, we shall pass our autumns at Weald. You will then be near your mother and sister; and my father has his house full of company, so that we shall never be bored."

"That will be delightful!" said Susan, in a dejected tone.

"They go to town, and the bride is ushered into her newly and splendidly furnished apartments in her father-in-law's house. Her indifference to the show surprises Lord Laxington. He did not perceive that while apparently gazing upon the Dresden frame of her glass, she was engrossed by the reflection it served to convey to her eyes of her husband's remote figure; Augustus having loitered behind in the ante-room, to hurry through the contents of a handful of letters, which awaited his arrival in town. What could constitute their pressing urgency?

—They could not be letters of business; for the whole of his debts had been discharged by his father on his marriage. Instead of welcoming her to the room in which so much of their future life must pass together, he was, therefore, actually smiling over idle notes of congratulation or invitation!"

"But the billets were soon finished and thrust into his pocket; and Augustus made his appearance, as full of gratitude and enthusiasm, as his father could desire; to enlarge upon Lord Laxington's generosity, and point out to his wife's admiration the care with which her favourite books and music had been collected, her conservatory furnished, and a door of communication opened between her dressing-room and that devoted to his own use. Poor Susan was, perhaps, of opinion, that she should have been more comfortable, more at her ease, surrounded by a degree of simplicity consonant with her early habits; but, as her husband seemed anxious to force upon her admiration the damask and gilding, bronze and ormonos, mother-of-pearl and mosaic, which adorned her boudoir, she was liberal in her applause. Lord Laxington quitted the room as the thanks of Augustus and his wife were half exhausted."

"And, so, Susy, my father is actually going to make a pet of you!" cried young Hamilton, throwing himself on the sofa, and bursting into laughter, so soon as the door was fairly closed on Lord Laxington. "Est il ridicule ce cher Papa?"—When we men get into our second childhood, it is amazing what a vocation we display for the toy-shop!"

"It is very kind in him to have taken so much pains for my accommodation," said Susan, painfully startled by her husband's sudden change of tone, from the cordially assumed during Lord Laxington's presence."

"Kind? You will learn to know him better, one of these days! Not an ell of brocade, not an inch of rosewood,—was placed here on our account!"

"The furniture is new," replied Mrs. Hamilton, looking round, somewhat bewildered.

"New as yourself, my little wife, who have much ground to go over before you discover that all my father's proceedings are directed to the approbation of that great œil de bœuf—the eye of the world! You and I have as little to thank him for, in these baubles, as the king his parliament for the paraphernalia of a coronation! But importe! It is something to find the Chancellor of our Exchequer in a good humour."

"The following morning Augustus was looking over 'the collection of great names on the cards left in Spring Gardens, by way of recognition of the visibility of Lord Laxington's daughter-in-law. 'You must take care, love, that all these people's cards are returned; and it shall be my task to make you acquainted with those I really wish you to know. With my father's political associates and their families, you must, of course, be intimate; many of them, by the way, being the last women in the world I could present to your notice.'"

"Then why must I?"

"Because you will be constantly thrown into their society. Party influence is paramount even to the grand dogma of exclusivism. The Tories are accustomed to stand shoulder to shoulder, and sink or swim together."

"But surely you are no great politician? I have heard you speak so scornfully of parties and party-men?"

"In the abstract! But are you such a little goose as to be ignorant that party is our rock of anchorage that we live by office, and starve by default? that we exist only by a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether?"

"Susan heard only the first part of the sentence. There was something in the words 'live or starve,' which seemed to cast a gloom upon the gaudy trappings of the apartments. She looked round her with a glance that inferred, 'should we not be happier, poor and independent, than in splendid bondage such as this?'"

"But Augustus saw nothing of the glance or its inference. He was watching out of the window a fight between two ragged boys in Bird-cage walk. Had he even seen and comprehended it, his reply would have been unequivocally negative. He had never been either poor or independent. He had no experience in such matters. His political fetters were second nature to him. He was a fox without a tail; but the appendage had been missing since his birth; he had been bred in the trammels of official life, just as the coachman's son is brought up a stable boy. He looked upon parties and politics as a mode or ceremonial of civilized life; and upon office as a thing devised by potentates to enjoy their serviles of plate and opera boxes."

"I am going to the Travellers' for an hour or two," said he, (the fight having ended in one of the sturdy little vagabonds being carried senseless and bleeding from the field of action!) "Will you drive with me by and by? I will order the phaeton at five, and we can take a turn in the park."

"But although poor Susan thankfully accepted the proposal, it struck her (new as he called her!) when Augustus had quitted the room, that, between the hours of twelve and five, there was leisure for something more than a lounge at the Travellers'."

"Unfortunately Mrs. Hamilton was not in the habit of being alone. She misses the society of her affectionate and intellectual sister; and now she had no longer Marcia to talk to,—no! not even by letter, with the unreserve which alone makes correspondence a substitute for nearer intercourse. For want of better amusement during their tour, Augustus had contracted a habit of reading all her sister's letters; and Susan was checked in commenting upon her new house or dwelling upon reminiscences of her old, lest Marcia's reply should contain observations offensive to the jealousy or provocative of the ridicule of her husband. Hamilton was apt to laugh at what he considered the flightiness and romance of Miss Berkeley's character; and to express his amazement at the épanchemens de cœur exchanged between two sisters loving each other with a degree of affection, such as his lukewarm feelings towards Mrs. Tottenham, and those of Julia in return, afforded him no precedent to comprehend. He regarded every thing as exaggerated and ridiculous which exceeded the barriers of ice, erected by the exclusives as a safe guard to their arctic circle."

"There were many things in her new mode of life, which an uncorrupted nature pointed out as inconsistent and objectionable. So little was Mrs. Hamilton habituated to the details of public service, that she could not help attaching a degree of meanness to the prodigality with which public money and public agents were rendered subservient to the rise and convenience of those who are themselves the servants of the public, in a higher capacity. Her father indeed, had eaten the bread of the country, and her mother was still its pensioner. But the fate of the gallant Sir Clement sanctified the grant."

"It was not so with the Hamiltons and Tottenham, and twenty families of their party. Some were paid for doing nothing; many, for doing very little; yet, certain of her new friends who were in the habit of proceeding from a late breakfast to their various offices, and quitting them at three o'clock, to take a turn in St. James's-street, or to lounge in the parlour of the house, on the chance of a division, were everlastingly complaining of the severity of the duties, and grumbling for the arrival of the recess. The most over-taxed weaver of Spital-fields, could not sigh more repiningly over his loom, for change of air, and relaxation of labour! William Tottenham and Augustus, commissioners of a lottery which had ceased to exist, and clerks to an office which had never existed, were liberally remunerated as deputies in a sinecure place, the local habitation of which was a mystery even to their principal, yet they threw away the proceeds with as much pride and ostentation, as if they had been honestly earned; and very often did Susan shudder, on hearing them in the wantonness of their prosperity, curse the people—the damned people,—the besotted blackguard people,—by the sweat of whose brows, their own leisure was secured."

"Another circumstance which appeared unaccountable, was the peerie nature of the conversation current among these eminent personages by whom she was surrounded. She had been startled, even at Weald-park, by the extreme levity of men, whose names were of historical importance, and whose opinions of historical weight. But at Weald, the Marquis of Shetland and his parasite, the pompous Earl of Tottenham, and Lord Tottenham's parasite, the Right Honourable George, and the Right Honourable George's parasite, Mr. Secretary Varden, were supposed to be playing holiday; and had their privilege of private life to plead in extenuation of their bad puns, their dirty stories, their scandalous anecdotes, their wishy-washy chit-chat. A somewhat comprehensive adoption of the Flora-tan precept was pardonable.

"In London, on the contrary, within a stone's throw of the Treasury,—within oration-pitch of Palace-yard,—within sight of Westminster-hall, of Westminster-Abbey, it struck her that they ought to maintain the odour of officiality: that their counsel should be close as a despatch box,—correct as the draught of a chancery bill,—strong as a ministerial majority. They appeared at Lord Laxington's table, with all the blushing honours of the Privy Council thick upon them,—with the breath of majesty in their nostrils,—with the cracking of the door of the cabinet lingering in their ears; or with the cheers of their packed jury,—the house, still louder and still more portentous. Yet the graver the crisis, the more trifling their discourse.

Her wearisome mode of life is something relieved by the return of her lively brother, Sir Edward Berkeley, from his travels, who frightens her into a fainting fit by the suddenness of his greeting, and wonders at the due-ladyism of his reception; and has a dread of being treated 'like a quarto with plates.'

The return of Sir Edward brings his mother and elder sister to town, and while there, Lady Berkeley contrives just to frighten her daughter into a slight fit of jealousy, by vague innuendoes. Her husband perceives the state of the case, and busies himself to counteract the mother's half-sighted discernment. The Berkeleys were to leave town in a week;—and during that week he was constantly by Susan's side.

"See, my dear mother, how needless were your alarms," she whispered, on taking leave of Lady B—, while Augustus was taking a few parting commissions from Sir Edward;—Augustus has not been half an hour away from me for the last six days."

"Ah! my dear child! you know but little of the world!" ejaculated Lady Berkeley, mournfully shaking her head as she embraced her. And long after her mother's departure that portentous gesture disturbed the peace of mind of Mrs. Hamilton.

A political conference, of a secret nature, between the delegates of the Great Powers, was about to take place at Baden, and Lord Laxington was to represent the interests of England; consequently, the most courtly of court physicians recommended the waters of Baden for Susan's impaired health, and Lord Laxington kindly consented to accompany his amiable daughter-in-law;—and thus, unconsciously, the gentle Susan was made a scape-goat to the intrigues of a cabal of politicians. Meanwhile the Tories in office were in full flower. There could not be a stronger tribute to the stability of the party than Augustus Hamilton's acceptance of a subordinate appointment. Augustus—the handsome, successful, self-reliant Augustus, who had sold of his marriage as Mazarin of a place he once bestowed, that 'it had rendered hundreds discontented, and one ungrateful.' Augustus, who fancied that his appearance in the bow-window at White's, was the spell of fascination that attracted every female eye towards that cabinet of curiosities—Augustus, who forebore to enter the pit of the opera during one of Pasta's favourite airs, lest he should distract the attention of the audience—Augustus, who felt conscious that he owed as much to himself as some men are fools enough to imagine they owe their country—Augustus had, at length, consented to do some service to the state, which had acted as cashier to his family throughout two generations!

"It was impossible, however, for any man to entertain a higher sense of his own condescension! Instead of compensating Susan's disappointment in quitting England (when she had expected to pass a quiet autumn at their home in the country), he did nothing but point out the sacrifice he was making in losing the shooting season at Weald. Instead of lamenting her fatigue in so long a journey, at such a time, he did nothing but enlarge on the vexation of travelling in Lord Laxington's company, and being obliged to give up his time at Paris to courtiership and St. Cloud, instead of the saloon and the opera. He quarrelled with the roads, the inns, the weather; and by the time they arrived at Baden, the force of ill-humour could no further go."

"That his wife, to whom the place was new, should find anything to admire in its picturesque site and romantic scenery, was an unpardonable offence—there was not a soul worth speaking to left at the baths."

At breakfast, a day or two after their arrival, in the midst of complaints of the cold and desertion of the place, Augustus exclaims, 'By the way, who were those showy-looking English people who bowed to you yesterday as we were returning from our ride?'

"The Burtonshaws, relations of the Mangesees, who spent a week every year at Laxington—I know very little of them."

"Pray do not aspire to improve the acquaintance. I never saw more flagrant people! If there is a thing I abhor, it is a family of ever-dressed, under-bred English, on the Continent; not knowing what they would be at, and staring their eyes out in wonder at every thing everybody else is at blazing in front of all the theatres—attracting attention in all the public walks—and acting 'Milor Angliani,' to the amusement of foreigners, and the disgust of their own countrymen!"

"The Burtonshaws appear to be very harmless people. I believe they made their fortune in India."

"Never mind where they made it; but, for God's sake, do not bring them down in judgment upon my father! he hates all that sort of thing even more than I do."

"Des dames Anglaises qui se presentent pour Madame!" said Lord Laxington's valet, throwing open the door, in the belief that visitors who made their appearance at breakfast time, must be on very familiar terms with the family.

"Ex qui donc?" cried Augustus, with a premonition of the impending calamity.

"Une dame et des demoiselles de Birtancho."

"And in walked the 'flagrant' people whom the fastidious Hamilton had just denounced as inadmissible."

From the Burtonshaws Susan learns that her sister is about to be married to Bernard Forbes, formerly a suitor of her own, and now becoming prominent in his profession, the law. Marcia had long been attached to his worth, and the acquisition of one sister amply consoles him for the loss of the other. From Baden the Hamiltons remove to Vienna, where they meet with the Cadogans. Cadogan is a catholic, a very 'gentlemanly' man, i.e. a cold, leasewable, servile formalist. Mrs. Cadogan was a school friend of Susan's, and is now an artful, intriguing woman; ruling her husband, while he believes her his slave, by playing upon his foolishness of perverse wilfulness; and deceiving Susan while she appears her sincerest friend. Mrs. Hamilton is overjoyed at the idea of seeing a compatriot, an old friend, a woman! Her joy is soon damped by mysterious hints in a letter of Marcia's, regretting her intimacy with Mrs. Cadogan. Augustus obtains a sight of the letter, and his fury throws poor Susan into an alarm, that causes the premature birth of a sickly child. During her illness she gratefully accepts the services of Mrs. Cadogan, for she does not yet understand all that is meant, not even by her husband's phrensy. As soon as the invalid is sufficiently recovered they return to England, and are taken into the royal household. Hamilton sets himself tooth and nail to carry favour with his royal master.

"Bold as were Augustus Hamilton's professions of independence in private society, he was too well aware of the uncertain tenure of his father's fortunes, not to have resolved to effect, at almost any sacrifice, a more solid provision for himself. He would not, of course, do anything contrary to the code of polite honour—nothing 'ungentlemanly'—nothing calculated to get him black-balled at a club, or stigmatized in the coteries. But to perform the too-ton of courtiership, in common with the highest and mightiest, was no offence either against himself or society;—to run the race of lying or equivocation with a Duke, could be no disgrace. To swear that the Virginia Water (like the Terminus of the ancients) was composed of one part water and three parts fishes, was no reproach—except to the individual who believed! To protest that Correggio's 'Notte,' or Raphael's 'Madonna della redia' were vapid in comparison with Rembrandt's 'Lady with the fan,' or Gerard Douw's 'Woman peeling turnips,' might be an error in judgment;—to prefer Lawrence the funeral to Vandike the courtly, or Oginisk's Polonaise to Beethoven's symphonies, could only be a fault of taste.

Hamilton loses his master, and Susan her weakly babe about the same time. William the Fourth accedes to the throne, and his hearty manners conciliate the discontented. "It was a long time since a king had met them face to face. The rising generation were glad to ascertain that the crown was not worn by a hippogriff; and his majesty, bred in a profession too critical in its vicissitudes to deal in the etiquettes of life—and at present unlearned in the precept delivered to Louis XV. by his chancellor, that 'Kings themselves are but ceremonies,'—was well satisfied to set their minds at rest. A female court, too, was, for the first time, for many years, established; and the world began to talk of King George and Queen Charlotte; and to fancy, they had retrograded to those 'good old times,' which ended in the riots of Eighty and the American war."

At this time, Mrs. Cadogan presents her husband with an heir, that is, however, no son of his. While she is still in confinement, and ere Susan has yet quite recovered from the shock of losing her own poor boy, Mrs. Hamilton pays her a visit.

"A yet severer retribution was in store for her.—She knew of Mrs. Hamilton's loss, and was almost glad that it would secure her own sick room from her presence; when, one morning early, in her convalescence, as she lay on her sofa, near an open window, enjoying the delicious balminess of the summer atmosphere, the door of her dressing-room was gently opened, and Susan, quiet and unannounced stole in. Caroline would have given worlds to evade the visit. But there she was, chained to her couch, without even a bell at her disposal; and when Mrs. Hamilton put aside her mourning veil, and bent over her with a kind, womanly kiss, a sudden flush of fever seemed to pervade the frame of the delinquent.—A tear was on her face, that had fallen from Susan's; and it scorched her like a drop of liquid fire."

While taking a solitary morning drive in the neighbourhood of Everleigh, Mrs. Hamilton had suddenly found courage to attempt the visit; Marcia, who had constantly assured her that she had not strength for such an effort, being detained at home, writing letters to her husband.

"I have been very unhappy since we parted," said she, in the simplicity of grief, 'very unhappy; but, for the sake of Augustus, must learn to overcome my affliction.'

"You have so many remaining sources of happiness," observed Mrs. Cadogan, in a low voice; but she could not finish her sentence.

"We have all sources of happiness, if we know how to render them available," said Susan, sighing. "But some are fated to deeper afflictions than others; some to brighter fortunes.—Yourself, dear Caroline!—How your career has prospered!—With every thing against you in the onset of life, how completely have all your desires been realised!—With health—with fortune—with an adoring husband—beautiful children—affectionate friends;—how happy you are! Do not think me despicable, if I own I think you an object of envy!"

"What would not Caroline have given for the entrance of her husband, or of a servant, to silence the ill-timed enthusiasm of her friend?"

"You must show me your little boy," resumed Mrs. Hamilton, after a long and painful pause.

"No—no!" cried Caroline, with uncontrollable emotion. "The sight of a child would be too painful to you."

"You know not," said Susan, with a quivering lip, 'how well I can subdue my feelings. I must see children—I must accustom myself to see them without emotion;—with whose can I better commence my hard lesson, than with yours?—You, who are so kind a friend, will show so much indulgence to my weaknesses.'"

"I cannot—I—I—"

"Nay, dear Caroline!—Believe me to be the best judge of my own feelings! Do you know, I fancy it would even soothe me to hold a child again in my arms!"

"Not yet!—you must excuse me!" faltered Mrs. Cadogan, her heart beating more quickly with emotion than she had fancied it would ever beat again. But her will was not to be consulted. The head-nurse, proud of the heir of Everleigh, or desirous to exhibit to a visitor the magnificent lace of its cockade, thought proper to parade her charge, uncalled for, into the room; without dreaming that the deep mourning of the lady-guest had any reference to a loss rendering its presence disagreeable.

"See, ma'am!" cried the old lady, approaching Mrs. Hamilton, without regard to the prohibitions of her mistress. "See what a beautiful pair of hazel eyes!—Just the very moral of his papa—pretty dear!—Lord bless you, ma'am, I nursed Mr. Cadogan himself, ma'am, when he was't no bigger than this pretty darling; and he was as like this baby, he was, as two drops of water."

"But another resemblance was sickening in the very heart of Susan!—her own lost child seemed to rise before her eyes."

"Ah! Caroline!" said she, seizing the cold hand of Mrs. Cadogan, and motioning to the nurse to take away the little boy. "You were right! Forgive me!—I shall love your boy very much some day or other, I have long intended to ask you to let it be my god-child."

"My dear Mrs. Hamilton, you do us too much honour!" exclaimed Cadogan, who had entered unperceived, the door opened by the departing nurse. "Nothing will give greater pleasure to Mrs. Cadogan and myself. You must persuade my friend Hamilton to take his share in your duties. Give my kind regards to him, and—"

"No!" said Mrs. Cadogan, faintly. "I wish—I rather intend—"

"—She stepped short."

"In a word, my dear, have you formed any engagements on the subject, and with whom."

"Not exactly—but—"

"My dear Caroline, pray allow me to arrange these matters without your interference!" cried Cadogan, settling his chin in his cravat. "These are points I decide for myself. Supposing we call the little fellow Augustus, my dear Mrs. Hamilton; he persisted, too full of his heir to notice the agitation of his wife; and knowing that, as the Hamiltons' child had been christened 'Clement,' the name would produce no painful associations."

"Aye, you please!" replied Susan, overcome by the triumphant joyousness of his voice and manner. "We will settle it another time."

"Good! I will write a line to my friend Hamilton. It will be better, perhaps, that the compliment of the request should come from me. Are you going, Mrs. Hamilton?—Allow me to take you to your carriage."

"Good bye, Caroline," said Susan, in a tremulous voice, as she quitted the room. "I shall see you again very shortly."

"I trust not—I devoutly trust not!" ejaculated the conscience-struck Mrs. Cadogan, when they were gone, and she found herself alone. "Such struggles, often repeated, would destroy me."

At length the Tories go out of office. This is a destructive blow to Augustus Hamilton. While he is absent, during one of the riots that took place about that period, his wife, anxious to discover his engagements, that she may form some conjecture regarding his safety, looks over certain of his letters; among them is one from Caroline Cadogan! Out of power, and unable to satisfy the demands of his dependents, a vindictive servant soon after publishes the connection to the world. An; gustus is mortally wounded in a duel with the formalist Cadogan while his unsuspecting wife is kept in ignorance of his danger till after his death, to preserve her from the horrors of his death-bed violences. After the death of her husband, she devotes herself to the care of her father-in-law, the fallen, disappointed, penitent Lord Laxington; and when again his death leaves her without a protector, she gives her hand to the Marquis Clancastare, Lord Laxington's ward, an accomplished, and intelligent young nobleman, who, like Apollo, though possessed of every attraction, had not hitherto proved very attractive to the ladies, having been successively refused by Julia Hamilton and Marcia Berkeley. He is too good for the former, not exalted enough for the latter; but just suited to the gentle Susan, whom we are glad to leave at last in congenial company.

TABLE-TALK

Parish dinners in 1460 and 1794.—In the registry of proceedings of the parish of St. Ewens, in Bristol, the cost for a breakfast, &c. on Corpus Christi day, A. D. 1460 is thus entered on the church or parish book of record, extracted word for word.

Item. For a calveshead and hinge Threepence.
Item. For two rounds of beef Sixpence.
Item. For bread and ale Eightpence.
Item. For master parson for his dinner Fourpence.
Item. For his clerk Twopence.
Item. For bearing the cross Twopence.

Sum Total .. Two shillings and a Penny.
In the year 1794, by the same parish books, appears an entry to the following effect:

"A supper for the parish officers to settle their accounts, and to regulate the assessment of their poor rate, the sum of 50l. 17s. 2d."

A Delicate Distress.—The late King George (the Second) was fond of peaches stewed in brandy in a particular manner, which he had tasted at my father's; and ever after, till his death my mamma furnished him with a sufficient quantity to last the year round (he eating two every night). This little present he took kindly. But one season proved fatal to fruit trees, and she could present his Majesty but with half the usual quantity, desiring him to use economy, for they would barely serve him the year at one each night. Being thus forced by necessity to retrench, he said he would then eat two every other night; and valued himself upon having mortified himself less, than if he had yielded to their regulation of one each night; which I suppose may be called a compromise between economy and epicurism; but I leave it to your decision. Lady Luxborough's Letters to Shenstone.

The Birmingham Coach in 1749.—A Birmingham coach is newly established to our great emolument. Would it not be a good scheme, (this dirty weather, when riding is no more a pleasure) for you to come some Monday in the said stage coach from Birmingham, to breakfast at Barrells, for they always breakfast at Henley; and on the Saturday following it would convey you back to Birmingham, unless you would stay longer, which would be better still, and equally safe? for the stage goes every week the same road. It breakfasts at Henley, and lies at Chipping Horton; goes early next day to Oxford, stays there all day and night, and gets on the third day to London; which from Birmingham at this season is pretty well, considering how long they are at Oxford; and it is much more agreeable as to the country than the Warwick way was. Lady Luxborough's Letters to Shenstone.

A Fox at Deptford. A Deptford Correspondent of the Magazine of Natural History, after describing a garden belonging to him which had run wild, and was surrounded three parts by water, proceeds to give the following account of a fox which had established in it "an at home, within four miles of London." "The fox" says he, made himself very happy for more than six weeks. The neighbours lost their fowls, ducks, pigeons, and rabbits. Many a long face have I seen pulled about their losses; many a complaint of the "howdaciousness" of the rats, the cats, the thieves, and the new police; in all which I took very great and sympathising interest. In the mean time I used to sit in my summer-house of an evening, and watch master Reynard come out of his retreat; and a great amusement it was to me. He would come slowly trotting along, to a round gravelled place where four paths met; then he would raise himself on the sitting part, look about, and listen, to ascertain that all was safe; and being satisfied of this, he would commence washing his face, with the soft part of the leg, just above the pad. After this operation was well performed, he used to lie flat down on his belly, and walk deliberately along with his fore legs, dragging the rest of his person along the ground, as though it were quite dead, or at least deprived of motion; then he would run round and round after his brush, which I could see he sometimes hit pretty severely, and on such occasions, he would turn serious all at once, and whisk his brush about in a very angry manner. Poor fellow! a neighbour happened to see him cross the ditch by moon-light into my garden with an old hen in his mouth. The out-cry was raised, a search was demanded. Next day there came guns, dogs, pitchforks, and—neighbours; the upshot of all which was that poor Reynard's brush is dangling in my little wainscotted room, between an Annibal Caracci, and a Batista.—E. W. KIDD, 14, Chandos-street, West Strand.

* * * The great popularity of this little work having caused a mis-understanding between the two brothers—Cruikshank—they have endeavoured to throw the onus upon the publisher, who, having no other means of setting the public right, has re-printed the correspondence which has appeared in the "Spectator" newspaper, leaving the public to decide which of the two is the "real Simon Pure."—The following appeared on the 19th of April:—
TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."

London, April 17th, 1834.

SIR:

In your paper of last Sunday, in reviewing a work of my brother's, you go on to notice his imitators, and state that I am trading upon his fame. Now this censure ought to fall upon the publishers by whom I have been employed, and not upon me; for, so far from wishing to trade upon my brother's fame, it has ever been my earnest request to the publishers that my Christian name, "ROBERT," should be advertised with the works I illustrate, and which they promised to do; but I regret to observe they have very frequently failed in the performance of that promise.

As respects the work styled Cruikshank at Home, I feel called upon to state, that I was entirely ignorant of the title till the book was put into my hands, after its publication; and that, from the very unusually small price offered to me by the publisher for drawings, merely in outline (as he termed it,) I naturally presumed they were intended for some slight cheap publication, that would have borne some fair proportion to the small remuneration I received for my services.

Allow me, Mr. Editor, to assure you and the public generally, that in my engagement with the publisher of Cruikshank at Home, I made one condition, which was understood by both parties to be paramount to all others; which was, that in every place where my name was printed it should be "ROBERT CRUIKSHANK," and any thing short of that I neither could nor would be satisfied with; and which dissatisfaction I lost no time in plainly communicating to the publisher.

I am, Sir, your obedient humble servant,
ROBERT CRUIKSHANK.

In answer to which, Mr. Kidd immediately returned the following letter, addressed to the Editor of the "Spectator":—
TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."

SIR,

Having given insertion to a letter from Mr. ROBERT CRUIKSHANK, on the subject of a little work which I am now publishing, (illustrated by him) you will, doubtless, permit me, through the same channel, to reply to the statement he has put forth, which, should it remain uncontradicted, might prove of serious injury to me in my capacity, of PUBLISHER. It was originally agreed upon between us that the work, which was to be entitled "Cruikshank at Home," should be published in one volume, and contain twenty-three engravings, inclusive of a drawing representing Mr. Cruikshank in his own study. On this number being completed and delivered over, Mr. Cruikshank represented to me, that as he was about to publish a copper-plate engraving of the ship called the "Great Harry," to be dedicated by permission to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, he was particularly anxious, in the meantime, to add to his fame by the publication of his "At Home," and requested, as a great favour, that as the drawings were made in his very best manner, and not merely in outline they might be beautifully engraved. This request was acceded to, and to render him a still further service, the original number of designs was increased to upwards of one hundred, and the book brought out in the most handsome form possible, and in three volumes instead of one—of course, at my own expense, which he seems to forget. As for the stipulation, "that the Christian name Robert should be affixed to the work,"—this is positively untrue, though on reference to the very first volume, it will be found I have chosen to affix it.

The sum named for the drawings was not only not objected to, but most readily accepted by Mr. Cruikshank, whose reply was that "he must now leave off working for the Penny Casket, and devote himself to this job." Two witnesses were present on this occasion. At all events, having furnished more than four times the number of drawings first agreed for, Mr. C. cannot, I think, have any just cause for complaint. It is a somewhat singular circumstance that Mr. Cruikshank called at my house on the morning of the very day on which he dated his letter to you, and appeared on such friendly terms, that I readily obliged him with a trifling loan that he required! I am, therefore, the more surprised at the nature of his communication to you, and but few his signature, can hardly believe that the sentiments expressed are his own. I beg to apologize for thus troubling you, and am, Sir,

Your Obedient Servant,
WILLIAM KIDD.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Library of Popular Instruction" will for the future be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

A HUMAN BEING, AND A CROWD.

We had intended to make merry this week, in our leading article, with some light subject, but a late event in the metropolis (of which we are not going to speak politically) and the perusal of the affecting Romance of Real Life which is given in our present number, have set us upon graver thoughts, to which it may not be unsalutary to give way.

The reader will allow us to relate him an apologue.—A seer of visions, walking out one evening, just before twilight, saw a being standing in a corner by the wayside, such as he never remembered to have seen before. It said nothing, and threatened him no harm: it seemed occupied with its own thoughts, looking in an earnest manner across the fields, where some children were playing; and its aspect was inexpressibly affecting. Its eyes were very wonderful, a mixture of something that was at once substance and no substance, body and spirit; and it seemed as if there would have been tears in them, but for a certain dry-looking heat, in which nevertheless was a still stranger mixture of indifference and patience, of hope and despair. Its hands, which it now and then lifted to its head, appeared to be two of the most wonderful instruments that were ever beheld. Its cheeks varied their size in a remarkable manner, being now sunken, now swollen, or apparently healthy, but always of a marvellous formation, and capable, it would seem, of great beauty, had the phenomenon been nappy. The lips, in particular, expressed this capability; and now and then the creature smiled at some thought that came over it; and then it looked sorrowful, and then angry, and then patient again, and finally, it leaned against the tree near which it stood, with a gesture of great weariness, and heaved a sigh which went to the very heart of the beholder. The latter stood apart, screened from its sight, and looked towards it with a deep feeling of pity, reverence, and awe. At length, the creature moved from its place, looked first at the fields, then at the setting sun, and after putting its hands together in an attitude of prayer, and again looking at the fields and the children, drew down, as if from an unseen resting-place, a huge burthen of some kind or other, which it received on its head and shoulders; and with a tranquil and noble gesture, more affecting than any symptom it had yet exhibited, went gliding onwards toward the sunset, at once bent with weakness, and magnificent for very power. The seer then, before it got out of sight, saw it turn round, yearning towards the children; but what was his surprise, when on turning its eyes upon himself, he recognized, for the first time, an exact counterpart of his own face; in fact, himself looking at himself!

Yes, dear reader, the seer was the phenomenon, and the phenomenon is a human being, any care-worn man, you yourself, perhaps, if you are such, or your London Journalist;—with this difference, however, as far as regards you and us; that inasmuch as we are readers and writers of things hopeful, we are more hopeful people, and possess the two-fold faith which the phenomenon seems to have thought a divided one, and not to be united; that is to say, we think hopefully of heaven and hopefully of earth; we behold the sunset shining towards the fields and the little children, in all the beauty of its double encouragement.

A human being, whatever his mistakes, whatever his cares, is, in the truest and most literal sense of the word, a respectable being (pray believe it);—nay, an awful, were he not also a loving being;—a mystery of wonderful frame, hope, and capacity, walking between heaven and earth. To look into his eyes is to see a soul. He is surely worth twice, thrice, and four times looking at and considering,*—worth thinking what we can do for him, and he for us, and all for each other. Our general impressions of things (as the reader knows) are cheerful and ready to receive abundance of pleasure. Our greatest sorrow, when we look abroad, is to think that mankind do not extract a millionth part of the pleasure they might, from the exceeding riches of Nature; and it is speedily swallowed up by a conviction, that Nature being so rich, and inciting them to find it out, find it out they will. But meanwhile, we look upon the careful faces we meet—upon the human phenomenon and his perplexities,—and as long as our sorrow lasts, an indescribable emotion seizes us, of pity and respect.

We feel a tenderness for every man when we consider that he has been an infant, and a respect for him when we see that he has had cares. And, if such be the natural feelings of reflection towards individual faces, how much more so towards a multitude of them,—towards an assemblage—a serious and anxious crowd?

We believe, that without any reference to politics whatsoever, no man of reflection or sensibility looked upon the great moving mass and succession of human beings which assembled the other day in London, without being consciously or unconsciously moved with emotions of this kind. How could they help it? A crowd is but the reduplication of ourselves,—of our own faces, fears, hopes, wants, and relations,—our own connexions of wives and children,—our own strengths, weaknesses, formidable power, pitiable tears. We may differ with it, we may be angry with it, fear it, think we scorn it; but we must scorn ourselves first, or have no feeling and imagination. All the hearts beating in those bosoms are palpitations of our own. We feel them somehow or other, and glow, or turn pale. We cannot behold ourselves in that shape of power or mighty want, and not feel that we are men.

We have only to fancy ourselves born in any particular class, and to have lived, loved, and suffered in it, in order to feel for the mistakes and circumstances of those who belong to it, even when they appear to sympathize least with ourselves: for that also is a part of what is to be pitied in them. The less they feel for us, the less is the taste of their own pleasures, and the less their security against a fall. Who that has any fancy of this kind, can help feeling for all those aristocrats, especially the young and innocent among them, that were brought to the scaffold during the French revolution? Who, for all those democrats, not excepting the fiercest, that were brought there also—some of whom surprised the bye-standers with the tenderness of their domestic recollections, and the faltering ejaculations they made towards the wives and children they left behind them? Who does not feel for the mistaken popish conspirators, the appalling story of whose execution is told in our this day's Romance of Real Life, with that godlike woman in it, who is never to be passed over when it is mentioned? Who does not feel for the massacres of St. Bartholomew, of Ireland, of Sicily, of any place; and the more because they are perpetrated by men upon their fellow-creatures, the victims and victim-makers of pitiable mistake? The world are finding out that mistake; and not again in a hurry, we trust, will any thing like it be repeated among civilized people. All are learning to make allowance for one another: but we must not forget, among our lessons, that the greatest allowances are to be made for those who suffer the most. Also, the greatest number of reflections should be made for them.

Blessings on the progress of reflection and knowledge, which made that great meeting the other day as quiet as it was. We have received many letters from friends and correspondents on the setting up of our Journal, for which we have reason to be grateful; but not one which, has pleased us so much (nor, we are sure, with greater leave from themselves, to be so pleased) than a communication from our old 'Tatler' friend, S. W. H., in which he tells us, that he saw a copy of it in the hands of "one of the sturdiest" of the trades' unions, who was "reading it as he marched along;" and who (adds our correspondent) "could hardly be thinking of burning down half London, even if the Government did continue bent upon not receiving his petition."

* Respectable, respectable (Latin) worth again looking at.

May we ever be found in such hands on such occasions. It will do harm to nobody in the long run; will prevent no final good; and assuredly encourage no injustice, final or intermediate. "To sympathize with all" is the climax of our motto. None, therefore, can be omitted in our sympathy; and assuredly not those who compose the greatest part of all. If we did not feel for them as we do, we should not feel for their likenesses in more prosperous shapes.

We had thought of saying something upon crowds under other circumstances, such as crowds at theatres and in churches, crowds at executions, crowds on holidays, &c.; but the interest of the immediate ground of our reflections has absorbed us. We will close this article however, with one of the most appalling descriptions of a crowd under circumstances of exasperation, that our memory refers us to. On sending for the book that contains it to the circulating library, (for though too like the truth, it is a work of fiction) we find that it is not quite so well-written, or simple in its intensity, as our recollection had fancied it. Nothing had remained in our memory but the roar of a multitude, the violence of a moment, and a shapeless remnant of a body. But the passage is still very striking. Next to the gratification of finding ourselves read by the many, is the discovery that our paper finds its way into certain accomplished and truly gentlemanly hands, very fit to grapple, in the best and most kindly manner, with those many; and to these an extract at this time of day, from Monk Lewis's novel, will have a private as well as public interest.

The author is speaking of an abbess, who has been guilty of the destruction of a nun under circumstances of great cruelty. An infuriated multitude destroy her, under circumstances of great cruelty on their own parts; and a lesson, we conceive, is here read, both to those who exasperate crowds of people, and to the crowds that, almost before they are aware of it, reduce a fellow-creature to a mass of unsightliness. For, though vengeance was here intended, and perhaps death (which is what we had not exactly supposed, from our recollection of the passage) yet it is not certain that the writer wished us to understand as much, however violent the mob may have become by dint of finding they had gone so far; and what we wish to intimate is, that a human being may be seized by his angry fellow-creatures, and by dint of being pulled hither and thither, and struck at, even with no direct mortal intentions on their parts, be reduced, in the course of a few frightful moments, to a state which, in the present reflecting state of the community, would equally fill with remorse the parties that regarded it, on either side,—the one from not taking care to avoid offence, and the other from not considering how far their resentment of it might lead;—a mistake, from which, thank heaven, the good sense and precautions of both parties saved them, on the occasion we allude to.

"St. Ursula's narrative," says Mr. Lewis, speaking of a nun who had taken part against the abbess, and who was relating her cruelty to the people, "created horror and surprise throughout; but when she related the inhuman murder of Agnes, the indignation of the mob was so audibly testified, that it was scarcely possible to hear the conclusion. This confusion increased with every moment. At length a multitude of voices exclaimed, that the prioress should be given up to their fury. To this Don Ramirez positively refused to consent. Even Lorenzo bade the people remember that she had undergone no trial, and advised them to leave her punishment to the Inquisition. All representations were fruitless; the disturbance grew still more violent, and the populace more exasperated. In vain did Ramirez attempt to convey his prisoner out of the throng. Wherever he turned, a band of rioters barred his passage, and demanded her being delivered over to them more loudly than before. Ramirez ordered his attendants to cut their way through the multitude. Oppressed by numbers, it was impossible for them to draw their swords. He threatened the mob with the vengeance of the Inquisition: but, in this moment of popular phrenzy, even this dreadful name had lost its effect. Though regret for his sister made him look upon the prioress with abhorrence, Lorenzo could not help pitying a woman in a situation so terrible: but in spite of all his exertions and those of the duke, of Don Ramirez and the archers, the people continued to press onwards. They forced a passage through the guards who protected their destined victim, dragged her from her shelter, and proceeded to take upon her a most summary and cruel vengeance. Wild with terror, and scarcely knowing what she said, the wretched woman shrieked for a moment's mercy: she protested that she was ignorant of the death of Agnes, and could clear herself from suspicion beyond the power of doubt. The rioters heeded nothing but the gratification of their barbarous vengeance. They refused to listen to her: they showed her every sort of insult, loaded her with mud and filth, and called her by the most opprobrious appellations. They tore her one from another, and each new tormentor was more savage than the former. They stifled with howls and execrations her shrill cries for mercy, and dragged her through the streets, spurning her, trampling her, and treating her with every species of cruelty which hate or vindictive fury could invent. At length a flint, aimed by some well directed hand, struck her full upon the temple. She sank upon the ground bathed in blood, and in a few minutes terminated her miserable existence. Yet though she no longer felt their insults, the rioters still exercised their impotent rage upon her lifeless body. They beat it, trod upon it, and ill-used it, till it became no more than a mass of flesh, unsightly, shapeless, and disgusting."

SECOND WEEK IN MAY. FLOWERS.

"When I said I would die a bachelor," observes Benedict, "I did not think I should live to be married." When we said last week that we could make use of the pages of no author, whose pages on the seasons had already been turned to account, and when we named in our list the writings of Mr. Howitt, we did not think that we should make use of him the very week after our boast. So it is however, and we have three reasons for it; first, (to put on a bold face and be candid about the matter—and it is fitting that "pride should have a fall") because we find we cannot do justice to subjects of this kind, without some help of the sort; second, because Mr. Howitt is the latest, as well as one of the very best of the good writers upon it, and therefore has been less quoted than others; third, because in consequence of the sale already attained by this cheap little paper of ours, the quotations from any book must of necessity be new by many readers who have not met with the book; and fourth, because we have a very particular reason for it, which we shall give an insolent and peculiar piquancy to, by keeping it to ourselves. In writers who have animal spirits, and are tasting of success upon the strength of them, the reader must allow something of an inconsistency now and then,—at least as far as regards system, and what we shall do with the dishes before us; otherwise we give him notice that he is not returning us charity for charity, and that we shall think ourselves authorised to turn round upon his conscience, and ask him if he has had no inconsistency or other infirmity of his own, to test the good-nature of others. Besides, it is May; and who that knows what May is, or feels it as he ought, cares for any of the ordinary unreasonable reasonableness of things, and does not give way to the prior reasons of natural impulses, and all the openness and jovialities that belong to them,—always provided they are honest and have a conscience. We will hear of no faults and inconsistencies this month, and certainly shall not except our own. We stifle objection with May-bushes—pelt it with cowslips—overthrow it into clover. An eloquent and wholesale enjoyer of Nature, who does not mince matters,—Professor Wilson, has spoken highly of Mr. Howitt's book. The Athenæum speaking of it having arrived at a second edition, exclaims, "A second edition! it ought to have been the ninth." We quote these authorities to strengthen our own, and to do what we can towards bettering the growth of the editions. And now for a good, luxuriant, proper piece of May-time out of Mr. Howitt's pages. It is a lump of rich earth and turf, which we transplant into our garden, with all its daisies on it.

"However the festivities with which our ancestors hailed the opening of this month, may have sunk into neglect, Nature has not forsaken her festivities. She still scatters flowers, and revels in dews; she still loves her leafy garniture, and the bursts of unoppressive sunshine; for though we moderns may abandon the customs of our forefathers, and may even deny to May those joyous attributes with which they delighted to invest her; though we complain of cold winds, dull days, and frosty nights, cutting down flower and leaf, and have them too, yet is May a gladsome month withal. Vegetation has made a proud progress; it has become deep, lavish, and luxuriant; and nothing can be more delightful than the tender green of the young hawthorn leaves. Primroses still scatter their million of pale stars over shady banks, and among the mossy banks of haunts; and once more, amid the thickly-springing verdure of the meadow, we hail the golden and spotted cowslip. In woods there is a bright azure gleam of Myosotis sylvatica, a species of forget-me-not, and of those truly vernal flowers called by botanists Scilla nutans, by poets blue-bells, and by country folks cuckoo's stockings. The ferns are pushing forth their russet scrolls amongst the forest moss and dead leaves. In pools—and none of our indigenous plants can rival our aquatic ones in elegance and delicate beauty—are this month found the lovely water-violet (Hottonia palustris) and the buck bean, originally leg-bane or bog plant, from its place of growth (Menyanthes trifoliata), like a fringed hyacinth. The gorse and broom are glorious on heaths and in lanes.

"In the early part of this month, if we walk into woods, we shall be much struck with their peculiar beauty. Woods are never more agreeable objects than when they have only half assumed their green array. Beautiful and refreshing is the sight of the young leaves bursting forth from the grey boughs, some trees at one degree of advance, some at another. The assemblage of the giants of the wood is seen, each in its own character and figure; neither disguised nor hidden in the dense mass of foliage which obscures them in summer;—you behold the scattered and majestic trunks; the branches stretching high and wide; the dark drapery of ivy which envelopes some of them, and the crimson flush that grows in the world of living twigs above. If the contrast of grey and mossy branches, and of the delicate richness of young leaves gushing out of them in a thousand places be inexpressibly delightful to behold, that of one tree with another is not the less so. One is nearly full clothed,—another is mottled with grey and green, struggling as it were which should have the predominance, and another is still perfectly naked. The wild-cherry stands like an apparition in the woods, white with its profusion of blossoms, and the wilding begins to exhibit its rich and blushing countenance. The pines look dim and dusky amid the lively hues of spring. The aubers are covered with their clusters of albescent and powdery leaves and withering catkins; and beneath them the pale spathes of the arum, fully expanded and displaying their crimson clubs, presenting a sylvan and unique air. And who does not love 'the wood-notes wild?' We again recognize the speech of many a little creature who, since we last heard it, has traversed seas and sojourned in places we wot not of. The landscape derives a great portion of its vernal cheerfulness not merely from the songs of birds but from their cries. Each has a variety of cries indicative of its different moods of mind, so to speak, which are heard only in spring and summer, and are both familiar and dear to a lover of Nature. Who ever heard the weet weet and pink-pink of the chaffinch, or the whistle-whistle of the blackbird as it flies out of the hedge and skims along before you to a short distance, repeatedly on a summer evening about sunset,—at any other time? In spring mornings by three or four o'clock the fields are filled with a perfect clamour of bird-voices, but at noon the wood is their oratory. There the wood-pecker's laugh still rings from a distance—the solemn coo of the wood-pigeon is still deep and rich as ever—the little chill-chill sounds his two notes blithely at the top of the tallest trees; and the voice of the long-tailed titmouse, ever and anon, sounds like a sweet and clear-toned little bell. Nests are now woven to every bough and into every hollow stump.

"As the month advances, our walks begin to be haunted with the richness of beauty. There are splendid evenings, clear, serene, and balmy, tempting us to continue our stroll till after sunset. We see around us fields golden with crowfoot, and cattle basking in plenty. We hear the sonorous streams chiming into the milk-pail in the nooks of crofts, and on the other side of hedges."

May, being a good-natured month, seems resolved to see fair play in its birth-days to all sorts of opinion; though perhaps there is not a name among them altogether ungenial. Some of them are gloriously the reverse; and the most unchristian in their theology are not without some Christianity of nature. Last week we noticed the birth-days of Shakespeare and Fielding; in the week before us we have Oliver Cromwell, born on the 9th of the month (26th of April, old style) in the year 1599, at Huntingdon.

David Hume, born on the 10th, 1717, at Edinburgh.

Edward Gibbon, the day after him, 1739, at Putney, in Surrey; and Joseph Addison, May 14th, 1673, at Wotton.

Let us see what May-time and Christian charity can incite people to say of them, in hopes of getting a favorable verdict when they want it themselves. And you may hear of the faults and mistakes of such men (observe) in all the histories and biographies.

Cromwell, the rough teacher of monarchs, and disappointer of republicans, was, with all his faults, a kind son, father, and husband. He was fond of music, though his sect was against it; could be very jovial at a party: and yet said withal, that he would make the name of an Englishman as respected as that of an old Roman; which, during his life, he did.

Hume, the most unphilosophic (in some respects) of all philosophic historians, and a bigoted enemy of bigotry, (that is to say, unable to give candid accounts of those whom he differed with on certain points) was a good-natured, easy man in his own personal intercourse, dispassionate, not ungenerous, and could do people kind and considerate services. Out of the pale of sentiment, and of what may be called the providential and possible, he was an unanswerable, or at least an unanswered dialectician; but there was a whole world in that region, into which he had no insight; and for want of it he was not qualified to pronounce finally on matters of faith and religion.

Gibbon was a sceptic, in some respects, of a similar kind, and more immersed in the senses. Perhaps his life was altogether a little too selfish, and lapped up in cotton. He lumbered from his bed to his board, and back again, with his books in the intervals, or rather divided his time between the three, in a sort of swinishness of scholarship,—the most prone of bookworms. Martyrdom and he were at a pretty distance! He was not the man to die of public spirit, or to comprehend very well those who did. But his scepticism tended to promote toleration. He was an admirable Latin scholar, a punctilious historian, an interesting writer, in spite of a bad style; and his faults, of every kind, appear to have been owing to temperament and disease, and to his having been an indulged infant, and heir to an easy fortune. Let us be thankful we got so much out of him, and that so diseased a body got so much out of life. A writer's infirmities are sometimes a reader's gain. If Gibbon had not disliked so much to go out of doors, we might not have had the Decline and Fall.

And is charity wanted for Addison too? Yes. For whom is it not? The least of us cannot escape, nor the greatest whom we look up to. Addison's nature certainly was not the free, open, generous nature of his friend Steele; neither was his Christianity always as Christian as he took it to be, not even perhaps when he died. But what grace, ease, wit, and sense in his writings; and how much good they did to private life, and what gratitude we owe him to this hour in consequence! No man can be sure, that a good part of the decency and amenity of intercourse which he enjoys in his own house at this moment, is not owing to the lessons of Addison. This fine writer died in Holland-house, Kensington, and has a street named after him in that quarter, probably by direction of the noble and accomplished owner of the mansion.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

2.—CHIMMOCK TITCHBOURNE.

We are indebted to the third volume of Mr. D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature (now republishing) for this most affecting narrative, the deep impression of which upon us, after our first perusal many years ago, has never been effaced; and we find the stamp go sharply again, —yet not without sweetness! Blessings on the heart and soul and immortal memory of that beloved woman, (far superior to all ordinary strength, or fancied callous) ness—for no such common-place would or could have supported it,) who attended the dying, tortured man in his "agony and bloody sweat,"—(words that we dare venture to apply, even to a nature so far inferior, and so mistaken in its heroisms, and who held his burning head, and saw him make the sign of the cross:—and blessings on the sweetness of humanity surviving in these miserable and deluded, yet noble spirits, the Chidiock Titchbournes, and on the letter written by Chidiock to poor "Sweet-check" his wife, (what a gentle flower of a word to remember and comfort himself with in his last anguish,) and on all the mingled greatness and tenderness which, as Mr. D'Israeli truly observes, marks the age of the men of Shakespeare. We hear nothing more of poor "Sweet-check,"—a name that seems to paint her nature, and fortunately promises for her patience. She had need of it, thus losing a young and noble husband.

Mr. D'Israeli did quite right to retain the horrors of the story, horrid though they are. The beauty is greater than the horror. The gold is proved by the fire.

"Midst intestine struggles, or perhaps, when they have ceased, and our hearts are calm, (says our author,) we perceive the eternal force of nature acting on humanity: then the heroic virtues and private sufferings of persons engaged in an opposite cause, and acting on different principles than our own, appeal to our sympathy and even excite our admiration. A philosopher, born a Roman Catholic, assuredly could commemorate many a pathetic history of some heroic Huguenot; while we, with the same feeling in our heart, discover a romantic and chivalrous band of Catholics.

"Chidiock Titchbourne is a name which appears in the conspiracy of Anthony Babington against Elizabeth, and the history of this accomplished young man may enter into the romance of real life. Having discovered two interesting domestic documents relative to him, I am desirous of preserving a name and a character which have such claims on our sympathy.

There is an interesting historical novel, entitled "The Jesuit," whose story is founded on this conspiracy; remarkable for being the production of a lady, without, if I recollect rightly, a single adventure of love. Of the fourteen chapters implicated in this conspiracy, few were of the stamp of men ordinarily engaged in dark assassinations. Hume has told the story with his usual grace: the fuller narrative may be found in Camden; but the tale may yet receive, from the character of Chidiock Titchbourne, a more interesting close.

Some youths, worthy of ranking with the heroes, rather than with the traitors of England, had been practised on by the subtlety of Ballard, a disguised Jesuit of great intrepidity and talents, whom Camden calls "a silken priest in a soldier's habit;" for this versatile intriguer changed into all shapes, and took up all parts; yet, with all the arts of a political Jesuit, he found himself outwitted in the nets of that more crafty one, the minister Walsingham. Ballard had opened himself to Babington, a catholic; a youth of large fortune, the graces of whose person were only inferior to those of his mind.

In his travels, his generous temper had been touched by some confidential friends of the Scottish Mary; and the youth, susceptible of ambition, had been recommended to that queen; and an intercourse of letters took place, which seemed as deeply tinged with love as with loyalty. The intimacies of Babington were youths of congenial tempers and studies; and, in their exalted imaginations, they could only view in the imprisoned Mary of Scotland a sovereign, a saint, and a woman. But friendship, the most tender, if not the most sublime ever recorded, prevailed among this band of self-devoted victims; and the Damon and Pythias of antiquity were here out numbered.

But these conspirators were surely more adapted for lovers than for politicians. The most romantic incidents are interwoven in this dark conspiracy. Some of the letters to Mary were conveyed by a secret messenger, really in the pay of Walsingham; others were lodged in a concealed place, covered by a loosened stone, in the wall of the queen's prison. All were transcribed by Walsingham before they reached Mary. Even the spies of that singular statesman were the companions or the servants of the arch-conspirator Ballard; for the minister seems only to have humoured his taste in assisting him through this extravagant plot. Yet, as if a plot of so loose a texture was not quite perilous, the extraordinary incident of a picture, representing the secret conspirators in person, was probably considered as the highest stroke of political intrigue! The accomplished Babington had portrayed the conspirators, himself standing in the midst of them, that the imprisoned queen might thus have some kind of personal acquaintance with them. There was at least as much of chivalry as of machiavellism in this conspiracy. This very picture, before it was delivered to Mary, the subtle Walsingham had copied, to exhibit to Elizabeth the faces of her secret enemies. Houbraeken, in his portrait of Walsingham, has introduced in the vignette the incident of this picture being shown to Elizabeth; a circumstance happily characteristic of the genius of this crafty and vigilant statesman.

Camden tells us that Babington had first inscribed beneath the picture this verse:—

"Et mihi sunt comites, quos ipse pericula ducunt."
These are my companions, whom the same dangers lead.

But as this verse was considered by some of less heated fancies as much too open and intelligible, they put one more ambiguous:—

"Quorum hæc alio properantibus?"

What are these things to men hastening to another purpose?

This extraordinary collection of personages must have occasioned many alarms to Elizabeth, at the approach of any stranger, till the conspiracy was suffered to be sufficiently matured to be ended. Once she perceived in her walks a conspirator; and on that occasion erected her "lion port," reprimanding her captain of the guards, loud enough to meet the conspirator's ear, that "he had not a man in his company who wore a sword."—"Am not I fairly guarded?" exclaimed Elizabeth.

It is in the progress of the trial that the history and the feelings of these wondrous youths appear. In those times, when the government of the country yet felt itself unsettled, and mercy did not sit in the judgment-seat, even one of the judges could not refrain from being affected at the presence of so gallant a band as the prisoners at the bar: "Oh Ballard, Ballard!" the judge exclaimed, "what hast thou done? A sort (a company) of brave youths, otherwise endued with good gifts, by thy inducement hast thou brought to their utter destruction and confusion." The Jesuit himself commands our respect, although we refuse him our esteem: for he felt some compunction at the tragical executions which were to follow, and "wished all the blame might rest on him, could the shedding of his blood be the saving of Babington's life!"

When this romantic band of friends were called on for their defence, the most pathetic instances of domestic affection appeared. One had engaged in this plot solely to try to save his friend, for he had no hopes of it, nor any wish for its success; he had observed to his friend, that the haughty and ambitious mind of Anthony Babington, would be the destruction of himself and his friends; nevertheless he was willing to die with them! Another, to withdraw, if possible, one of those noble youths from the conspiracy, although he had broken up housekeeping, said, to employ his own language, "I called back my servants again together, and began to keep house again more freshly than ever I did, only because I was weary to see Tom Salusbury's struggling, and willing to keep him about home." Having attempted to secrete his friend, this gentleman observed, "I am condemned, because I suffered Salusbury to escape, when I knew he was one of the conspirators. My case is hard and lamentable; either to betray my friend, whom I love as myself, and to discover Tom Salusbury, the best man in my country, of whom I only made choice, or else to break my allegiance to my sovereign, and to undo myself and my posterity for ever." Whatever the political casuist may determine on this case, the social being carries his own manual in the heart. The principle of the greatest of republics was to suffer nothing to exist in competition with its own ambition; but the Roman history is a history without fathers and brothers! Another of the conspirators replied, "For flying away with my friend, I fulfilled the part of a friend." When the judge observed, that, to perform his friendship, he had broken his allegiance to his sovereign; he bowed his head and confessed, "Therein I have offended." Another, asked why he had fled into the woods, where he was discovered among some of the conspirators, proudly (or tenderly) replied, "For company."

When the sentence of condemnation had passed, then broke forth among this noble band that spirit of honour which surely had never been witnessed at the bar among so many criminals. Their great minds seemed to have reconciled them to the most barbarous of deaths; but as their estates, as traitors, might be forfeited to the queen, their sole anxiety was now for their families and their creditors. One, in the most pathetic terms, recommends to her majesty's protection a beloved wife; another, a destitute sister; but not among the least urgent of their supplications was one, that their creditors might not be injured by their untimely end. The statement of their affairs is curious and simple. "If mercy be not to be had," exclaimed one, "I beseech you, my good lords, this; I owe some sums of money, but not very much, and I have more owing to me." Another prayed for a pardon; the judge complimented him, that he was one who might have done good service to his country; but declares he cannot obtain it.—"Then," said the prisoner, "I beseech that six angels, which such an one hath of mine, may be delivered to my brother to pay my debts."—"How much are thy debts?" demanded the judge. He answered, "The same six angels will discharge it."

That nothing might be wanting to complete the catastrophe of their sad story, our sympathy must accompany them to their tragical end, and to their last words. These heroic yet affectionate youths had a trial there, intolerable to their social feelings. The terrific process of executing criminals was the remains of feudal barbarism, and has only been abolished very recently. I must not refrain from painting this scene of blood; the duty of an historian must be severer than his taste, and I record in the note a scene of this nature.* The pas-

* Let not the delicate female start from the revolting scene, nor censure the writer, since that writer is a woman—suppressing her own agony, as she supported on her lap the head of the miserable sufferer. This account was drawn up by Mrs. Elizabeth Willoughby, a Catholic lady, who, amidst the horrid execution, could still her own feelings in the attempt to soften those of the victim: she was a heroine, with a tender heart.

The subject was one of the executed Jesuits, Hugh Green, who often went by the name of Ferdinand Brooks, according to the custom of these people, who disguised themselves by double names: he suffered in 1604; and this narrative is taken from sent one was full of horrors. Ballard was first executed, and snatched alive from the gallows to be embowelled: Babington looked on with an undaunted countenance, steadily gazing on that variety of tortures which he himself was in a moment to pass through; the others averted their faces, fervently praying. When the executioner began his tremendous office on Babington, the spirit of this haughty man cried out amidst the agony, "Parce mihi, Domine Jesu!"—"Spare me, Lord Jesus!" There were two days of execution; it was on the first that the noblest of these youths suffered; and the pity which such criminals had excited among the spectators evidently weakened the sense of their political crime; the solemnity, not the barbarity of the punishment, affects the populace with right feelings. Elizabeth, an enlightened politician, commanded, that on the second day the odious part of the sentence against traitors should not commence till after their death.

One of those generosi adolescentuli (youths of generous blood) was Chidiock Titchbourne, of Southampton the most intimate friend of Babington. He had refused to connect himself with the assassination of Elizabeth; but his reluctant consent was inferred from his silence. His address to the populace breathes all the carelessness of life, in one who knew all its value. Proud of his ancient descent from a family which had existed before the conquest till now without a stain, he paints the thoughtless happiness of his days with his beloved friend, when any object rather than matters of state engaged their pursuits; the hours of misery were only first known the day he entered into the conspiracy. How feelingly he passes into the domestic scene, amidst his wife, his child, and his sisters! and even his servants! Well might he cry, more in tenderness than reproach, "Friendship hath brought me to this!"

"Countrymen, and my dear friends, you expect I should speak something. I am a had orator, and my text is worse. It were in vain to enter into the discourse of the whole matter for which I am brought hither, for that it hath been revealed heretofore; let me be a witness to all young gentlemen, especially generosi adolescentuli. I had a friend, and a dear friend, of whom I made no small account, whose friendship hath brought me to this; he told me the whole matter, I cannot deny, as they had laid it down to be done; but I always thought it impious, and denied to be a dealer in it; but the regard of my friend caused me to be a man in whom the old proverb was verified; I was silent, and so consented. Before this chanced, we lived together in most flourishing estate: of whom went report in the Strand, Fleet-Street, and elsewhere about London, but of Babington and Titchbourne? No threshold was of force to brave our entry. Thus we lived, and wanted nothing we could wish for; and God knows what less in my head than matters of state. Now give me leave to declare the miseries I sustained after I was acquainted with the action, wherein I may justly compare my state to that of Adam's, who could not abstain one forbidden thing, to enjoy all other things the world could afford; the terror of conscience awaited me. After I considered the dangers whereto I was fallen I went to Sir John Peters in Essex, and appointed my horses should meet me at London, intending to go down into the country. I came to London, and then heard that all was betrayed; whereupon, like Adam, we fled into the wood to hide ourselves. My dear countrymen, my sorrows may be your joy, yet mix your smiles with tears, and pity my case. I am descended from a house, from two hundred years before the Conquest, never stained till this my misfortune. I have a wife, and one child; my wife Agnes, my dear wife, and there's my grief—and six sisters left in my hand—my poor servants, I know, their master being taken, were dispersed; for all which I do most heartily grieve. I expected some favour, though I deserved nothing less, that the remainder of my years might have recompensed my former guilt; which seeing I have missed, let me now meditate on the joys I hope to enjoy."

Titchbourne had addressed a letter to his "dear wife Agnes," the night before he suffered, which I discovered among the Harleian MSS.* It overflows with the most natural feeling, and contains some touches of expression, all sweetness and tenderness, which mark the Shakespearean era. The same MS. has also preserved another precious gem, in a small poem, composed at the same time, which indicates his genius, fertile in imagery, and fraught with the melancholy philosophy of a fine and wounded spirit. The unhappy close of the life of such a noble youth, with all the prodigality of his feelings, and the cultivation of his intellect, may still excite the the curious and scarce folios of Dodd, a Catholic Church History of England.

* The hangman, either through unskilfulness, or for want of a sufficient presence of mind, had so ill performed his first duty of hanging him, that when he was cut down he was perfectly sensible, and able to sit upright upon the ground, viewing the crowd that stood about him. The person who undertook to quarter him was one Barefoot, a barber, who being very timorous when he found he was to attack a living man, it was nearly half an hour before the sufferer was rendered entirely insensible of pain. The mob pulled at the rope, and threw the Jesuit on his back. When the barber immediately fell to work, ripped up his belly, and laid the flaps of skin on both sides; the poor gentleman being so present to himself as to make the sign of the cross with one hand. During this operation, Mrs. Elizabeth Willoughby (the writer of this), knelt at the Jesuit's head, and held it fast beneath her hands. His face was covered with a thick sweat; the blood issued from his mouth, ears, and eyes, and his forehead burnt with so much heat, that she assures us she could scarce endure her hand upon it. The barber was still under a great consternation." But I stop my pen amid these circumstantial horrors.

sympathy in the generosus adolescentulus, which Chidiock Titchbourne would have felt for them!

A letter written by Chidiock Titchbourne the night before he suffered death, unto his wife, dated anno 1586.

"To the most loving wife alive; I commend me unto her, and desire God to bless her with all happiness; let her pray for her dead husband, and be of good comforte, for I hope in Jesus Christ this morning to see the face of my Maker and Redeemer in the most joyfull throne of his glorious kingdome. Commend me to all my friends, and desire them to pray for me, and in all charitie to pardon me, if I have offended them. Commend me to my six sisters, poore desolate soules, advise them to serve God, for without him no goodness is to be expected: were it possible, my little sister Babb, the darling of my race, might be bred by her, God would reward her; but I do her wrong I confesse, that hath by my desolate negligence too little for herselfe, to add a further charge unto her. Deere wife, forgive me, that have by these means so much impoverished her fortunes; patience and pardon, good wife, I crave—make of these our necessities a virtue, and lay no further burthen on my neck than hath already been. There be certain debts that I owe, and because I knowe not the order of the lawe, piteous it hath taken from me all, forfeited by my course of offence to her majestie. I cannot advise thee to benefit me herein, but if there fall out where-withal, let them be discharged for God's sake. I will not that you trouble yourselfe with the performance of these matters, my own heart, but make it known to my uncles, and desire them, for the honour of God, and ease of their soules, to take care of them as they may, and especially care of my sisters bringing up; the burden is now laid on them. Now, Sweet-cheek, what is left to bestow on thee, a small joynture, a small recompense for thy deserving, these legacies following to be thine owne. God of his infinite goodness give thee grace alwaies to remain his true and faithful servant, that through the merits of his bitter and blessed passion thou maist become in good time of his kingdom with all the blessed women in heaven. May the Holy Ghost comfort thee with all necessities for the wealth of thy soul in the world to come, where, until it shall please Almighty God I meete thee, farewell lovinge wife, farewell the dearest to me on all the earth, farewell!

"By the hand from the heart of thy most "faithful lovinge husband,

VERSES,

Made by Chidiock Ticheborne of himself in the Tower, the night before he suffered death, who was executed in Lincoln's Inn Fields for treason.—1586.

"My prime of youth is but a frost of cares,
My feast of joy is but a dish of pain,
My crop of corn is but a field of tares,
And all my goods is but vain hope of gain.
The day is fled, and yet I saw no sun,
And now I live, and now my life is done!

"My spring is past, and yet it hath not sprung,
The fruit is dead, and yet the leaves are green,
My youth is past, and yet I am but young,
I saw the world and yet I was not seen;
My thread is cut, and yet it is not spun,
And now I live, and now my life is done!

"I sought for death, and found it in the wombe
I lookt for life, and yet it is a shade,
I trade the ground, and knew it was my tomb,
And now I die, and now I am but made.
The glass is full, and yet my glass is run;
And now I live, and now my life is done!"

XI. ONE OF THE SHORTEST AND SWEETEST OF ALL STORIES.

MR. WALSH, a gentleman of large fortune, who died about fifty years back, bequeathed an estate of four thousand a year to his niece, Mrs. Benn; but from negligence, resentment, or some other cause, neither explained or understood, left his next male heir, and near relation, unprovided for.

With an addition so important, and at a period which calculates, to a nicety, gratifications and expenses to keep pace with, or exceed the most enormous rent-roll, the majority of mankind would have sat down passively contented; or if any solicitude interrupted their brilliant dreams, it would have been anxiety to determine in what species of luxurious superfluity the new acquisition should be expended. But Mrs. Benn, a very epicure in the theory of real and substantial luxury, declared that her present income was adequate to all her wishes and all her wants, and reserving only a little Berkshire villa, endeared to her by early habits, and in which she had passed some of the happiest hours of her life, presented, and by legal conveyance made over this considerable bequest to her neglected cousin; a free and gratuitous gift, neither demanded nor expected, vast in its amount, and worth, at its lowest valuation, A HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS.

XII. ANOTHER, OF THE SAME CAST.

The law of divorce decreed by the national convention had passed but a short time, when there applied to take the benefit of it a young couple, who had been generally considered by their neighbours, as patterns of connubial felicity. The young woman was beautiful, rich, and married to a lover without fortune; but a few days after the divorce had taken place, they were again united in wedlock; a transaction, which exciting considerable surprise, was thus explained.

Their first union having been what is called a love-match, the lady's guardians, actuated by laudable prudence, had the whole fortune settled on the wife, absolutely independant of her husband, whose moments in the giddy raptures of the honeymoon, rolled on with facility and pleasure. But when time and reflexion had sobered his senses, he complained that his hands, by the illiberal distribution of his wife's fortune, were tied up from engaging in agricultural, professional, or commercial pursuits, so admirably calculated for giving a zest to all enjoyment, by occupying those intervals of life which are otherwise so apt to stupify our faculties in the listlessness of leisure, or the gloom of inactivity. For such evils, this excellent wife saw and provided a remedy. By dissolving their first marriage she became the uncontrolled mistress of her fortune, and gave an effectual proof of her liberality and affection, if not of prudence, by making her husband, on their second marriage, the unfettered master of all she had. The happy husband was thus enabled, by love, the great arbiter of destinies, to whom we are indebted for supreme happiness, or harassing inquietude, to devote a portion of his fortune to elegant or useful occupation.

THE LONDON JOURNAL,

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1834.

THE death of Mr. Stothard, at the venerable age of eighty-four, has grieved all the lovers of art, though it has been long expected. But they regret to think that they can have no "more last words" from his genius—no more of those sweet and graceful creations of youth, beauty, and womanhood, which never ceased to flow from his pencil, and which made his kindly nature the abode of a youthful spirit to the last. An angel dwelt in that tottering house, amidst the wintry bowers of white locks, warming it to the last with summer fancies.

Mr. Stothard had the soul in him of a genuine and entire painter. He was a designer, a colourist, a grouper; and above all, he had expression. All that he wanted, was a more perfect education, for he was never quite sure of his drawing. The want was a great one; but if those who most loudly objected to it, had had a tenth part of his command over the human figure, and even of his knowledge of it, (for the purposes of expression,) they would have ten times the right to venture upon criticising him; and having that, they would have spoken of him with reverence. His class was not of the very highest order, and yet it bordered upon the gentler portion of it, and partook of that portion; for since the days of the greatest Italian painters, no man felt or expressed the graces of innocence and womanhood as he did. And his colouring (which was little known,) had the true relish, such as it was. He loved it, and did not colour for effect only. He had a bit of Rubens in him, and a bit of Raphael—and both of them genuine; not because he purposely imitated them, but because the seeds of gorgeousness and of grace were in his own mind. The glowing and sweet painter was made out of the loving and good-natured man. This is the only process. The painter, let him be of what sort he may, is only the man reflected on canvass. The good qualities and defects of his nature, are there; and there they will be, let him deny or disguise it as he can. In youth, Stothard was probably too full of enjoyment, and had too little energy at the same time, to study properly. In the greater masters, enjoyment and energy, sensibility and strength of purpose, went together. Inferiority was the consequence; but inferiority only to them. The genius itself was indestructible.

Mr. Stothard, for many years, was lost sight of by the public, owing to the more conventional elegancies of some clever, but inferior men, and the dullness of public taste; but it was curious to see how he was welcomed back again as the taste grew better, and people began to see with the eyes of his early patrons. The variety as well as grace of his productions soon put him at the head of designers for books, and there he has since remained. What he did of late for the poems of Mr. Rogers is well known, and his picture of the Canterbury Pilgrims still better, though we cannot think it one of his best. Many of his early designs for Robinson Crusoe and other works, especially those in the old Novelist's Magazine far surpass it; and so do others in Bell's British Poets. There is a female figure bending towards an angel in one of the volumes of Chaucer in that edition, which Raphael himself might have put in his portfolio; and the same may be said of larger designs for editions of Milton and Shakespeare. See in particular those for Comus, and for the Two Gentlemen of Verona, where there is a girl in boy's clothes. Nothing can be more true or exquisite than the little doubtful gesture of fear and modesty in the latter figure, blushing at the chance of detection. Stothard excelled in catching these fugitive expressions of feeling—one of the rarest of all beauties. But he has left hundreds, perhaps thousands of designs—rich treasures for the collector and the student. He is one of the few English artists esteemed on the continent, where his productions are bought up like those of his friend Flaxman, who, we believe, may be reckoned among his imitators; for Stothard's genius was richer than his, and included it.

The lovers of wit, patriotism, and poetry will be glad to hear that there is a small bust to be had, of the famous Andrew Marvell, done in a composition imitating marble, by C. Stephens. It is copied from an old print, which is reckoned his most genuine likeness; and is probably superior to it, inasmuch as the sculptor has added a certain refinement, not to be found in the original, but such as might reasonably be expected in it, when we consider that Marvell was a man of sentiment as well as wit, and worthy to be the friend and champion of Milton; to whose busts by the way, this new one of his brother patriot (the first, we believe, that has appeared) may be deemed in every respect a companion. The costume is the same; they were companions in their lives; and on mantle-pieces they "ought not to be divided." Marvell should go along with his friend in bust as he does in book; for the noble lines are his, which are generally printed before the Paradise Lost, beginning "When I beheld the poet blind, yet bold."

Paganini has brought forth his viola; the grand viola, he calls it. In his hands, it is indeed grand. We have not as yet heard him play any of his most interesting performances on it; none of those melodies of Mozart or Haydn, with which he has enchanted us on his violin, but we have heard his handling still, and his is "a master's hand," worth hearing, for its own sake alone. It has been said that it is no novelty; that it is like his violin playing. This is in some respects true. It is like his violin playing, but it is lower, and finely lower. It has enabled Paganini to descend, like another Orpheus, into the lower regions, with all his beauty. It is less brilliant, of course, than the shorter-stringed instrument; but fuller toned, with a sweetness and mellowness in the harmonics, and a compass, rich in loveliness. We long to hear him play "Possenti Numi!" the finest of bass songs, upon it; or "Qui Sdegno," the most beautiful.

"Con simplicia parole, e puri incanti!"

A RHINOCEROS HUNT.

THE rare sight of a Rhinoceros in England,—(a sort of hog-elephant, or mixture of elephant, hog, tapir, and cattle-moose, cased in compartments of armour, and with a bit of horn on his nose,—whence his name,—Rhinoceros signifying Nose-horn,*) will give double zest to the following description of a hunt of him in the new novel, Makanna or the Land of the Savage,—a book defective in artifice of management, but very interesting upon the whole, both in a general point of view, in incident and in character.

The Rhinoceros, with its strange compound of sensibility and callous skin, acuteness and awkwardness, irritability, bulkiness, mildness, and huge appetite, looks like a sort of lesser Dr. Johnson among animals, as the elephant seems the larger and more respectable prototype. It was, doubtless, from an instinct of this sort, that Davies the bookseller struck out that simile, which every body thought so unaccountable and yet some how so happy. He said that the Doctor laughed like a Rhinoceros.

"For a long way the track continued to traverse the lower bed of the hollows, now piercing through fields of dry reeds, which, in the proper season, form a chain of morasses, or threading the broken jungle that fringes the hanging woods above. The hunters were even becoming careless from the dull unvarying sameness of the pursuit, when, in passing a thicket, Laroon observed that the tender branches of a small euphorbia had been so recently cropped, that the corrosive, but, to the eye, milk-like juice of the tree was still trickling from its wounds.

"Zounds," said Cootje, quietly, "the Dwyka is at hand. Not a beast of the forest can stomach that poison, save himself.—Hiat!"

The precaution was needless, for not a leaf stirred, and the humming of a bee was audible at twenty yards.

"Now," said Cootje, in a low whisper, as the party passed on into a more open space, where, for the first time, a glimpse of the expected river might be discerned through some scattered 'wre-houts' (iron wood-trees), winding sluggishly, like a black serpent, along a rugged chasm, while a reedy swamp stretched out in front, and the jungle to the right, as the ground ascended, thickened into forest.

"Yes, now's the time to put the Dwyka on his mettle;—the hill and trees will sicken him for speed—and if he tries the swamp, we shall puzzle him worse than either."

The justice of this opinion appeared to be generally admitted, and immediate arrangements were made to act upon it. One of the first of these was to send two Hottentots into the wood alone, with the view of rousing the gentleman's attention. Drakesstein and Vernon made slowly for the farther side of the swamp, while Laroon was left to hold the incensed animal in check should he attempt to retreat by his former path into the jungle. In his present condition little could be expected from Gaspal, to whom was therefore assigned the more easy task of firing the reeds if occasion demanded.

This distribution of force was very judiciously effected, but nothing appeared to follow it. The intense green of the wood above drank in the sunbeams in undisturbed serenity as before; and except the low crooning of a wood pigeon, or the remote chatter of a baboon, that seemed, as he moved on a neighbouring tree, to mock their patience, the hunters found no token of life or motion.

This unsatisfactory stillness had continued for some ten minutes longer, when suddenly a small portion of the wood above became violently agitated;—the higher branches smote together, and some of the tallest trees bowed their leafy heads, as if the axe was at their roots.

The commotion increased,—trees fell, and, with a harsh grunting snort, the ponderous beast burst through the crashing branches.

Not a shot had been fired, and the 'Dwyka,' making for the swamp, finished his gambol by rolling in the mud.

The creature was still splashing about most gloriously, when the Hottentots, following his track, issued from the wood. Hitherto they had acted with exemplary prudence, by doing nothing;—but now they marred all, by firing without any proper aim, or chance of success.

Astonished by the report, or rather pricked into attention by a trifling flesh-wound, the swarthy monster sprang to the land. For a few seconds he stood puzzled and irresolute, swinging his grotesque head from side to side, with a strange impatient motion. Whatever might have been the intention of this harlequinade, it was soon over, for, with a sudden lunge, the creature threw himself into extreme speed, and charged full in the direction of Laroon.

Long inured to emergencies of danger, the quick-eyed Creole foresaw the attack, and waited coolly for the proper moment to guard against it, by wheeling his horse behind a hummock of rock, most invitingly at hand. This moment had arrived,—the 'Dwyka' within some hundred paces, was rushing snorting forward amid a cloud of dust, when, had the manœuvre been effected, his skull must have been dashed against the projecting rock, for such was his speed, that halt or turn was equally impossible.

The moment had arrived, but when Laroon attempted to give his horse the necessary impulse, he found the conscious animal shivering and motionless, paralyzed by fear.

The time for thought was past: with the icy chill of desperation at his heart, but still not disconcerted, Laroon cast his rifle on the adjacent rock, with convulsive energy withdrew his feet from the stirrups, pressed them on the shoulders of his steed, and vaulted in the same direction.

Scarcely was this desperate spring effected, when the 'Dwyka' came in contact with the horse, and crushing him against the rock, with the blow staved in his ribs, at the same moment as, by a jerk of his head, he disemboweled him. The 'Dwyka's' horn hung rather in the chest of his victim; and in a second effort to withdraw it, the vicious beast fell on the mangled body.

Cootje said, afterwards, that at this juncture Laroon might with ease have dispatched the enemy, and that with even a single shot. Be that as it might, the 'Dwyka' soon arose, and shaking the clotted gore from his head, looked around, as if in search of a second conquest.

Gaspal with Laroon's led horse, were at hand; but the 'Dwyka,' as if disdainful of the slaughter of Hottentot or cattle, with a loud wild snort, galloped off in the direction of Cootje.

Now was the time for firing the reeds; and Gaspal managed the matter so adroitly, that as the 'Dwyka' floundered through the morass, the crackling fast-spreading flames gathered fiercely and terrifically around. Defended by his impenetrable hide, the obdurate beast, though bellowing with affright, still dashed impetuously forward, while ever and anon, his huge and dusky bull, rising with sudden bounds from amid the burning reeds, as the black hull of a storm-tossed boat staggers through the foam of broken waves, was seen by starts, environed with a flashing ocean of glowing fire, or disappearing in whelming eddies of whirling smoke.

On such occasion the damage is not so great as might be imagined; and when the retreating 'Dwyka' made the shore, he was in fact more dazzled by the glare, and intimidated by the crackling and smoke, than scorched by the flames. Upon the whole, however, his valour was on the wane, and, totally sick of the adventure, he very prudently prepared for flight, by rushing past Laroon, to retrace his former path through the hollows.

Among the jungles of this level, his tremendous strength, as the hunters knew, would most avail him; and they accordingly made every possible exertion to impede his course.

Two of the re-mounted Hottentots put their horses on full speed, in a parallel direction, with the hope of overreaching the beast; and Drakenstein, Vernon, and Gaspal followed, pêle-mêle, on the 'spoor.'

Hoarse shouts and frequent shots, now rattling in the jungle or booming from the hollows, gave a wild animation to the scene. From time to time, too, a small cloud of white smoke, arising here and there above the distant foliage, gave notice that the expedient of firing the herbage was again had recourse to; but as the tumultuous rout passed off, and its discord, growing remote, died on the ear in a faint hoarse murmur, little idea could be formed as to the ultimate event of the chase.

But who, in so stirring a moment, could reason so coolly? Absorbed in the headlong fury of pursuit, the hunters had passed Laroon unheeded; and no sooner were they gone, than obeying one of those impulses that were as the leading angels of his fate,—the latter mounted the spare horse before mentioned, and venturing on the wild track through which the 'Dwyka' had broken, sought, with an anxious look, the deepest shadows of the forest."

A GOOD FELLOW.

ABSTRACT OF DE KOCK'S NOVEL "UN BON ENFANT," OF WHICH THERE IS NO ENGLISH TRANSLATION.

There is nothing more ridiculous (quoit our author) than to see a person pursuing an omnibus, already far in advance, which still continues to gain in the race; the conductor who is employed in looking right and left, never casts his eye upon the dilatory passenger. If the unfortunate be a man, he runs, then he stops, he lifts his hand to the air, he lifts his cane, his umbrella, if he have one; he shakes his arm, as if he would play the drum-major; he puts forth every now and then a-hoy! hoy! hoy!—Conductor!—hallo! hau! ho, there! Now he runs a little, now he pants through the mud, and at last catches the unlucky coach half-way to his place of appointment. If the pursuer be a woman, she either runs not at all, or runs always; women do nothing by halves, they are sooner decided than men; and moreover they run with more grace; they have the tact to choose the pavement too, in courting the attention of the conductor. They certainly sometimes withdraw their garment a trifle; but after all, where is the crime of shewing a leg, especially when it is well made? and few are shown that are otherwise.

"A young man was in pursuit of the sixpenny coach, a goodlooking fellow, of moderate height, but well made; his countenance was frank and pleasing; his dress of a good fashion. At length he caught the omnibus as it turned towards la Madeleine, following the Boulevards; it was tolerably full.

"Have you room, conductor?" "Yes, sir;—on the right, at the bottom; sit a little closer, gentlemen, if you please."

"The young man enters, and does his best to make his way among the immovable legs, the projecting knees, wet umbrellas, muddy feet, and ill-tempered faces; for if ever you have been in an omnibus, gentle reader; (and it is most likely, if you inhabit the capital,) you must have remarked, that when the coach is something furnished with passengers, the arrival of another darkens the countenance of every one; firstly, because it is a cause of delay, and then because it is troublesome to be squeezed. The new-comer is therefore but ill received, and no one moves to make room for him. I have often wondered that those who speculate in such vehicles, have not yet thought of dividing them into stalls, like the front rows of the pit at the theatre; they would then at least be visible, and one would not be liable to receive a passenger on one's knee; and that passenger not always light and pretty. Our new comer sate himself between a man very large, who seemed displeased that any one should sit by him, and a lady who seemed to think the contact of her gown and the young man's coat indecent. "They are going to pack us like herrings!" grumbled the enormous gentleman, stretching his limbs, so as to make himself comfortable. The lady says nothing; but as a fold of her gown remained under her new neighbour, she draws it back with quickness, assuming an air of dignity, of prudery, one of those airs that prove nothing but the absence of amenity." The young man also endeavours to settle himself as comfortably as possible, without paying any attention to the murmurs of the gentleman or the airs of the lady. As soon as he was fairly seated, he looks about him to see what his fellow passengers are like. They are a motley crew, but as they have nothing to do with our history, we will leave the curious reader to seek them in our original, and well will they repay him if he does. The omnibus starts, but makes but little way, on account of its frequent stoppages. At length it is shaken by a sudden shock; some one has jumped on the steps without allowing the mass to stop. "It is a soldier, a non-commissioned officer, in a Hussar's uniform, young, tall, with large black mustachios, which together with eyes and eye-brows of the same colour, a very dark complexion, and features strongly marked, gave his countenance an expression somewhat hard and repulsive.

"Where the deuce is this gentleman going to put himself?" said the fat gentleman; but in a low voice, and less insolently than he usually spoke. The soldier did not seem at all embarrassed; he advances, pushes back legs, knees, looking all the while right and left, as though, to choose his place. At length he throws himself pêle-mêle among the people, and forces a place. The soldier recognizes in the young man, his school-fellow, Charles Darville, and announces himself as Emile Mongérand. To the dismay of the passengers he talks across every body to his old friend, in a loud voice, reminding him of all their wild frolics as school boys and youths, as though they were alone. It was Sunday, and Charles Darville was going to dine with his mother, but Mongérand persuades him to go into a coffee-house to rejoice over their meeting, for Charles is a good fellow, and cannot refuse to do any thing he is asked at the moment. From the coffee-house he drags him to the house of Rozat, another of his school-fellows; thence he takes them both to a billiard-room, where he gets into a row. Rozat evades at the commencement of the disturbance. Charles magnanimously waits till Mongérand himself leaves him to pursue some of his enemies of the coffee-house. It is ten o'clock when he gets to his mother's. His mother is a kind woman, but has hurt her own authority with her goodnatured but careless son, by a severe and reserved manner. Some friends are with her, and among them M. Formery and his niece Leonie; which latter the elder people intend as a wife for Charles. M. Formery is a very exact tradesman, and Charles's want of punctuality annoys him. Charles, however, manages to excuse himself to the satisfaction of all parties. The girl pleases him, and he pleases her. They are married, and old M. Formery retires, leaving his business to the young couple.

Darville is charmed with his wife, and pays more attention to her than to his business. He plays, however, on the violin. At length Leonie presents him with a daughter. He promises himself the satisfaction of giving her a fine education. Leonie smiled and said to her husband, "That which will be above all things necessary to give her, my friend, is a portion. You know women seldom marry without it. You must therefore endeavour to earn money, and get up our business again, which has not gone on very well for some time." "Be easy,—that will all come right: Vanflouck has promised me two commissions. I will give our child a hundred thousand livres, not a jot less."

In order to begin making his child's portion, Charles runs to announce its birth to all his friends; and, to celebrate the happy event, he eats oysters with one, a cutlet with another; plays for his coffee with a third, and drinks beer with Vanflouck; and thus he passes the day out of doors that he ought to have devoted to his wife. Scarcely is Leonie recovered, when she places herself again in the counting-house, and examines the books. She sees with affright that already they have suffered considerable losses in a business which, in her uncle's time, was so fruitful. Charles now often stays out the whole day, and if in the evening he sees signs of distress in his gentle wife's face, he takes his hat and goes out again; "a way husbands have when they are in the wrong; it is a short one, but not the best!" The day of payment for six thousand francs arrives, and Leonie has but half that sum in her strong box. Charles went out in the morning to get some bills discounted, and, according to his custom, stayed out till evening. Rozat and his wife look in while Leonie is still anxiously waiting for her husband. Charles at last comes home. He had been dining with Vanflouck. His colour was higher than usual, and he spoke as if every one were deaf. Leonie saw at once that her husband was a little elevated, and her face was overshadowed with care. Rozat, shaking hands with his friend, smiled archly, while Madame Rozat murmured between her teeth "very pretty!" "Here I am," cried Charles, with a joyous air; "good evening, Rozat—good evening, madame!—I could not come home to dinner, for I was detained with Vanflouck by a Brussels man, who took us to Grignon's, and treated us magnificently!" "Do you know this Bruleois then?" said Leonie, coldly. "No; I saw him for the first time—but he is a very pleasant man, without ceremony; besides, he is the most intimate friend of Vanflouck's." Charles draws something from his pocket for his wife.

Leonie said tranquilly, "What, my friend, is this another present?" Charles opened a little box, and drew from it a handsome pair of diamond earrings, which he presented to his wife, saying, "A week ago I made you stop before a shop window, and asked you which you thought the prettiest, and you showed me these, and I have brought them to you." "How gallant," said Rozat. Leonie took the earrings, but did not seem enchanted with the present, and she said with a little hesitation, "Good, good, my friend, I said I thought those earrings pretty, because you would positively have my opinion; but that was no reason why you should buy them—such rich jewels—it is a folly!"

Charles grew still redder; he drew back a step or two, crying, angrily, "Make presents to your wife, and see how she receives them. This is pleasant. It is enough to make the best tempered man angry! Women do not deserve that we should pay them any attentions!" Leonie had never seen her husband angry; she grew pale, and large tears stood in her eyes. Rosat pinched up his lips, and his wife again muttered "very pretty!" "Come, my dear Charles," said Rosat, affecting an air of simplicity, "you do not see how much your wife's beauty will always merit our homage, our care, our adoration." Before Rosat had finished, Leonie rose from her chair; she ran to her husband, and throwing herself into his arms, hid her face in his bosom, sobbing out, "Ah! my friend, do not be distressed, I was wrong, and I ask your pardon!" With Charles, anger did not last long, and he tenderly embraced his wife. "What a picture!" said Rosat. "Very fine! magnificent! full of fire!" said his wife, looking at the diamonds. Charles borrows some money to replace what he had paid for the diamonds.

"Where is this d—d rascal Charles? where is he, that I may embrace him?" said a tall dark man one day, entering cavalierly into the counting-house where Leonie sat.

"Sir, my husband is out; but"—"Oh, you are his wife, ma'am. Ah! I recollect they told me he was married. And I—I have been married too; I did that folly a year ago. But that is done with, thank God! I cut the Gordian knot. I laugh at it! I made myself a bachelor again. We separated, for good and all!—we had enough of it, both of us!—Enchanted, madame, to make the acquaintance of my school-fellow's wife—Charles must have spoken to you often of me?"—"Your name, Sir?" "Ah! true! I ought to have told you at first: Mongérand—Emile Mongérand, class-fellow of Charles, then non-commissioned officer of hussars, then marchand de nouveautés, then married, then—I don't know what yet—but always, a faithful and devoted friend, and I hope Charles thinks so."

With Mongérand Charles does not retrograde in dissipation. Mongérand takes him every where, to drink, to smoke, to gamble. Charles's easiness gives way before Mongérand's peremptory persuasions, his sarcasms against a led husband; for your weak people, of all others, have the greatest dread of being thought to be governed by their wives. He stays out late at night, and returns smelling of wine and tobacco. His affairs get more and more deranged. His wife loses her health, her peace, but never her affection for her unthinking husband. One day he dines with Mongérand, Rosat, and two ladies of very equivocal repute. His love for his wife fails in this ordeal of temptation; he gets very drunk after dinner, and returns late at night. His wife is already asleep; and he succeeds in getting into bed without waking her. But he cannot sleep; ill conscience and excess of wine disturb his rest, and he is ill. His groans wake his wife. "What is the matter, my friend," said she; "can you not sleep?" "No, I can't sleep." "Are you unwell?" "Yes, I feel ill, I don't know—perhaps—I feel unwell!" "Wait a moment, I will get up." "Perhaps if you call the maid!"—"The poor girl works hard all day, and must be very tired; I can take care of you, and get you any thing you wish." Leonie gets up, overcomes her weariness, puts her dressing gown on, and lights a fire. In a little while some tea is made, and the young wife brings it to her husband. Presently he feels better, and goes to sleep. Leonie would not return to bed till she was quite sure that Charles was asleep; then placing near her any thing her sick husband might wish for, if he waked, she lay down. Still it was almost against her will that she went to sleep, still she kept her ear attentive, while her eyes were closed, in case her husband should complain. Soon after that night Leonie was again a mother, and Charles had a son born during one of his habitual absences.

His new mistress wishes him to take her to a bal champêtre. He has never passed the night out before, but he must take her, or see her no more. He pretends business in the country, and goes. While dancing at the ball, he hears that his house has stopped payment. He persuades himself he can set all things right on his return, and so he dances on.

Madame Darvillé comes to see her son, immediately after his return. She reproaches him with his neglect of business, of his child, his wife. She upbraids him with having exposed himself in public places accompanied by a mistress! Leonie hears it and faints, for she was quite unsuspecting. Madame Darvillé leaves her son to make his peace with his wife, leaving with him two-thirds of her property. His gentle wife forgives him. They pay their creditors, and change the house for a lodging, living on the wrecks of their fortune, till Charles can find something to do. Meantime the failure of his former business puts a period to the existence of old Formerey, who leaves fifteen thousand francs to Leonie. Meantime Mongérand sets up as a wine and spirit merchant. As he has little capital, he obtains Charles's signature to some bills: As Mongérand is one of those who cannot do any business without drinking, Charles and he get drunk. In this condition they intrude themselves into the company of some persons who are celebrating a wedding at the same coffee-house. They are turned out. Mongérand insists upon fighting the people next day, and accordingly an address is given him. Charles returns home late, in a very battered bewildered condition. His wife hears with terror that he is engaged in a duel; but her fears are dissipated next morning by the appearance of Mongérand, who is in a great rage, for the address given him was a false one. The day of payment arrives for Mongérand's bills, and the holder comes to Charles for the amount. Charles is all the poorer for the transaction, and so also is Mongérand. Instead of coffee-houses, Mongérand now takes his easy friend to public-houses. Charles is a little shocked at first, but he soon gets used to it. Charles is at last embroiled in a duel on Mongérand's account, and severely wounded.

In the same house with the Darvillés, in a small room among the attics, lived a young woman, a cabinet-maker, named Justin; he was twenty-two years of age; but the simple sweetness of his face, and the timidity of his manners, made him appear no more than eighteen. Of all the lodgers, he was the only one whom Leonie knew even by sight. In reading at his window he had continually seen Leonie working beneath. Her appearance struck him. At length he got so accustomed to see her, that it was his only pleasure. He desired ardently to speak to her, to serve her, but dared not make an opportunity. Uneasy at the protracted absence of her husband, Leonie goes down stairs to seek some news of him. Justin seizes the opportunity to offer his services. Alas, he only returns to announce the coming of the wounded man. In the confusion, for Leonie faints, he is the presiding genius, and his zeal enables him to acquit himself like one experienced in such scenes. Charles's illness is long and severe, and so reduces their funds, that on his recovery they are obliged to change their lodging for a meaner one. His first task, however, is to visit his mother, who has heard of his mischance, and been ill in consequence. She tells him that she has done all she could for him during his illness; she had sent him money by the people his wife sent to her, but complains that Leonie should have sent drunken men with her messages. Charles guesses justly, that Mongérand is at the bottom of this. As soon as they are settled in their new lodging, which consists of two attics, Leonie sets herself hard to work at embroidery. The children miss much the company of Justin, who had made them his friends during their father's illness. At length they are delighted one day by the sight of him;—he has come to live in the same house. Charles does nothing but play upon the violin, and plague his neighbours by perpetually playing country-dances. One day, going into the house, the porter accosts him, and offers him fifteen francs if he will attend a bridal party as fiddler, at a house where a friend of the said porter's is servant. Charles is offended at the offer, and refuses. He goes up stairs. His wife's eyes were red. For some days the state of health of the little Felix had made her very uneasy; she held him in her arms, for she feared he was cold. Little Laura was running up and down the room blowing her fingers to warm herself. Charles was touched by this picture. "Certainly," said he, "if I went to this dance—fifteen francs,—that is something." He drew near his wife, and said to her—"You do not earn fifteen francs in a day, with your needle, do you?" "Alas! said she, "it is with great pains that I earn fifteen sous; but why do you ask?" "Why—just now—the porter spoke to me;—in short he proposed to me to play dances for a party to-night, and offered me fifteen francs for it." Leonie looked at her husband with anxiety, for her children were cold, and nothing seemed to her too painful to do, that would procure what was necessary for them. "Well, my friend," said she at length, "What did you answer?" "You must know that it could not be very pleasant for me to play the poor fiddler; I learnt the violin for my amusement, not to play to dancing." "Yes," said Leonie, sadly, "I feel all that there is in it which must be disagreeable to you; but when misfortune overwhelms us, we are often glad to turn to those accomplishments we have learnt for our amusement as resources. In short you—" "I refused," Leonie said nothing, she dropped her eyes, and pressed her little son to her heart. Charles was hungry; he opened a cupboard and found nothing in it but bread. He exclaimed, "where then is the dinner?" "The linen-draper did not pay me to day; we have had nothing else." "Deuce! that is a sorry meal!—That rascal, Mongérand! if we catch him!—To leave me in the lurch, after having borrowed money too of my—" Charles finished his sentence between his teeth, and slowly munched his bread for a bit. Suddenly he got up, and exclaimed; "Certainly I will go to this dance." He goes, and is ushered into a room full of people. They are waiting for the future bridegroom, for the wedding is not to take place for a week, this being merely a preparatory rejoicing. At length he comes, and Darvillé recognises Mongérand. Charles is not the only person who is already acquainted with the reckless adventurer, he is recognized also by an acquaintance of his wife's, and the startling fact announced of his being a married man! He is fiercely turned out of the house, and Darvillé of course accompanies him in his ignominious exit. In the turmoil Mongérand breaks the nose of his bride's uncle with Charles's violin, and the violin with the uncle's nose. Mongérand persuades Charles to forgive him for his deception upon his mother, and they go to console themselves in a public-house.

Early in the morning Leonie hears some one enter the house. She goes down stairs to see if it is her husband. It is the porter's friend, come to tell him of the disturbance at his master's house. Leonie, hearing of her husband's danger, falls to the ground. Justin, who has been roused also, lifts her up and carries her up stairs, while he sends the porter for medical assistance. He laid her on the bed, still lifeless. He knew not what to do, he despaired, he wept, for he thought that Leonie was about to die. He threw himself on his knees before her, took one of her cold hands in his, and endeavoured to warm it, sobbing out "Ah! do not die, madame, do not die!—Heaven will not always suffer you to be unhappy!" A little voice alone answered him; it was Felix, who awoke complaining, and asked for drink. A bright redness coloured the child's face. Justin had nothing to give, for there was nothing there. At length the porter returns with a doctor. The surgeon bled Leonie, and she recovered from the fainting; but only to fall into a state of frightful delirium. She called on her husband; she thought she saw him murdered, and accused Mongérand of all their misfortunes. The doctor declared that some one must watch by her while her delirium lasted, and Justin vowed that he would not quit her. While Leonie is in this condition, Charles returns. In his despair, he is rushing from the room, to throw himself into the canal; but Justin detains him. Leonie gets better, but her poor boy dies; a fact that is carefully concealed from the unhappy mother. As Leonie's illness cuts off their only resource, in her needle, Justin supplies Charles with money for the necessary things for the family. Money even thus obtained, Charles cannot devote to its proper purpose, but spends much of it at the ale-house. Justin, with all his simplicity, suspects as much, and then purchases the things himself. Leonie is allowed to believe that her husband's violin, though a failure at first, is more fruitful now, and supplies the wants of his family. While Leonie is slowly recovering, news is brought her one night that her husband has been arrested by the guard. She begs Justin to go and look after her husband's safety. At length Justin returns, but alone. Charles is safe, but cannot be liberated till the morning. "And all that is true, is it not, Justin?" "I assure you on my honour." "Oh heavens!—I've been very ill!—and my child, my poor child, who has sate up to try and console me! go, my dear child, go to bed; wait, let me kiss you again." "And you will not cry any more, mamma?" "No, dear Laura." "And you will sleep too?" "Yes."

Laura went to bed; Justin helped the little girl to undress herself, and then he said to Leonie, who seemed overwhelmed by the events of the night, "How do you feel now, madame?" "I have suffered much—in my heart—chest—every where!—but that will go off." "You suffer still, I see, madame!—Will you grant me one favour?" "A favour!—I—Justin!—alas! what can I do for you." "Allow me to watch this night near you; to remain there, on that chair! You are ill, and if I knew you were alone, without help, I should not be able to taste repose! Here I shall be more easy! I am responsible for you to your husband! Madame, you will not refuse me!" Leonie remains some moments without answering, and then she murmured, in a voice, in which there was something of solemnity, "Very well! Yes, this night—remain near me!"

Leonie seemed overcome, she closed her eyes. Justin, pleased at being allowed to remain near her, went to seat himself on a chair a few steps from the bed. He placed the light so as not to inconvenience Leonie, and abandoned himself to his reflections, lifting his head occasionally to hear if she slept, and striving to hear her breathing. It is three o'clock in the morning. The quiet which till now has reigned in the chamber is broken by some hollow sighs which escape from Leonie. Justin approached her, and asked her what what was the matter. "I feel very ill," said the young woman, in a faint voice; "the event of this night has killed me. I had not strength to bear it!" "Ah, Madame, you are ill; I will go and seek for help—a doctor!" "Do not go, Justin—it would come too late. Remain near me—that I may speak to you still—while I have the strength." "Oh, Madame, you will not die! do not think so! Oh, do not say so!" "Justin, a doctor would be useless—and every other help!—My life is gone, I feel it." "Madame, for pity—Oh, stay—I shall be able to help you myself—to give you what you want.—This is nothing—a weakness—but not to die—you—can it be!"—And Justin ran like a madman about the room seeking Leonie's customary medicines; then he came back, and throwing himself on his knees by the bed-side, bathed her hands with his tears.

"Justin,—do you weep for me? and my child she sleeps. Ah! she must not be waked. Laura! Felix! you will never abandon them, Justin!" "But, Madame, you are not going to die!—Oh! tell me that you will not die!"—"Charles will return too late! Justin I thank you for all that you have done for me! I should like very much to have seen my child! my poor Felix! He is no longer ill, you told me so! But I would yet pray to God for him!"

Leonie's voice failed—it soon became unintelligible; at last its sound ceased altogether, and the hand that Justin held grew motionless and cold.

Charles returns and finds Justin still kneeling by the bed.

A brother of Leonie, who had gone to sea when very young, returns to hear that his sister is dead. He adopts her daughter, and offers to get Charles a situation in America. Mongérand persuades him to remain with him.

Eight years after this period Charles and Mongérand return to Paris. They have exhausted all their resources. Charles is pale and haggard—Mongérand is untameable even by misfortune. Charles visits Pere La Chaise, he perceives an elegant though plain monument. It contains the remains of his wife and son. A fresh garland adorns it. The appearance of Justin accounts for this care; and he offers assistance to Charles. Charles only wants to know where his remaining child lives. As he quits the cemetery he meets Mongérand issuing from a public house. Mongérand accosts him, but he flies his old companion in disgust. He seeks his brother-in-law's house. He sees his daughter at a window. Charles has not enough eyes to look at his daughter with; or rather he looks at her with his soul as well,—his heart; for a father looks at his child with all the faculties of his being. Presently Laura dropped her eyes upon him; she perceiving a man in the road who has his eyes fixed upon her. At first she regards him with a sort of fright, but very soon her fear gives way to compassion. She thinks she sees tears in the eyes of the stranger, and his hands are joined and stretched towards her. Laura concluded that it must be an unfortunate who asks her charity.

Laura quits the window for an instant; but presently returns and throws out a large bit of bread and a small piece of money, saying "Here! I wish I could give you more."

Charles felt struck to the heart at receiving alms from his daughter. He covered the bread and money with kisses and tears, exclaiming, "Thanks, thanks, dear child!" "Mon Dieu! why do you weep so, poor man?" Said Laura, much moved, "You should not despair. One is not always unhappy. You give me pain. Adieu, I will pray heaven for you!"

Charles walked slowly away, when he heard himself called. He trembled, for he knew the voice of Mongérand. The quondam soldier was leaning with his back against a tree, and as Charles came up, he looked at him, sneering. "Well!" said he, "You did not expect to see me here; I followed you because you told me not—I am in the habit of doing that which is forbidden me." "Will you not leave me to my grief?" said Charles. "Ah! I have too often met you on my path!" "I have taken it into my head to keep you company," "And I can no longer bear it!—It adds to my despair! You are the cause of all my misfortunes; you led me on from folly to folly!" "Ah, ha! That is good! I was the cause that my gentleman loved pleasure, women, the table." "Without your bad counsel I should have listened to my wife!—I should not have been the cause of her death!" "Do you know, you grow very tiresome?" "And do you know what I feel?—My daughter has thrown me bread—she took me for a beggar, and I could not declare myself! I shall never more be able to press her in my arms and call her my child. Ah, that thought makes me desperate—it kills me!—Once again, leave me! Sir, I go this way, go you the other!" "I say, Charles, you have long assumed a tone, which in another I should have chastized!" As he said this, Mongérand placed himself before Charles, so as to bar his passage. Charles pushed him rudely away, and continued his walk.

"Insolent!" exclaimed Mongérand, "if I did not pity you—" "Pity," cried Charles, turning back quickly, and throwing a furious look upon Mongérand,—"You pity me, miserable—this odious wrong alone was wanting! Take care that I do not avenge the death of my wife and my son! Give me your pistols!"—"Charles, go—I do not detain you,—go; I will not follow you."—"What! coward! you can no longer lead me to acts of baseness!" "Coward!" cried Mongérand, his eyes sparkling; "Ha! you force me to it. Well, let us fight, if you will."

Mongérand took two pistols from his pocket, assured himself they were charged, and gave one to Charles, saying, "Draw back ten paces and fire!"—"Fire you the first," answered Charles, having drawn back a few paces. "Come, damnation! Let us fire together, and have done!" Charles made signs that he consented. The two scarcely took aim; the two reports sounded together; Mongérand heard the ball whistle past his ear. Charles received that of his adversary in his heart, fell, and expired faltering out the name of Laura.

Mongérand approached Charles, meaning at first to give him assistance, but he found that he was dead. He put his pistols in his pocket, and departed, saying, "It is a pity—he was a good fellow."

THE ASS ON THE BENCH.

FROM THE LATIN OF THE JESUIT PERE COMMIRE.

THE publication of this version of Father Commire's piece of elegant banter on dullness and dull confidence, was suggested by one that appeared the other day in Cobbett's Magazine; but not the version itself; which was made some time ago in consequence of a perusal of Lord Woodhouselee's Essay on the Principles of Translation. His lordship, we cannot help thinking, over estimates the difficulty of making a translation of the original, the pith as well as classicality of which however, is not to be denied. Nor does the translator wish to have his version considered as any thing but the exercise of a lover of the learned languages, too fond of them perhaps, to consider whether his love has a right to show itself on such an occasion or not.

Asinus Judex.

Animalia inter orta cum contentio
Magna esset olim, sedet asinus arbitri;
Quippe aurum mensura liberatio,
Et ere toto fusa simplicitas, probi
Atque patientis iudicis spem fecerant.

Primum ad tribunal se novum sistent apes,
Direpta quæste mella fucorum dolo,
Cellasque inanes. Innocentes ille apes
Voce aktore, oeu nocentes, increpat:
Fucosque labis integros pronuncians,
Dat habere ceras, et favis apum frui.

Clangore post hoc anser obstrepens gravi,
Dato libello supplice, orat ut sibi
Sociasque liceat flumina, et lacus sacros
Cignis repulis, colore. Præses annuit.

Ecce Philomelen Graculus lacessere
Et vocis audax poscere sibi gloriam:
Litam, inquit, asini finiat sententia.
Jubenter ambo canere. Luscinia incipit,
Animosque teneris omnium ac sensus modis
Demulcet. Ipsæ carmina inflexæ caput
Et lenta motant brachia in numerum ilices.
Necquicquam. Inseptis plaus probatur auribus
Rude murmur atque stridor absurde alitis.
Quid multa? fortem vicet, illo iudice,
Columbus aquilam: pulchrior picto fuit
Pavone corvus: ovis libito voracior

Valpes, inique acuta sibilantibus
Aliud ab illo nil, ait, speraveram,
Cujus palato carduus gratus apit.

"There are here," observes the learned critic, "many strokes of the naïveté, which is the characteristic of a good fable, and of which Phædrus is the perfect model. The 3rd, 4th and 5th lines are peculiarly happy. The judge never hears more than one side, and instantly decides in a high tone of confident absurdity. The goose demands exclusive possession of the water and the expulsion of the swans; Præses annuit. The bees complain that the drones consume the fruit of their labour. The judge instantly condemns the bees to banishment, and decrees full possession of the hive and comb to the drones. The fox draws the moral very happily.

The animals disputing went en masse,
And took for judge a venerable ass.
His generous length of ears, and all that grace
Of artless musing flowing o'er his face,
Augur'd a patient mastery of the case.

The bees came first, charging, with many groans,
A world of theft upon their friends the drones
The judge groan'd louder, asking what they meant
To blame good folks so plainly innocent.
His sentence was, that bees should labour still,
And honest drones be free to eat their fill.

The goose came next, requesting that the swan
Might have ejectments served from lake and lawn,
Sweet places, sacred to poetic gods,
And therefore geese's property. Judge nods.

Jay versus Nightingale. Jay represents,
That certain birds have wondrous confidence,
Boasting in song their betters to surpass;—
Appeals with pleasure to my lord the ass.
A sample is required. The bird of night
Begins, and pours forth floods of such delight,
That sense and soul are rapt. The very oaks
Beat time with their old arms and sacred locks.
What signifies? The croak of brother Jay
With justice Jackass bears the palm away.
With like discrimination doves are hail'd
The eagle's lords; the crow is peacock-tail'd;
And sheep has always over wolf prevail'd!

"Nay," cried the fox, seeing one stare and whistle,
"What could you look for from a taste for thistle?"

LETTERS.

SET TO MUSIC BY HENRY R. BISHOP.

LET not a bell be toll'd, or tear be shed
When I am dead.
Let no night-dog with dreary howl,
Or ghastly shriek of boding owl,
Make harsh a change so calm, so hallowed.
Lay not my bed
With yews, and never-blooming cypresses,
But under trees
Of simple flower, and odorous breath—
The lime and dog-rose—and beneath
Let primrose cups give up their honey'd lees—
To suckling bees;
Who all the shining day, while labouring
Shall drink and sing
A requiem o'er my peaceful grave:—
For I would cheerful quiet have,—
Or no noise ruder than the linnet's wing
Or brook gurgling.
In harmony I've liv'd—so let me die,
That while 'mid gentler sounds this shell doth lie,
The spirit aloft may float in spherul harmony.

CHARLES COWDEN CLARKE.

TABLE-TALK.

Elegant Intervals of the Fine Arts.—Hayman the painter, it has been said, was a hero of the fist; and that the heroic Marquis of Granby, who was fond of the same amusement, when he went to sit to Hayman for his portrait, insisted upon having a set-to with the artist before he began his work. The proposal was agreed to and carried into effect immediately. They began in good humour, but as the fighting-gloves had not then been invented, a clumsy blow from one roused the anger of the other; they set-to in earnest, and upset easel as well as combatants; the noise made by the fall alarmed Hayman's wife; she burst into the room and found the peer and the painter upon the floor grappling one another like enraged bears, each striving to keep the other down, while himself got upon his legs. She parted the combatants, and when they had re-adjusted their dresses, Hayman proceeded to complete the portrait of his antagonist.—Shilling Magazine.

A Remark well worth Universal Reflection.—If mourning were altogether out of use, a vast mass of suffering would be prevented from coming into existence.—Bentham's Deontology.

Desirable Source of Revenue.—Henry the Sixth, according to Prynne, actually issued a patent, in which he told his subjects that he should relieve the state of its difficulties by means of the Philosopher's Stone.

A Nice Geographer.—Lady Luxborough, in her letters to Shenstone, speaks of a noble lord, who, having maintained that England was bigger than France, had no way to prove it, but to cut each kingdom out of two maps of different scales, and to weigh them.

Preservation of the City of Dort, in Holland, by Milkmaids. (A story for May.)—The Spaniards, in one of their wars in the Low Countries, intended to besiege the city of Dort, and accordingly planted some thousands of soldiers in ambush, to be ready for the attack when opportunity might offer. On the confines of the city lived a rich farmer, who kept a number of cows in his grounds, to furnish the city with butter and milk. His milkmaids, at the time, coming to milk their cows, saw, under the hedges, the soldiers lying in ambush, but seemed to take no notice, and having completed their task, went away singing merrily. On coming to their master's house, they told him what they had seen; who, astonished at the relation, took with him the one who had been most active, to a burgomaster at Dort, who immediately sent a spy to ascertain the truth of the story. Finding the report correct, he began to prepare for safety, and instantly sent to the States, who ordered the soldiers to be sent into the city, and commanded the river to be let in by a certain sluice, which would instantly lay that part of the country under water. This was forthwith done, and a great number of the Spaniards were drowned; the rest, being disappointed in their design, escaped; and the town was thus providentially saved. The States, to commemorate the memory of the milkmaids' good service to the country, ordered the farmer a large revenue for ever, to recompense him for the loss of his house, land, and cattle; and caused the money of the city to have a milkmaid, milking a cow, to be engraven thereon, which is to be seen at this day; upon the Dort dollars, stivers, and doughts. Similar figures were also set up upon the water-gate of the Dort; and to complete their munificence, the principal maiden concerned was allowed for her own life, and her heirs for ever, a handsome annuity.

Filial Account of one's Father's Attractions.—Though my father was neither young, being forty-two; nor handsome, having lost an eye; nor sober, for he spent all he could get in liquor; nor clean, for his trade was oily; nor without shackles, for he had five children; yet women of various descriptions courted his smiles, and were much inclined to pull caps for him.—Hutton's Autobiography. The secret of this phenomena on the part of the Birmingham women, appears to have been, that Master Hutton senior, was a very clever, amusing personage.

Reading.—When the business of the day is over, how many men does the evening hour find comfortably seated in their easy chairs, reading to themselves, or to some fair friend, or happy group! In how many pleasant homes, while the ladies are seated at their morning employments, or amusements, or whatever they may please to call them, does some glad creature read aloud, in a voice full of music, and marked by the sweetest emotion of a young pure heart, a lay of our mighty bards, or a story of one of our most cunning interweavers of the truth of nature with the splendour of fiction, or follow the wonderful recitals of our travellers, naturalists, and philosophical spirits, into every region of earth or mind! Publishers may tell us, 'poetry don't sell;' critics may cry 'poetry is a drug;' thereby making it so with the frivolous and unreflecting, who are the multitude,—but we will venture to say, that at no period were there ever more books read by that part of our population, most qualified to draw delight and good from reading; and when we enter mechanics' libraries, and see them filled with simple, quiet, earnest men, and find such men now sitting on stiles in the country, deeply sunk into the very marrow and spirit of a well-handled volume, where he used to meet them in riotous and reckless mischief, we are proud and happy to look forward to that wide and formerly waste field, over which literature is extending its triumphs, and to see the beneficent consequences that will follow to the whole community.—William Howitt in the Monthly Repository.

"This Publication with rather a rough exterior, has very good matter in it. It is, by far, the best Radical Shilling's worth that we have ever seen in the Literary market. Its politics are evidently written by an honest and earnest man with good feelings in him. It is quite the opposite of the impertinence, sapping philosophy that we see in the trashy things which affect Science and Republicanism. We must have an extract from its political article soon; meanwhile, let our readers rejoice over the following admirable passage in an article on 'Shakespeare and his Prefaces.'—The Albion Evening Paper, (of Tory politics.)

"This periodical has, at the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Oldham, (who it appears from a clever address by the editor, promises to contribute articles) assumed its present designation. It exhibits no falling off in the merit and tact of its contributors."—Morning Advertiser, (A Radical Morning Paper.)

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which attended its acquisition. It was the desire of relieving science from their encumbrances that Dr. Arnott, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent men, commenced their labours; and it is a humble but honest helpmate in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Library of Popular Instruction" will for the future be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

THOUGHTS IN BED UPON WAKING AND RISING.

AN "INDICATOR" IN VERSE.*

'Tis dawn, nay day-light certain; I know not
If bright or dull; but the white window shows
Difference from darkness, and the world goes round
In order, safe within the force of God,
And gentle light is sweet for its own sake.

A moment yet, fair day.—Within this force,
Calm in my very weakness, and desiring,
I trust, what it desires, do I awhile
Enclose me in a prayer of lovingness
For me, and for my friends, and all mankind.

Mine eyes re-open, blest. How well those birds,
The little angels of the trees, rejoin
One's consciousness of earth! What pure good-morrow!
'Tis fit that the first tongue which speaks to us
Of day-light, should speak beautifully. True love
Does this, and will not miss so sweet a time,
Turning it face to face, and ending prayer
With blessing realiz'd. Wise sire was he,†
And had (no wonder) a wise loving son,
Who every morning, breathing in a flute,
Took the sleep softly from his infant's eyes,
Disposing thus his spirit to accord.
Parents beside their infants' beds are Gods:
They do them good, awaking or asleep,
Ere the small mortals know them. Who shall say,
That spirits divine stoop not in pity thus
Over the parents too, in their distress,
Their children grey; and out of struggling dreams
Wake them to some strange face of hope and joy,
Some re-assurance of regarding heaven

Yes; light is lovely for its own good sake.
Morning is morning still, clouded or fair.
He wants his cure indeed from Nature's breast,
Wants air, and movement, and a natural life,
Or innocence regain'd from patient thoughts,
To whom the daylight's reappearance mild
Comes like a blow,—like a dread taskmaster
Waking his slave, who sees his load, and groans.
For me, whom Love and no unloving need
Have taught the treasures found in daily things,
I count the morning bright, if I but hear
One bird's voice sparkle (for the voice of birds,
By fine analogy of sound with sight,
Surely does sparkle, making brilliant cheer
Congenial with the sunbeams); and if bird
Nor sunbeam is abroad, but listening more
I hear the windows thick with wateriness,
Which ever and anon the gusty hand
Of the dark wind flings full, I make my morn
Still beautiful if I please, with sunny help
Of books or my own thoughts; sending them up
Like nymphs above the sea of atmosphere,
To warm their winking cheeks against the sun,
And laugh 'twixt islands of the mountain tops.
Or else my morning breaks for me in bloom
Out of old Greece, twice glowing with some love
Of sweet Aurora midst the lily dews:
Or with the tumbling freshness of the seas
Am I, with slippery porpoise, and mirth
Of the wide breathing of the rough serene

* It is not meant by this, that the present Indicator is a versification of a former one, but that it is an original verse essay, written in the spirit of the paper under that name † Montaigne's father.

Tossing the seaman's house, whose sides are touch'd
With the warm heav'n, after a night of wet:
Or rising where the sun does, I behold,
Enthron'd, the Persian with his jewelry,
True "Brother of the Sun," if only then,
And giving beam for beam, awake and high,
While the dull princes of the West lie blow'd.

'Tis fine to think, that with the earliest sun,
Not kings alone, but the whole East is up,
In this well meriting its orient name.
So rose the patriarchs, and sate with heaven
Under the oaks they planted. So rise now
All that pretend to patriarchal bloom,
Agreeing all, if in nought else, to make Each day the symbol and part integral
Of the whole life, and so to morning life
Each day restor'd, catching the quick blood round,
Till sweet and late it stop, not clogg'd midway,
Nor jarring with the swift smooth soul o' the world.

Some right have the swift-blooded to be proud,
Not in poor scorn, or low comparison
With what is under them (which stoops them lower)
But in the joy of lofty company
Right-strength'd, and all fair planetary things
That dance with heav'n. I've risen in winter-time
Before the dawn, and making me a bower
Of warmth and light with candle and with fire,
Sail'd in the climate like a shrouded god,
Lord of the day before me, and at times
Peering betwixt my curtains out on earth
Fast sleeping, and with blocks of houses black,
'Till to myself I almost feign'd to seem Proud o'er my prostrate kind; and partly did,
Because of my good will, and a good task.

And yet, thus warring against indolence
And ease, as I get up, with sprightly words,
Like medicinal arrows of the sun,
Shall I pretend, with the unfeeling need
Of one who rides through battle, to partake
No sympathy with those whom I leave lying?
No thought, ye powers of habit and sweet sleep
And sweet remorse, for bed! catholic bed!
The universal, willful, sweet, stretch'd bed!
Bed, that lays prostrate half the world in turn,
And hugs us in a heav'n of our own arms?

Let me lie still awhile, and moot that point,
The bed-clothes o'er my ear. 'Tis charity,
Impartial sense: one would taste all like others,
To judge them rightly. What a turn is this,
One's back to the window! How it makes all new,
Bringing a second and soft curtain'd night
Over one's smiling eyelids! What old warmth,
Touch'd with new coolness at the hand or knee!
What a next half-an-hour!

Now is the house
Risen before me, and I find my rest,
By contrast of their mere activity,
Grow sweeter. They, methinks, are forc'd to rise,
And I, not being forc'd, taste freedom more.
I doze, I fix myself, I turn again,
Waking; then turn upon my back, and keep
The middle of the bed, from a nice sense
Of equal reasoning; and do find withal
That such as marvel how vivacious men
Can lie awake, have not vivacity,
But from gross need of life and motion, hurt

A lively cause. Oh these are not the wits
To tax ingenious bed! Life livelier still Than what lies smiling in us, must do that,— Birds, sunbeams, habits, duties, all at once,—
Or journey, or another's journey help'd;
Or friend who comes to breakfast, and who piques
Our friendship and our emulation both;
Or laughing children; or a sudden voice,
Sudden, and strange, and well known, and belov'd,
And loud (as far as such sweet voice can be)
That comes before her letter, and fills all
The sunny house with lightsome womanhood.

Dull admonition provokes opposition.
(This is a proverb in the style of Swift,
Who made old sayings as he wanted them.)
No life in lying still! Why we may lie,
(We who have any ubiquity of spirit)
And still roll round wi' the earth: we can turn swift
The corner of dull night, and so be whirl'd
Full in the face of morning, with a flash
Sudden as Alpine tops to eagles' eyes:
We can be up with every bee, bird, peasant;
Bounding with deer, suck'd up to heav'n with larks,
Careering with wild steeds, dashing with waves
'Gainst the short breath of the fresh laughing morn.

A little leaven, saith a reverend text,
Leaveneth a lump. Not long since liv'd a lump
Of round humanity, nay, liveth still,
And ever shall, long as the Seasons roll
And clouds drop fatness, who with his sweet leaven
Of lazy and luxurious sympathy
With all sweet things, might have sufficed, alone,
To shew how quick and dulcet at the core
A slugabed can be.* "Falsely luxurious!
Will not man wake!" cried he; then turning, lay
In bed till twelve; and sauntering, when he rose,
Into his garden, slipper'd, and with hands
Each in a waistcoat pocket (so that al Might yet repose that could) was seen, one morn,
Eating a wondering peach from off the tree.

He said he had "no motive" to rise soon.
"And why should he have ris'n?" sharply enquired
The critic, sage in his goodnatured spleen
Against the shallow: "what had he to do,
After delighting us with deathless books,
But to lie on, wrapp'd in his ease and fame,
And have his feast out?"† Nothing—but to lie
Still longer, and with thrice his feast of fame,
And half his fat;—could all that moulded him,
Blood, breeding, habit, and his ancestors,
And e'en the very plumpness of his verse,
Have let him; so with Wieland to have shaken
His silver locks at eighty with mild mirth;
Or died, as Titian, 'midst his colours, did,
Nipt in his reverend bloom by a mischance
At ninety-nine! But circumstance and habit,
Like secret mistresses, clasp mightiest men,
Much more these teachers of soft sympathy,
Whose world were yet the best, were all made smooth
And acquiescence justice; and they speak
E'en now a voice, which, in the echo grows
Stronger than victory blowing through a town,
Because none hate it.

Lie then, if ye will,
Ye gentle, and ye jovial, and like him

* Thomson, author of the Seasons.

† See a passage in Hazlitt's Table-Talk

Moot the sweet point, if fortune give ye leave,
 And no wrong'd future mar the twice-heap'd down
 Pluck'd from the heart of hours, yet in the nest.
 Lie on, ye old, and cold, and cosy; lie,
 Ye thin whose bones want clothing; and ye fat,
 Yourselves a bed for jollity; and lie,
 Ye who last night forgot that it was night,
 The wine discours'd so well; and all in short
 Who with excuse or none (none being best,
 Because the sweet will then is most unmixed)
 Wake but to differ with old moral dawn,
 And, like a lover, who more fondly clasps
 His mistress blam'd, turn closer to dear bed.
 All must have justice done to them, ere all
 Can feel for all: and this being done to you,
 Ye captives of embracing circumstance
 And o'ergrown leisure, think, I pray you, tenderly,
 As the sweet poet did, of those whose wants,
 Or other dread-voic'd calls on waking eyes,
 (In which perhaps a tear has dreamt all night)
 Suffer not ev'n to suffer from repose,
 So dire their load, and to be balanc'd ever.
 Think of them when ye rise; and teach, like him,
 Justice, and truth, and better measurement
 Of ease to all; so shall they gladly see
 Your happier lot meantime, till rights go round,
 And some blest morn, ye, they, and the whole earth
 Shall be rejoic'd to rise, because the earth
 Then, for the first time, shall spin perfectly
 In the pleas'd ear of Him that made Endeavour.

Like smiles and tears upon an infant's face,
 Who wonders at himself, and at such things
 In faces round him, my swift thoughts are mix'd.
 'Tis natural to me; nor unnatural
 To any human heart, deeply conceiving
 Sorrow or mirth. May it be harsh to none.

THIRD WEEK IN MAY.

MORE FLOWERS.

WE can no more help turning to Mr. Howitt's pages this week for another extract, than we can into the fields themselves. They are truly vernal, rich in hopes of every kind, and a cheerful religion is upon them. A kind and embracing heaven looks down; a glad and grateful earth looks up. Those writers who omit a sense of the unknown world in their books, (provided it be a kindly one) and of the great spirit of beauty and beneficence which causes all the lovely things we behold, might as well omit the sky in their landscapes, and go looking strait-forward or downward without the power of raising their eyes. To be always unconscious of what is invisible round about us, or remote, is in some sense, to be ignorant of what we see; for it prevents us from seeing the most delicate and suggestive part of its own beauty, and the innumerable images of fancy and delight which play round it.

The blue sky bends over all:—

As to flowers, which are endless in their suggestions, and about which we could hear endless talk from such writers as Mr. Howitt, we have often had a fancy respecting their origin, of which he has reminded us by speaking of them as among the "minor creations." They seem as if the younger portion of angels—the childhood of heaven—had had a part of the creation of the world assigned to them, and that they made the flowers.—And yet who could so well know how to please them, as he who made themselves?

"The return of May again brings over us a living scene of the loveliness and delightfulness of flowers. Of all the minor creations of God, they seem to be most completely the effusions of his love, of beauty, grace, and joy. Of all the natural objects which surround us, they are the least connected with our absolute necessities. Vegetation might proceed, the earth might be clothed with a sober green; all the processes of fructification might be perfected with being attended by the glory with which the flower is crowned; but beauty and fragrance are poured abroad over the earth in blossoms of endless varieties, radiant evidences of the boundless benevolence of the Deity. They are made solely to gladden the heart of man, for a light to his eyes, for a living inspiration of grace to his spirit, for a perpetual admiration. And accordingly they seize on our affections the first moment that we behold them. With what eagerness do very infants grasp at flowers! As they become older, they would live for ever amongst them. They bound about in the flowery meadows like young fawns; they gather all they come near; they collect heaps; they sit among them, and sort them, and sing over them, and caress them, till they perish in their grasp.

* This assertion is a little hasty: for how can we tell with what eyes, or unknown feelings, the insects, as well as other creatures may not regard the flower?

This sweet May morning
 The children are pulling
 On every side,
 In a thousand valleys far and wide
 Fresh flowers. Wordsworth.

We see them coming wearily into the towns and villages with their pinafores full, and with posies half as large as themselves. We trace them in shady lanes, in the grass of far-off fields, by the treasures they have gathered and left behind, lured on by others still brighter. As they grow up to maturity, they assume, in their eyes, new characters and beauties. Then they are strewn around them, the poetry of the earth. They become invested by a multitude of associations with innumerable spells of power over the human heart; they are to us memorials of the joys, sorrows, hopes, and triumphs of our forefathers; they are, to all nations, the emblems of youth in its loveliness and purity.

The ancient Greeks, whose souls pre-eminently sympathized with the spirit of grace and beauty in every thing, were enthusiastic in their love, and lavish in their use of flowers. They scattered them in the porticoes of their temples, they were offered on the altars of some of their deities; they were strewn in the conqueror's path; on all occasions of festivity and rejoicing they were strewn about, or worn in garlands.

It was the custom then to bring away
 The bride from home at blushing shut of day;
 Veiled, in a chariot, heralded along
 By strewn flowers, torches, and a marriage song. Keats.

The guests at banquets were crowned with them.

Garlands of every green and every scent
 From vales deflowered, or forest trees branch-rent,
 In baskets of bright oiled gold were brought,
 High as the handles heaped; to suit the thought
 Of every guest, that each as he did please
 Might fancy fit his brow, silk pillowed at his ease. Keats.

The bowl was wreathed with them, and wherever they wished to throw beauty, and to express gladness, like sunshine they cast flowers. Something of the same spirit seems to have prevailed among the Hebrews. "Let us fill ourselves," says Solomon, "with costly wine and ointments; and let no flower of the spring pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be withered." But amongst that solemn and poetical people they were commonly regarded in another and higher sense, they were the favourite symbols of the beauty and the fragility of life. Man is compared to the flower of the field, and it is added, "the grass withereth, the flower fadeth." But of all the poetry ever drawn from flowers, none is so beautiful, none is so sublime, none is so imbued with that very spirit in which they were made as that of Christ. "And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet, I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you. O ye of little faith!" The sentiment built upon this, entire dependance on the goodness of the Creator, is one of the lights of our existence, and could only have been uttered by Christ; but we have here also the expression of the very spirit of beauty in which flowers were created; a spirit so boundless and overflowing that it delights to enliven and adorn with these riant creatures of sunshine the solitary places of the earth; to scatter them by myriads over the very desert "where no man is; on the wilderness where there is no man; sending rain, to satisfy the desolate and waste ground, and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth."

In our confused notions we are often led to wonder why

Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
 And waste its fragrance on the desert air!

why beauty, and flowers, and fruit, should be scattered so exuberantly where there are none to enjoy them. But the thoughts of the Almighty are not as our thoughts. He sees them; he doubtlessly delights to behold the beauty of his handiworks, and rejoices in that tide of glory which he has caused to flow wide through the universe. We know not, either, what spiritual eyes besides may behold them; for pleasant is the belief, that

Myriads of spiritual creatures walk the earth

And how often does the gladness of uninhabited lands refresh the heart of the solitary traveller! When the distant and sea-tired voyager suddenly descries the blue-mountain tops, and the lofty crest of the palm-tree, and makes some green and pleasant island, where the verdant and blossoming forest boughs wave in the spicy gale; where the living waters leap from the rocks, and millions of new and resplendent flowers brighten the fresh sward, what then is the joy of his heart! To omnipotence creation costs not an effort, but to the desolate and weary how immense is the happiness thus prepared in the wilderness! Who does not recollect the exultation of Vaillant over a flower in the torrid wastes of Africa? A magnificent lily, which, growing on the banks of a river, filled the air far around with its delicious fragrance, and, as he observes, had been respected by all the animals of the district, and seemed defended even by its beauty. The affecting mention of the influence of a flower upon his mind in a time of suffering and despondency, in the heart of the same savage continent, by Mungo Park, is familiar to every one.

In the East, flowers are made to speak the language of sentiment. The custom of embellishing houses and garnishing tables with them is unquestionably eastern. Perhaps the warmer countries of Europe are less in the use of them than they were formerly. Boccaccio talks of them being disposed even in bedchambers; "E nelle camere i letti fatti, e ogni cosa di fiori, quali nella etagione si potevano avere, piena;" and at the table of the narrators of the Decameron stories, as "Ogni cosa di fiori di qinestra coperta."† In England they are much less used than on the continent, and much less than they were by our ancestors. On May-day, at Whitsuntide, and on other holiday occasions, the houses were profusely decorated with them, and they were strewn before the door.

Over the extinction of many popular customs, I cannot bring myself to grieve; but there is something so pure and beautiful in the plentiful use of flowers, that I cannot but lament the decay of these. Perhaps the most touching of our popular use of flowers is that of strewing the dead with them, designating the age, sex, or other particular circumstances, by different flowers. How expressive in the hand of a fair young girl, cut off in her early spring, are a few pure and drooping snow-drops, an image exquisitely employed by Chantrey in his celebrated piece of sculpture—the two Children at Litchfield. Let the pensile lily of the valley for ever speak of the gentle maid that has been stricken down in her May; and the fair white lily, of the youth shorn in his unsullied strength; and let those who have passed through the varieties of time have Flowers of all hues, and with its thorn the rose.

But even this tender custom is on the decline, from a needless notion that they generate insects, and tend to destroy the body they adorn. In reality, however, the love of flowers never was stronger in any age or nation than in ours. We have, perhaps, less love of showy festivity than our ancestors, but we have more poetry and sentiment amongst the people at large. We have conveyed from every region its most curious and splendid plants; and such is the poetical perception of natural beauty in the general mind, that wherever our wild flowers spring up, in the grass, on the overhanging banks of the wild brook, or in the mossy shade of the forest, there are admiring eyes to behold them.

BIRTHDAYS.

May 15th, 1551, William Camden, the historian and antiquary, born at London, one of the fine old earnest writers of the greatest age of English literature, when knowledge, and faith in the beautiful, went hand in hand. He was educated first at Christ Hospital, then at St. Paul's School, and afterwards at Oxford; and on taking his degree at that University, became one of the masters at Westminster School; where among his pupils he had Ben Jonson, who in after life addressed him the following grateful and affecting lines, which considering the subject and the writer, acquire even an additional grace from a sprinkle of pedantry.

Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
 All that I am in arts, all that I know (How nothing's that!) to whom my country owes
 The great renown, and name wherewith she glows
 Than thee the age sees not a thing more grave,
 More high, more holy, that she more would crave.
 What name, what skill, what faith hast thou in things!
 What sight in searching the most antique springs?
 What weight, and what authority in thy speech!
 Man scarce can make that doubt, but thou canst teach.
 Pardon free truth; and let thy modesty
 Which conquers all, be once o'ercome by thee.
 Many of thine this better could than I,
 But for their powers, accept my piety.‡

May 16th, 1469, at Florence, Niccolo Macchiavelli, historian, statist, and miscellaneous writer, one of the puzzlers of biography. It is not known of his book "The Prince," whether he meant a grave irony, ridiculing the most detestable maxims of government, or a serious recommendation of them! Those who are curious on the subject, and do not read Italian, may see his works translated by Farnsworth, in the British Museum. There is also a translation of the "Prince," (if our recollection does not deceive us) by a living writer, Sir James Byerley. For our parts, we give the acute, the deep, but simple mannered and courageous Florentine, who died poor, and who endured the torture rather than betray a cause, the credit of having been a man of the best intentions, whatever he wrote; and so thinking, our present lights on the subject of what is best for mankind do not allow us to suppose that he intended any thing but an irony. Macchiavelli was a wit as well as a philosopher, and could openly banter when he chose: let us conclude he could banter as well in secret.

* The beds, made in the chambers, were strewn with all the flowers in season.

† Covered all with flowers of Spanish broom.

‡ An ancient and foreign mode of speaking. Ego quædivum incedo regina, says Juno in Virgil—"I who go, the queen of the Gods." Piu superbo va, says the modern Italian—"more proud goes."

§ This better could; that is to say, "could do this panegyric better."

¶ Piety in the old Roman sense, meaning a devoted affection.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XIII.—THE BLACK ASSIZE.

THE Black Assize at Oxford, during the reign of Elizabeth, was so called from the circumstance of judges, jurymen, nobility, gentry, and the majority of the persons present, to the amount of near three hundred, sickening and dying, within forty-eight hours after they left the court.

Of the manner in which these unfortunate individuals were seized; the nature, progress, treatment, and technical description of their disease, it is not (says the author of the "Lounger's Common Place Book,") in my power to speak; though to a medical reader they would afford a subject of curious and useful investigation.

This destructive pestilence, which readers who do not on every occasion hunt out for mysterious causes, would naturally attribute to malignant contagion, exasperated by the unwholesome atmosphere of a crowded court, during three hot days in July, was said to be occasioned by noxious effluvia, issuing from the ground, but is attributed by Lord Verulam to some infectious disease brought out of the prison; as Sir Robert Bell, the presiding Judge and Chief Baron of the Exchequer, frequently remarked a noisome and offensive smell, and demanded from whence it proceeded, but could obtain no satisfactory answer. This awful and tremendous visitation is accounted for in a singular way by a learned but credulous writer, strongly tainted with the party violence and superstition of that period: "At this, the Black Assize, Rowland Jenks, a Popish recusant, was arraigned, and finally, after a long trial, condemned to die, for words seditiously and treasonably spoken against the queen's majesty."

"While the chief baron pronounced, in due form, and with accustomed solemnity, sentence of the law on this offender, a pestilential vapour suddenly arose so almost as to smother the court; various were the conjectures concerning so rude and filthy an annoyance, but all were distant from the mark; I am, however, enabled to assign the true cause on indisputable evidence. A rare and valuable M.S. came accidentally in my possession, collected by an ancient gentleman now at York, and an industrious gatherer together of strange facts, who lived in Oxford at the time of this marvellous calamity.

"This curious observer asserts that the aforesaid Rowland Jenks being sometimes permitted by favour of the Sheriff, who was suspected of leaning towards Anti-Christ, to walk at times abroad, accompanied by an under-jailer; on a certain occasion, by fair words and well-timed presents, prevailed with his keeper to call with him at an apothecary's, to whom he produced a recipe for compounding certain drugs, desiring to have it done with all convenient speed. This person, on viewing the paper, replied that the ingredients were costly in price, powerful in effect, and tedious in preparation; that previous to such mischievous materials going forth, he must be well assured that they would not be applied to any unlawful purpose. The prisoner made answer that rats and other vermin had gnawed and otherwise defiled the few books he had been indulged with since his imprisonment, and that the recipe in question was for the purpose of destroying these animals. The apothecary desired to retire a few minutes for consideration, during which he copied the formula, and speedily coming back, returned it, saying, that he would not, on any account, be concerned in handling such dangerous weapons.

"Each particular article of this strange commixture might have been imparted to the public, but they were of a nature so horribly deleterious that I feared their falling into the hands of wicked and designing men; yet, it seems that Jenks did in some way or other get his poisonous mess prepared, and against the day of trial had made, infused or interwoven it into, or with a cotton wick, which on being lighted would burn like a candle.

"The moment sentence was passed, and he knew that death was unavoidable, having provided himself with a tinder-box and steel, he lighted that infernal thread which was to determine the fate of so many. The diabolical effects which ensued are upon record, and too well known to need repeating. Indeed, whoever by chance or by design shall be made acquainted with the materials it was composed of, which I wish may for ever be blotted out and forgotten, will easily believe its virulent and venomous effects."

This singular account is evidently penned by a lover of the marvellous; it will not bear the touchstone of criticism or common sense; and endeavours to go out of the road to account for that, which, as has been well observed, might easily, and frequently does take place, as the common effect of pestilential infection. It may also be asked, how could the supposed perpetrator of the mischief prevent his suffocating vapour from acting with equal fatality to himself, his fellow prisoners, on women and on children, numbers of whom were in court, but none as all injured in life, health, or limb. It is also very improbable that a prisoner at the bar, who had just received sentence of death, who was of course an object of general observation, and from the spirit of the times, of religious detestation, that he should be able, without attracting notice and hindrance, to strike a light, and set fire to his wick; every person present must have perceived from whence the noxious fume arose; nor would it have been necessary for the Chief Baron repeatedly to ask, as he did, several hours before Jenks was put on his trial, from whence the very disagreeable smell proceeded. The Popish recusant perhaps might have performed the part assigned to him with greater ease, had he been furnished with phosphorous matches, that invention of modern science, which, in the last century, would have been accounted little less than magic or witchcraft; an invention by which the philosopher and the chemist have wonderfully forwarded the purposes of nocturnal plunderers and domestic assassins.

The cause of the pestilential affection remains buried in obscurity.

XIV.—A YOUTH IN CIVILIZED LIFE, WHO LIVED IN TREES AND ROCKS.

The personal strangeness of appearance produced by the life which the subject of the following account was obliged to lead, together with the interesting countenance which it had left him, and the rapidity with which he used to glide from his wild home into his proper one, appears to us to render the narrative affecting.

All this portion of the country, (says Mr. Keppel Craven, in his "Tour through the Southern Provinces of Naples," speaking of the neighbourhood of Castellammare), bears a bad name, as offering secure retreats to felons or homicides, who, either suspected of misdeeds, or actually convicted of crimes, seek their safety in temporary concealment within its mountainous recesses. This state of existence is sometimes so prolonged as to become not only supportable, but scarcely irksome to the inclinations and feelings. An individual of my acquaintance who inhabited Castellammare, formed, in the course of his frequent excursions in its romantic environs, an acquaintance of some intimacy with a rich inhabitant of Lettere, and was in the habit of frequently dining with him and his numerous family. He usually went by invitation, or at least after giving notice of his intended visit; but one day, finding himself at the hour of dinner in the vicinity of the house, he ventured to request that hospitality which he had so frequently before experienced. He was admitted with some symptoms of embarrassment attributable, as he thought, to the consciousness of being inadequately provided with the means of receiving him; but perceived an addition to the family in the person of a young man, who was with some hesitation introduced as a son, and whose peculiar person, and dejected yet prepossessing countenance, so excited his interest and curiosity, that his sisters, confiding in the regard of the visitor, bade the stranger tell him his history.

Salvador, that was his name, had, from his early infancy, been in the habits of intimacy with a youth of the same village, who, following the bent of an evil disposition, through the path of poverty and vice, had so far advanced in the career of iniquity as to have become, at the age of twenty-four, associated with all descriptions of petty depredators which can in no language be so well expressed as by the Italian word Malviventi (evil lives). Salvador, educated as carefully as the affluence and affection of his parents would allow, had vainly endeavoured to reclaim his friend Aniello from his wicked courses; and, in the hopes of ultimately succeeding, had continued to keep up an intercourse of good fellowship with him, and more than once had assisted him with money. One day the latter informed Salvador of a scheme, formed by him and his companions, of robbing a rich proprietor; who resided in a solitary house adjoining some vineyards belonging to Salvador's father; and his assistance was required to allow this iniquitous band to conceal themselves in one of the buildings used only in the vintage season, where they might remain in ambush until night should enable them to execute their villainous purpose. Salvador not only refused to become accessory to such a crime, but put the intended object of it on his guard against the machinations of the banditti, without, however, naming Aniello, for whom he still retained a feeling of compassion if not of regard.

His friend, as may be supposed, from that day became his inveterate foe, and vowed to watch every opportunity of being revenged. Sometime elapsed, however, before such an occasion presented itself; but one morning that Salvador had arisen with the sun, for the purpose of shooting quails among the ripe grapes, his unrelenting enemy, who had watched and followed him, attempted to satisfy his cowardly vengeance by firing two pistol-shots at him from a place of concealment. Discovered, upbraided, and pursued by the other, he suddenly turned upon him, and endeavoured, by an exertion of bodily strength, to wrest from him his fowling-piece. The contest was prolonged and obstinate, ending finally in the fall of the aggressor, who received his death-wound from the hand which had so often relieved his wants. The survivor, under the influence of terror and confusion, at the commission of a crime so foreign to his nature, fled precipitately to his paternal roof, where he only rested time enough to relate his misfortune, being persuaded by his alarmed parents to seek safety in concealment. Some labourers, who had instinctively seen the conclusion of the affray at a distance, ran to the spot, and reached it in time to learn the name of the homicide from the vindictive ruffian, whose discharged pistols, former gifts of Salvador, and still bearing his initials, served, together with the evidence of the gun, which he had hastily flung down, to corroborate the facts deposed by the witnesses; the local police was made acquainted with them, and proceeded to the house of the culprit, who had already fled and thereby justified the accusation brought against him. A sentence was pronounced, and for a considerable time he never ventured to revisit the house of his parents; but as these were as respected as he was beloved, no vigorous researches were instituted, and having never withdrawn himself from any great distance, he by degrees ventured to return occasionally, for a few minutes, to the presence of his family, and, in the course of time, paid them a daily visit, regulated by a signal given by his sisters from the back windows of the house, which looked to the steep range of almost inaccessible rocks, covered with wood, that rise above Lettere. In their fastnesses he had now dwelt more than two years; and he described, in impressive language, the singular existence thus imposed upon him, and to which he had become, in a manner, as much habituated as to the exercise of descending and remounting these rugged steeps, with a velocity and agility almost incredible.

The individual, who frequently afterwards saw him, described his descent as something to all appearance supernatural. He was, during the daytime, always lurking among the caves, or perched upon the trees within hearing of the shrill whistle that gave him the summons to approach, and when it was uttered, a few minutes sufficed to bring him down from the highest precipice. He gave an account of the methodical way in which he divided the few and unvaried occupation that broke the monotony of his solitary hours. The changes of the weather or the wind were hailed by him as an interesting incident in his life. The trees, plants, and flowers, growing within the circumscribed precincts of his retreat, had become the objects of his care; and he watched the changes brought upon them with anxious solicitude. The few animated beings, whose movements broke upon the stillness of his solitude, he looked upon as so many acquaintances or visitors. A variety of birds had accustomed themselves to assemble round him at a certain hour, to receive the remnants of the food which he carried up from his father's house. He could enumerate every different sort of butterfly or insect which could be found near his retreat; and had seen the same fox pass at the same hour of each day during the two years of his seclusion. In these pursuits, if so they can be termed, and the perusal of some book, which he always brought away from the house to the mountain, his time had passed, he said, quickly and not painfully. He generally took a daily meal at home, but never spent the night there, considering his rocky hermitage as more secure. This, from its particular position, was inaccessible from the upper masses of the mountains, and presented no approach from below, except through a strip of enclosed vineyard through the back of the family dwelling.

XV. THE BRIDAL OF CAMIOLA TURINGA.

THE following story is from the pages of the "Life of Joanna, Queen of Naples," an interesting work published some years ago, which deserves to be better known, particularly by all who feel anxious to think as well of their fellow-creatures as possible. It struck us, when we read it, both the first and second time (for we have given it two thorough perusals) as furnishing an ample vindication of the character of an excellent woman, who, by one of those freaks of fortune that some times occur in history, has been hitherto set down as proverbial instance of cruel and inordinate passions.

The magnanimity of a lady of Messina, called Camiola Turinga, who flourished in the childhood of Joanna (says our author) has procured her a place among the illustrious women of Boccaccio; and though he has recorded no daring deed of heroism, her history would have furnished an affecting tale to his Decamerou had he contrasted her lofty spirit, not less feminine, though more noble, with the passive meekness of Griselda.

Towards the close of the reign of King Robert, Orlando of Arragon rashly encountering the Neapolitan Fleet, was made captive and imprisoned in one of the castles of Naples. His brother, Peter, King of Sicily, refused to ransom him, as he had occasioned the loss of the Sicilian armament by his temerity in engaging the Neapolitans contrary to his express command.

The young and handsome prince, unfriended, and almost forgotten, remained long in prison, and would have been doomed for life to pine away in hopeless captivity, had not his wretched fate excited the pity of Camiola Turinga, a wealthy lady of Messina, distinguished for every feminine grace and virtue. Desirous of procuring his liberty without compromising his fair fame, and perhaps actuated by sentiments still more powerful than compassion, she sent a trusty messenger to his dungeon at Naples, to offer to pay his ransom, on condition of his marrying her on his return to Messina. Orlando overjoyed at his unexpected good fortune, willingly sent her a contract of marriage: but she had no sooner purchased his liberty, than he denied all knowledge of her and treated her with scorn.

The slighted maiden carried her cause before the royal tribunal, and Peter of Arragon convinced of the necessity of governing the Sicilians with justice, as his empire depended solely on the affections of the people, adjudged Orlando to Camiola, as he was, in fact, according to the custom of the times and the laws of war, a slave whom she had purchased with her treasure. It consequence of this decree a day was appointed for their marriage, and Orlando accompanied by a splendid retinue, repaired to the house of Camiola, whom he found decked out in the customary magnificence of silks and jewels. But Camiola, instead of proffering the vows of love and obedience which the haughty prince expected to hear, told him she scorned to degrade herself by a union with one who had debased his royal birth and his knighthood by so foul a breach of faith, and that she could now only bestow on him, not her hand, of which he had proved himself unworthy, but the ransom she had paid, which she esteemed a gift worthy a man of mean and sordid soul; herself and her remaining riches she vowed to dedicate to heaven.

No entreaties availed to change her resolution, and Orlando, shunned by his peers as a dishonoured man, too late regretted the bride he had lost, and falling into a profound melancholy, died in obscurity and neglect.

A SPECIMEN OR TWO OF EXISTING PERSIAN MANNERS.

FROM SIR HARFORD JONES BRIDGES' MISSION TO PERSIA (just published.)

A great Minister on his Travels.—In two or three days afterwards, Meerza Bosurg and I set out for Tauris, which was little more than twenty miles distant from the camp. Nothing could be more simple than the manner in which the Meerza travelled. He rode a mule, the trappings of which were perfectly à la dervische. He had a servant, who carried a cloak-bag, and his calean (pipe). He had a groom who led a sumpter mule, that carried some articles of refreshment, and common small carpets; and he had his own favorite personal servant, who was at once his secretary, his amanuensis, and humble friend. The Meerza's conversation on the road was delightful; it was a constant effusion of portions of history, anecdote, and recital of beautiful poetry, much of which was from the poems of his late uncle, Meerza Hossein. The country we passed through fully justified a recollection of those lines of Shakspeare, in the second part of Henry the Fourth:—

"I am a stranger here in Gloucestershire;
"These high wild hills, and rough, uneven ways,
"Draw out our miles, and make them wearisome;
"And yet our fair discourse has been as sugar,
"Making the hard way sweet and delectable."

About two o'clock we reached the village of Bosmech, at the end of which there is a little grove of Lombardy poplars, along one side of which, or rather at the foot of it a beautiful little stream of the purest water passes. Here the Meerza said, "What say you to dismounting and resting ourselves and our beasts under the pleasant shade of these trees?" It was so agreed, and after pitching on a beautiful spot for spreading the carpets, there appeared in a very short time from the Meerza's sumpter mule a nice cold collation, consisting of partridge, excellent cheese, fruit, fine bread, and water-cresses gathered fresh on the spot; and added to this, I must say, the Meerza's coffee, and the tobacco of his calean, were exquisite. There was a degree of devotion in the Meerza's grace before he began to eat, and an expression of thankfulness and thanksgiving in that which he uttered after, that were particularly striking, and to me, who knew him so well, I may say affecting; and it was in perfect keeping with this, that whilst we were smoking our caleans, he began to say how little he wanted in this world, and how much he thanked God for having taken from his eyes all love of wealth; to which circumstance alone he ascribed his having been able safely to weather all the dreadful political storms he had met with. When we had finished our caleans, he stretched himself out at his length on the carpet, and fell fast asleep. I do not envy the man who could contemplate such a spectacle as this with indifference. Here was a great Minister of a great Empire, who could command

"The perfum'd chambers of the great,
"The canopies of costly state,
"With sounds of sweetest melody,
"—And all appliances and means to boot," sleeping, and sleeping soundly, with just the same "appliances" that were enjoyed by the commonest servant of our train. It was not long after my friend had fallen asleep, that the villagers of Bosmech, having heard where the Great Man was, came out in a body to compliment him, and to beseech him to honor the village with his presence. I acquainted the principal person of the procession, that the Meerza was asleep, and they immediately postponed their visit till the evening was far advanced, and the Meerza awoke. When this happened, it was the time for the Prayer of Asser, and I was rather surprised to see his servant lay for him one of the most beautiful prayer carpets I ever saw in my life. The Meerza saw I looked rather astonished, and he said, "this is the only luxury I indulge in; this carpet is spread before God. It is perfectly halaut,* for it is purchased with money earned by my own hands."

An Awful Present.—Mohammed Nebes Khan, a Persian Ambassador to one of the Indian Presidences, sent Mr. Duncan, the Governor, a copy of the King of Persia's Poems. Mr. Duncan was rather puzzled what present to make the Ambassador in return; after some reflection, he sent him a large paper copy of Denon's Travels in Egypt. This the Ambassador returned, and intimated to Mr. Duncan, that the present he had made him of the king of Persia's poems could not be estimated at less value than 100,000 rupees, which was a pretty broad avis au lecteur, that his Excellency expected to receive something very different from Denon's Travels, however highly the work might be valued by the literary world in Europe. Mr. Duncan, perceiving the scrape he had got into, sent to assure the Ambassador, that being now aware of the value of the present which had been made to him, he could not think of robbing the Ambassador of a thing he so highly prized, and, therefore hoped the Ambassador would allow him to return it. To consent to this was no part of the Ambassador's game, and he gave Mr. Duncan to understand, that to return the poetry of the king of Persia, would be an affront of sufficient magnitude to endanger the amicable intercourse between the two states; the farce therefore ended by Mohammed Nebes obtaining from Mr. Duncan a present in money, equal to about one-fifth of the price at which he had valued his sovereign's poetical effusions.

* Meats and other things, according to the Mohammedan religion, are divided into Halaut and Haram, (i. e. lawful and forbidden.)

New Duties of a Secretary.—General Gardanne, on his introduction to Mohammed Ally Meerza, had presented him with a very fine pair of rifle-barrelled pistols, made at Paris, the barrels of which the General assured the Prince, were worked with such nicety, that a ball delivered from them, would fly to the distance of twenty yards, so true as to strike invariably the centre of a pinstripe, a piece about the size of our half crown. The Prince had received the General in a room which opened to a large walled court, and from the spot where his highness was seated to the wall, was pretty much the distance for which the general had vaunted the precision of his pistols. As soon as he was dismissed, the Prince turning to his secretary, who was standing by him, said, "Come, let's try the Frenchman's pistols; go and hold out your hand against the wall." The astonished and trembling Secretary, after some remonstrance, found himself obliged to obey, and stand the shot. The Prince fired, and fortunately missed the mark.

An overwhelming argument.—When some beautifully made wheelbarrows were placed before the Prince Royal, one of the Persian noblemen (who always affect to despise European improvement) said: "This is all mighty well, but it will consume a considerable space of time to empty these wheelbarrows."—Sir James Sutherland said to him, "Indeed, Sir, it will not;—and if you only get into the wheelbarrow, I will show you it will not."—The Prince insisted on his making the experiment. Sir James trundled him away at a quick rate; and approaching a muddy part of the square, he gave the wheelbarrow a cant, and turned, to the great entertainment of the Prince and the spectators, the Persian Khan into the mud.

DREAMING BY SYSTEM.

THIS striking passage is from Mr. Bulwer's new work, "The Pilgrims of the Rhine," his best work, according to the author. We cannot think so, having the memory of some his novels so strong upon us. We like him best, we own, when he is wholly narrating and painting character, not when he is indulging in fancies and metaphysics; though whatever he writes is sure to include passages of great beauty and eloquence, and to furnish matter for reflection. We only wish he would not throw over so much of it an air of half-belief, and of fashionable compromise with doubt and misgiving, or at best, a strange mixture of encouragement with despair! Mr. Bulwer cannot misgive his world and his own human nature, and yet at the same time be taken by his readers for one whose genius is not to be doubted, and whose encouragements are to have their full effect. He is a very accomplished and admirable person; but God and Fashion are no more to be served together, in one sense, than God and Mammon.

The work is beautifully printed and embellished, with landscapes, new and old, and some fairy scenes from the pencil of Mr. McClise, truly fairy-like and fantastic, a mixture of the quaint and voluptuous.

"Speaking of dreams," said Trevelyman, as they pursued that mysterious subject, "I once during my former residence in Germany, fell in with a singular enthusiast, who had taught himself what he termed, 'A System of Dreaming.' When he first spoke to me upon it I asked him to explain what he meant, which he did somewhat in the following words:—

"I was born," said he, "with many of the sentiments of the poet, but without the language to express them; my feelings were constantly chilled by the intercourse of the actual world. My family, mere Germans, dull and unimpassioned, had nothing in common with me; nor did I out of my family find those with whom I could better sympathise. I was revolted by friendships—for they were susceptible to every change; I was disappointed in love—for the truth never approached to my ideal. Nursed early in the lap of romance, enamoured of the wild and the adventurous, the commonplaces of life were to me inexpressibly tame and joyless. And yet indolence, which belongs to the poetical character, was more inviting than that eager and unreflective action which can alone wring enterprise from life. Meditation was my natural element. I loved to spend the noon reclined by some shady stream, and in a half sleep to shape images from the glancing sunbeams; a dim and unreal order of philosophy, that belongs to our nation, was my favourite intellectual pursuit. And I sought amongst the obscure and the recondite the variety of emotion I could find not in the familiar. Thus constantly watching the operations of the inner mind, it occurred to me at last, that sleep having its own world, but as yet a rude and fragmentary one, it might be possible to shape from its chaos, all those combinations of beauty, of power, of glory, and of love, which were denied to me in the world in which my frame walked and had its being. So soon as this idea came upon me, I nursed, and cherished, and mused over it, till I found that the imagination began to effect the miracle I desired. By brooding ardently, intensely, before I retired to rest, over an especial train of thought, over any ideal creations; by keeping the body utterly still and quiescent during the whole day; by shutting out all living adventure, the memory of which might perplex and interfere with the stream of events that I desired to pour forth into the wilds of sleep, I discovered at last, that I could lead in dreams a life solely their own, and utterly distinct from the life of day. Towers and palaces, all my heritage, rose before me from the depths of night; I quaffed from jewelled cups the Falernian of imperial vaults; music from harps of celestial tone filled up the crevices of air; and the smiles of immortal beauty flushed like sunlight over all. Thus the adventure and the glory, that I could not for my waking life obtain, was obtained for me in sleep. I wandered with the gryphon and the gnome; I sounded the horn at enchanted portals; I conquered in the knightly lists; I planted my standard over battlements huge as the painter's birth of Babylon itself.

"But I was afraid to call forth one shape on whose loveliness to pour all the hidden passion of my soul. I trembled lest my sleep should present me some image which it could never restore, and waking from which, even the new world I had created might be left desolate for ever. I shuddered lest I should adore a vision which the first ray of morning could smite to the grave.

"In this train of mind I began to ponder whether it might not be possible to connect dreams together; to supply the thread that was wanting; to make one night continue the history of the other, so as to bring together the same shapes and the same scenes, and thus lead a connected and harmonious life, not only in the one half of existence, but in the other, the richer and more glorious, half. No sooner did this idea present itself to me, than I burned to accomplish it. I had before taught myself that Faith is the great creator; that to believe fervently is to make belief true. So I would not suffer my mind to doubt the practicability of its scheme. I shut myself up then entirely by day, refused books, and hated the very sun, and compelled all my thoughts (and sleep is the mirror of thought) to glide in one direction, the direction of my dreams, so that from night to night the imagination might keep up the thread of action, and I might thus lie down full of the past dream and confident of the sequel. Not for one day only, or for one month, did I pursue this system, but I continued it zealously and sternly, till at length it began to succeed. Who shall tell," cried the enthusiast,—"I see him now with his deep, bright, sunken eyes, and his wild hair thrown backward from his brow, 'the rapture I experienced, when first, faintly and half distinct, I perceived the harmony I had invoked down upon my dreams. At first there was only a partial and desultory connection between them; my eye recognized certain shapes; my ear certain tones common to each; by degrees, these augmented in number, and were more defined in outline. At length, one fair face broke forth from among the ruder forms, and night after night appeared mixing with them for a moment and then vanishing, just as a mariner watches in a clouded sky the moon shining through the drifting rack, and quickly gone. My curiosity was now vividly excited, the face, with its lustrous eyes and seraph features, roused all the emotions that no living shape had called forth. I became enamoured of a dream, and as the statue to the Cyprian was my creation to me; so from this intent and increasing passion, I at length worked out my reward. My dream became more palpable; I spoke with it; I knelt to it; my lips were pressed to its own; we exchanged the vows of love, and morning only separated us with the certainty that at night we should meet again. Thus then" continued my visionary, "I commenced a history utterly separate from the history of the world, and it went on alternately with my harsh and chilling history of the day, equally regular and equally continuous. And what, you ask, was that history? Methought I was a prince in some southern island that had no features in common with the colder north of my native home. By day I looked upon the dull walls of a German town, and saw homely or squalid forms passing before me; the sky was dim and the sun cheerless. Night came on with her thousand stars, and brought me the dews of sleep. Then suddenly there was a new world; the richest fruits hung from the trees in clusters of gold and purple. Palaces of the quaint fashion of the sunnier climes, with spiral minarets and glittering cupolas, were mirrored upon vast lakes sheltered by the palm tree and banana. The sun seemed of a different orb, so mellow and gorgeous were his beams; birds and winged things of all hues fluttered in the shining air; the faces and garments of men were not of the northern regions of the world, and their voices spoke a tongue, which strange at first, by degrees I interpreted. Sometimes I made war upon neighbouring kings; sometimes I chased the spotted pard through the vast gloom of oriental forests; my life was at once a life of enterprise and pomp. But above all there was the history of my love! I thought there were a thousand difficulties in the way of attaining its possession. Many were the rocks I had to scale, and the battles to wage, and the fortresses to storm in order to win her as my bride. But at last," continued the enthusiast "she is won, she is my own! Time in this wild world, which I visit nightly, passes not so slowly as in this, and yet an hour may be the same as a year. This continuity of existence, this successive series of dreams, so different from the broken incoherence of other men's sleep, at times bewilders me with strange and suspicious thoughts. What if this glorious sleep be real life, and this dull waking the true repose? Why not? What is there more fanciful in the one than in the other? And there have I garnered and collected all of pleasure that I am capable of feeling. I see no joy in this world—I form no ties, I feast not, nor love, nor make merry.—I am only impatient till the hour when I may re-enter my royal realms and pour my renewed delight into the bosom of my bright ideal. There then have I found all that the world denied me; there have I realized the yearning and aspiration within me; there have I coined the untold poetry into the felt—the seen!"

"I found," continued Trevelyman, "that this tale was corroborated by inquiry into the visionary's habits. He shunned society; avoided all unnecessary movement or excitement. He fared with rigid abstemiousness, and only appeared to feel pleasure as the day departed, and the hour of return to his imaginary kingdom approached. He always retired to rest punctually at a certain hour, and would sleep so soundly, that a cannon fired under his window would not arouse him. He never, which may seem singular, spoke or moved much in his sleep, but was peculiarly calm, almost to the appearance of lifelessness; but, discovering once that he had been watched in sleep, he was wont afterwards carefully to secure the chamber from intrusion. His victory over the natural incoherence of sleep had, when I first knew him, lasted for some years; possibly what imagination first produced was afterwards continued by habit.

I saw him again a few months subsequent to this confession, and he seemed to be much changed. His health was broken, and his abstraction had deepened into gloom.

I questioned him of the cause of the alteration, and he answered me with great reluctance—

"She is dead," said he, "my realms are desolate! A serpent stung her, and she died in these very arms. Vainly, when I started from my sleep in horror and despair, vainly did I say to myself,—This is but a dream. I shall see her again. A vision cannot die! Hath it flesh that decays? is it not a spirit—bodiless—indissoluble? With what terrible anxiety I awaited the night. Again I slept, and the dream lay again before me—dead and withered. Even the ideal can vanish. I assisted in the burial; I laid her in the earth; I heaped the monumental mockery over her form. And never since hath she, or ought like her, revisited my dreams. I see her only when I wake; thus, to wake is indeed to dream! But," continued the visionary, in a solemn voice, "I feel myself departing from this world, and with a fearful joy; for I think there may be a land beyond even the land of sleep, where I shall see her again,—a land in which a vision itself may be restored."

And in truth, concluded Trevelyman, the dreamer died shortly afterwards, suddenly, and in his sleep.

"There are singular varieties in life," said Vane, who had heard the latter part of Trevelyman's story; "and could the German have bequeathed to us his art—what a refuge should we not possess from the ills of earth! The dungeon and disease, poverty, affliction, shame, would cease to be the tyrants of our lot; and to sleep, we should confine our history and transfer our emotions."

"But most of all," said Trevelyman, "would it be a science worth learning to the poet, whose very nature is a pining for the ideal—for that which earth has not—for that which the dreamer found. Ah, Gertrude," whispered the lover, "what his kingdom and his bride were to him, art thou to me!"

MIND YOUR OWN FAULTS.

A gentleman riding along the road, passed by a knock, (a field of furze) in which a man was stubbing; and for every stroke he gave with his hoe, he cried out in a reproachful tone, "Oh! Adam!" The gentleman stopped his horse, and calling the labourer to him, inquired the reason of his saying "Oh! Adam!"

"Why, please your honour," said the man, "only for Adam I would have no occasion to labour at all; had he and Eve been less curious, none of us need earn our bread in the sweat of our brow."

"Very good," said the gentleman; "call at my house to-morrow."

The man waited on him the next day, and the gentleman took him into a splendid apartment, adjoining a most beautiful garden, and asked him would he wish to live there? The son of Adam replied in the affirmative. "Very well," said the gentleman, "you shall want for nothing. Breakfast, dinner, and supper of the choicest viands, shall be laid before you every day, and you may amuse yourself in the garden whenever you please. But mind you are to enjoy all this on one condition, that you look not under the pewter plate that lies on the table."

The man was overjoyed at his good fortune, and thought that there was little fear of his forfeiting it by looking under the pewter plate. In a week or two, however, he grew curious to know what could be under the plate which he was prohibited from seeing. Perhaps a jewel of inestimable value, and perhaps nothing at all. One day, when no person was present, he thought he would take a peep—there could be no harm in it—no one would know it: and accordingly, he raised the forbidden plate—when lo! a little mouse jumped from under it; he quickly laid it down again, but his doom was sealed. "Begone to your hoeing," said the gentleman next day, "and cry oh! Adam! no more, since like him, you have lost a paradise by disobedience."

THE ROAD THE PLATES WENT.

At some distance from Castle Taylor, in the county of Galway, is a round fort called the Palace of Dunderlass, where it is said Goora, king of Connaught, resided; there is not, however, the least vestige of any dwelling place; this palace was near a celebrated city called Adrahan. It is now but a village; tradition, however, mentions it to have been formerly very extensive. If the road, leading to the town, can enable us to form any idea of its extent, the remains of that which led to this, would induce us to believe that it was twice larger than the present road; except that there was an avenue of trees planted on each side, it is not easy to determine to what use it was converted. This road is called in Irish, Boherlan da naa mias—the road the plates went; and the story from which the name originated is odd enough.

Saint Macduagh, the king's brother, had retired to the mountains, to pray with a friar: when they had remained two days there, the friar was not so much occupied by devotion, but he felt the grumbings of his stomach, from time to time; this made him murmur, and he said to the saint, "I beg your Saintship's pardon, but I believe you brought me here to die of hunger; your brother Goora gives a feast to his court to-day; I had rather be there than here."

"Oh! man of little faith," replied the Saint, "do you think I brought you here to die of hunger?" And he immediately began to pray more fervently than ever.

On a sudden the friar was agreeably surprised to see an excellent dinner before him. And when King Goora and his nobles returned from hunting, very hungry, they were very much surprised at seeing their plates and tables fly away! On this occasion, they did what every person might do who saw his dinner fly away; the cook with his spit, the servants and grooms, the dogs and cats, accompanied the king and his court, either on foot or horseback, and ran as fast as they could after the plates.

The dinner, however, arrived an entire quarter of an hour before them, and the friar, who had just begun to satisfy his appetite, was terrified at seeing such a crowd ready to snatch the bit from his mouth. He complained to the saint again, telling him it were better to give him nothing to eat, than to get him knocked on the head by the hungry attendants of the court of Goora.

"Oh, man of little faith," said the saint, "let them come." They soon arrived, and when they got within thirty paces of the friar, the saint put them in the most disagreeable situation any decent people can be in: he made their feet stick to the rock, and obliged them to look on at the friar's repast.

They still shew in the rock the marks of the horses' hoofs, of the men, dogs, &c., and even of the lances which were also stuck in the rock, for fear they should take it in their heads to throw them at the friar. As these marks are visible, there can be no doubt of the truth of the story, and since this time, the road has been and is still called "The road the plates went."

"Oh, mighty saint, Macduagh!" adds the narrator, a French gentleman, whom the revolution had compelled to emigrate, and who wandered through the United Kingdoms, recording his adventures with his national gaiety—a gaiety by which touches of true pathos can be alone conveyed; "Oh, mighty Saint Macduagh, how much I should be obliged to your saintship, if you deigned to repeat this miracle from time to time in favour of a poor pilgrim like me!"

THE WISE WOMEN OF MUNGRET.

About two miles west of the city of Limerick, is an inconsiderable ruin, called Mungret. This ruin is all that remains of a monastic establishment, said to have contained within its walls six churches, and, exclusive of scholars, fifteen hundred monks.

Of these monks, five hundred were learned preachers—five hundred more were so classed and divided as to support a full choir day and night—and the remaining five hundred, being the elders of the brotherhood, devoted themselves to religion and charitable works.

An anecdote is related of this priory, which is worth preserving, because it gave rise to a proverbial expression, retained in the country to the present day, 'as wise as the women of Mungret.'

A deputation was sent from the college at Cashel, to this famous seminary at Mungret, in order to try their skill in the languages. The heads of the house of Mungret were somewhat alarmed, lest their scholars should receive a defeat, and their reputation be lessened—they therefore thought of a most humorous expedient to prevent the contest, which succeeded to their wishes. They habited some of their young students like women, and some of the monks like peasants, in which dresses they walked a few miles to meet the strangers at some distance from each other. When the Cashel professors approached and asked any question about the distance of Mungret, or the time of day, they were constantly answered in Greek or Latin; which occasioned them to hold a conference, and determine not to expose themselves at a place, where even the women and peasants could speak Greek and Latin.

THE ADMIRABLE CRICHTON.

ABSTRACT OF THE LIFE OF HIM BY LORD WOODHOUSELEE.

JAMES CRICHTON was born in the year 1561. He was the eldest son of Robert Crichton, of Elioock, who filled the important office of Lord Advocate of Scotland, first to Queen Mary, and afterwards to King James. The mother of Crichton was Elizabeth Stewart, daughter of Sir James Stewart of Beath. His family was noble, and high in various offices.

The young Crichton having received the rudiments of his grammatical education at Perth, or according to another authority at Edinburgh, was sent to improve himself in philosophy and the sciences at St. Andrews, at that time the most celebrated and learned seminary in Scotland. The rank and fortune of his father enabled him to give his son, who was already remarkable for the early maturity of his talents and the beauty of his person, the instruction of the most learned men of the time. His masters were Rutherford, Provost of St. Salvator's College, Hepburn, Robertson, and, at a later period, Buchanan, one of the most illustrious scholars at that time in Europe. The progress of Crichton was suitable to the eminence of his instructors, and to the celebrity which he was afterwards destined to acquire. In the year 1573, when he had hardly passed his twelfth year, he took his degree as bachelor of arts; and in two years afterwards, such appear to have been his high attainments in the different branches of scholastic knowledge, that he received his degree, as master of arts, at the very early age of fourteen.

The different students in the University of St. Andrews were at this time, previous to their taking their degrees as masters of arts, divided into what were termed circles, according to the talents and proficiency which they exhibited in the examinations which preceded the taking their degrees. The first circle comprehended those of the very highest attainments in the University. The second, those whose proficiency, although eminent, was not so comparatively conspicuous, and so on through the different divisions of talent. It is a remarkable circumstance, as it establishes the great and early endowments of Crichton, that at the age of fourteen he takes his degree of master of arts in the first circle, being the third in the circle, that is being in talents and attainments the third scholar at that time in the University; a circumstance which, if we consider the early age of Crichton, sufficiently proves the strength and precocity of those talents which were afterwards to figure so conspicuously upon a wider field in Italy.

Having evinced this extraordinary proficiency, Crichton does not appear to have imagined that his labours were to finish with the honours he had there won, or that the period of study was in any respect concluded. His success only increased his ardour; and the labours of those early and boyish years were repaid, as in the case of Pascal and Clairault, by attainments which would have been remarkable in a scholar of the most advanced age, and the most laborious application. He soon accomplished himself in the various branches of the science and philosophy of the times; and, by the force of natural talents, assisted, as they must have been, by intense application, acquired the use of ten different languages. At this period, and, indeed, till a much later date, it was the custom for our Scottish gentlemen to finish their education by foreign travel, to acquire, in the army, and in an intercourse with foreign camps and courts, that military and political knowledge, which might afterwards render them serviceable in the wars and the councils of their country. Crichton was accordingly sent by his father to the continent, at a very early age, probably in his sixteenth or seventeenth year. The purpose of his going abroad was, not only to improve himself by the sight of different countries, and to display, as was the custom in these times, the extent of his erudition in the public disputations which were then extremely common in the universities of the continent, but also to finish his education in the schools of France and Italy.

The young Crichton had not, as we have already seen, been ungrateful to nature for those early talents with which he was intrusted. He had laboured to increase, by every effort of his own, his acquisitions in knowledge and science; and nature had, in return, been prodigal to him of those gifts, which no individual exertion can command. She had given him a form, which, while it was active and powerful, was remarkable for its admirable symmetry and proportion; and a countenance which, from the account of all who had seen him, was a model of manly and intelligent beauty. To these endowments was united a most remarkable quickness and aptitude in the acquirement of all the elegant accomplishments which were fitted to exhibit his person to the greatest advantage, and in which the young Scottish nobility of the day were educated. The same ardent desire of excellence, and enthusiastic perseverance of cultivation, which had led him on to eminence in his severer studies, contributed to render him equally superior to his youthful compeers in all the martial exercises of that chivalrous age. The science of the sword was, at this time, most sedulously cultivated, both in our own country and on the continent. It was the weapon to which all appeals of honour were made; and its professors (for to this high appellation its teachers aspired) affected to elucidate its different branches, and demonstrate its various rules and evolutions, by the application of geometrical principles. Crichton became one of the most expert and fearless swordsmen of his time. He rode with consummate grace and boldness; and in the gentler accomplishment of dancing, upon excellence in which, even in our own days, (if we may believe a noble author), so many grave and serious consequences depend, he is recorded to have been a very admirable proficient. To these various attractions there was added still another, which, in the pleasure it was calculated to bestow, was not inferior to any that has been mentioned—a strong genius for music. He had, from nature, a sweet and finely modulated voice; and had attained to great excellence in performing upon a variety of musical instruments. They who are enthusiastic in this delightful science, and who have felt the deep and inexplicable influence which it possesses over our nature, will not be at a loss to estimate the power which his skill in music must have given to the young and handsome Crichton, in attracting esteem and commanding admiration.

Thus fairly and excellently endowed, Crichton set out upon his travels, and directed his course first to Paris, eminent, at that period, not only for the distinguished learning of its public professors and scholars, but for the splendour and gaiety of its court. It was the custom in those days, both in France and in other continental countries, to hold public disputations, in which the learned men of the age contended with each other on the most abstruse questions of the science and philosophy of the times. To Crichton, no fairer opportunity could be presented than what these public disputations offered, for obtaining distinction. He had already accomplished himself in the studies which furnished the topics of discussion. He had acquired the use of many both of the dead and living languages; and he possessed the manners and figure, not of a pedant who had immured himself in the cloisters of his college, but of a finished gentleman, who had made books not so much his task as his recreation. Soon after his arrival in Paris, he, accordingly, in obedience to the custom of the times, affixed placards, or challenges to literary and philosophic warfare, on the most conspicuous parts of the city, engaging that, at the expiration of six weeks from the date of the notice, he should present himself at the College of Navarre, to answer upon whatever subject should be there proposed to him, "in any science, liberal art, discipline, or faculty, whether practical or theoretic; and this in any one of twelve specified languages. A challenge of this nature, from so young a person, to dispute with the most profound and learned scholars in France, could not fail to excite astonishment; and it was pretty generally expected, that the stranger would decline the contest, under the pretence that his challenge was nothing more than a pasquinade against the University. The disputation, however, took place. Crichton, in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators, presented himself in this eminent seminary, encountered in argument the gravest philosophers and divines, who had assembled on the occasion, acquitted himself to the astonishment of all who heard him, and received the public praises and congratulations of the president and four of the most eminent professors in the University.

But what seemed particularly to increase his triumph, and to embitter the defeat of those who attempted to cope with him, was the light and easy negligence, and the utter contempt of preparation, which he evinced before the contest. The court of Henry the Third of France was, at this time, one of the most gay and gallant in Europe. In the midst of national distresses, which might have sobered any reflecting monarch, and civil commotions which embroiled the country, the whole mind of the sovereign seemed to be occupied in the invention of the most expensive shows, and the arrangement of the most magnificent public festivals. Tourneys, where the knights jostled against each other,—courses at the ring,—tilting against the Saracen, and many other gallant amusements, accompanied with all the pomp and circumstance of chivalry, were at this time the favourite occupations of the king; and it is easy to imagine how acceptable such public shows must have been, to the genius and disposition of Crichton. In the feats of arms which there led to distinction, he was calculated, both by the natural beauty of his figure, and the uncommon skill which he had acquired, to outstrip most of his competitors; we need not therefore wonder, if, instead of betaking himself to his study, he shone pre-eminent in all the gay amusements and elegant accomplishments of the age. He was to be found in the ball-room, in the hunting-field, in the riding-house; and, the day after that in which he had astonished the most learned and able professors, by a display of such universal talent and erudition, he appeared, with all the fire and freshness of youth, at a tilting match in the Louvre; and here, with consummate skill and address, in presence of many of the ladies and princes of the court of France, he carried off the ring from every competitor, and remained victor in that martial accomplishment which was then so ardently cultivated in this country of chivalry.

He became now anxious to accomplish himself as a soldier; and for this purpose, although his design of travelling to Italy rendered any long continuance in it impossible, he entered into the French service, where he became, after serving for two years in the civil wars, which at that time depopulated France, an experienced officer, and rose to an honourable command in the French army.

After two years residence in France, Crichton determined to continue his travels into Italy, at this time the centre from which all that was most remarkable in philosophy, in literature, and in the fine arts, had emanated throughout Europe. He first travelled to Rome; where, emboldened by his success in France, and in obedience to the manners of this age of literary rivalry, he took an early opportunity of publishing a similar challenge, to that which he circulated in Paris: and, on a day appointed, in presence of the Pope and many of the different cardinals, with a numerous audience, amongst which were many of the most learned men of the times, he presented himself to vindicate the pledge which he had given; and, as we are told by his biographer, again astonished and delighted the spectators, by the display of the most universal talents.

After a short residence at Rome, he next repaired to Venice, where he made the acquaintance of Aldus, the famous printer. At Venice he astonished every body as he had done elsewhere. The following is an account of him by an anonymous native author:—

"The Scotchman," says this unknown writer, "whose name is James Crichton, is a young man of twenty years of age upon the 19th of August last. He is distinguished by a birth-mark, or mole, beneath his right eye. He is master of ten languages. These are, Latin and Italian, in which he is excellently skilled; Greek, in which he has composed epigrams; Hebrew, Chaldaic, Spanish, French, Flemish, English and Scotch; and he is also acquainted with the German. He is deeply skilled in philosophy, in theology, and in astrology; in which science he holds all the calculations of the present day to be erroneous. On philosophical and theological questions, he has frequently disputed with very able men, to the astonishment of all who have heard him. He possesses a most thorough knowledge of the Cabala. His memory is so astonishing, that he knows not what it is to forget; and, whenever he has once heard an oration he is ready to recite it again, word for word, as it was delivered. He possesses the talent of composing Latin verses, upon any subject which is proposed to him, and in every different kind of metre. Such is his memory, that even though these verses have been extempore, he will repeat them backwards, beginning from the last word in the verse. His orations are unprepared and beautiful. He is also able to discourse upon political questions with much solidity. In his person he is extremely beautiful. His address is that of a finished gentleman, even to a wonder; and his manner, in conversation, the most gracious which can be imagined. He is, in addition to this, a soldier at all points, (soldato a tutta botta), and has, for two years, sustained an honourable command in the wars of France. He has attained to great excellence in the accomplishments of leaping and dancing, and to a remarkable skill in the use of every sort of arms; of which he has already given proofs. He is a remarkable horseman, and breaker of horses, and an admirable joustier, (giustatore singolare). His extraction is noble; indeed, by the mother's side, regal; for he is allied to the royal family of the Stuarts. Upon the great question of the procession of the Holy Spirit, he has held disputations with the Greeks, which were received with the highest applause; and, in these conferences, has exhibited an incalculable mass of authorities, both from the Greek and Latin Fathers, and also from the decisions of the different councils. The same exuberance is shewn, when he discourses upon subjects of philosophy or theology; in which he has all Aristotle and the commentators at his finger ends (alle mani). St. Thomas and Duns Scotus, with their different disciples, the Thomists and Scotists, he has all by heart, and is ready to dispute on either side; which talent he has already exhibited with the most distinguished success: and, indeed, such is his facility upon these subjects, that he has never disputed, unless upon matters which were proposed to him by others. The Doge and his consort were pleased to hear him; and, upon doing so, testified the utmost amazement. He also received a present from the hands of his Serene Highness. Upon the whole, he is a wonder of wonders; in so much so, that the possession of such various and astonishing talents, united in a body so gracefully formed, and of so sanguine and amiable a temperament, has given rise to many strange and chimerical conjectures. He has, at present, retired from town to a villa, to extend two thousand conclusions, embracing questions in all the different faculties, which he means, within the space of two months, to sustain and defend in Venice, in the church of St. John and St.

Paul;—not being able to give his attention both to his own studies and to the wishes of those persons who would eagerly devote the whole day to hear him."

At Padua, Crichton flew in the face of the University, and dismayed it. From Padua, he proceeded to Mantua. "There happened, at this time, to be at the court of Mantua, a certain Italian gentleman," saith the quaint Urquhart, 'of a mighty, able, strong, nimble, and vigorous body; but, by nature, fierce, cruel, warlike, and audacious, and superlatively expert and dexterous in the use of his weapon.' Elated by his uncommon skill, and rendered haughty by continual victory, this gentleman had chosen for himself a very singular profession—that of a travelling gladiator, or bravo. His custom was, on his arrival in any city, to challenge all who chose to try their skill with him in single combat; he himself laying down a certain sum of money, and his opponent the same, with the proviso, that the united purses should be the meed of the conqueror. On his arrival at Mantua, three gentleman had speedily accepted his challenge; and such was the uncommon skill of their opponent, that all had paid the penalty of their rashness with their lives. Their deaths were the subject of universal regret at the court of Mantua; and this feeling became the more poignant, on account of the ungenerous exultation of the Italian; in whom, contrary to what we generally find in brave men, there appear to have been united the three extremes of courage, cruelty, and insolence.

Crichton, disregarding the danger he underwent, unappalled by the fate of his precursors in the enterprise, and perhaps confident, from having witnessed their attempts, of his own superior skill, determined to exchange the peaceful encounters in which he had astonished the Italians, for a combat of a more desperate kind. He, accordingly, sent a challenge to this formidable antagonist, and encountered him, before the assembled court of Mantua. It is easy to imagine, when we take into consideration the extraordinary popularity of this young foreigner, his amiable manners, and various and uncommon endowments, the very high interest which such a single combat must have excited. It was the struggle of the brutal courage of a professional duellist, against the high-spirited and chivalrous bravery of an accomplished gentleman; and the result was equally glorious to him here, as upon all other occasions. After a contest, in which he, at first, acted on the defensive, and evinced the most consummate skill in foiling the attacks, and at length completely exhausting the strength of his antagonist, he dexterously seized the advantage, became the assailant, and obtained an easy victory; putting the Italian to death, by thrice passing his sword through his body.

In consequence of this achievement, and the high reputation he had required in Italy, the Duke of Mantua engaged him as the companion and preceptor to his son, Vincenzo di Gonzaga, a young man who had evinced a strong passion for literature, but was otherwise of a passionate temper and dissolute manners.

Dramatic entertainments were the rage at the court of Mantua, and Crichton was not behind hand here. For the entertainment of his pupil, the prince, and the whole court, Crichton composed a sort of satirical monologue, in which he himself performed fourteen different characters.

But let us listen for a moment to the inimitable language with which this story is clothed by Sir Thomas Urquhart.—'O, with how great liveliness did he represent the condition of all manner of men! how naturally did he set before the eyes of the beholders the rogueries of all professions, from the over-weening monarch to the peevish swain, through all the intermediate degrees of the superficial courtier, or proud warrior, dissembled churchman, dotting old man, cozening lawyer, lying traveller, covetous merchant, rude seaman, pedantic scholar, amorous shepherd, envious artisan, vain-glorious master, and tricky servant! He did with such variety display the several humours of all these sorts of people, and with so bewitching energy, that he seemed to be the original, they the counterfeit; and they the resemblance whereof he was the prototype. He had all the jeers, squibs, bulls, quips, taunts, whims, jest, clenches, gybes, mokes, jerks, with all the several kinds of equivocations, and other sophistical captions, that could properly be adapted to the person by whose representation he had intended to inveigle the company into mirth; and would keep, in that miscellany discourse of his, which was all for the spleen, and nothing for the gall, such a climacterical and mercurially digested method, that, when the fancy of the hearers was tickled with any rare conceit, and that the jovial blood was moved, he held it going with another new device upon the back of the first, and another, yet another, and another again, succeeding one another, for the removal of what is a stirring into a higher agitation, till, in the closure of the luxuriant period, the decumantal wave of the oddest whimsy of all, enforced the charmed spirits of the auditory (for affording room to his apprehension) suddenly to burst forth into a laughter; which commonly lasted so long, as he had leisure to withdraw behind the screen, shift off, with the help of a page, the suite he had on, apparel himself with another, and return to the stage to act afresh; for, by that time, their transported, disappalled, and sublimated fancies, by the wonderfully operating engines of his soacious inventions, had, from the height to which the inward screws, wheels, and pulleys of his wit had elevated them, descended, by degrees, into their wonted stations, he was ready for the personating of another carriage, whereof, to the number of fourteen several kinds, (during the five hours' space, at the duke's desire, the solicitation of the court, and his own recreation, he was pleased to histrionize it,) he shewed himself so natural a representative, that any would have thought he had been so many several actors, different in all things else, save only the stature of the body. *—First, he did present himself with a crown on his head, a sceptre in his hand, being clothed with a purple robe, furred with ermine; after that with a mitre on his head, a crosier in his hand, and accoutred with a pair of lawn sleeves; and thereafter, with a helmet on his head, the visor up, a commanding stick in his hand, and arrayed in a buff suit, with a scarf about his middle. Then, in a rich apparel, after the newest fashion, he did shew himself like another Sejanus, with a periwig daubed with Cypress powder; in sequel of that, he came out with a three cornered cap on his head, some parchments in his hand, and writings hanging at his girdle, like chancery bills; and next to that, with a furred gown about him, an ingot of gold in his hand, and a bag full of money at his side; after all this, he appears again clad in a country jacket, with a prong in his hand, and a Monmouth-like cap on his head; then, very shortly after, with a palmer's coat on him, a bourdon in his hand, and some few cockle shells stuck to his hat, he looked as if he had come in pilgrimage from St. Michael; immediately after that, he domineers it in a bare unlined gowne, with a paire of whips in the one hand, and Corderius in the other; and in suite thereof he honderspended it with a pair of panner-like breeches, a montera cap on his head, and a knife in a wooden sheath, dagger-ways, by his side; about the latter end he comes forth again, with a square in one hand, a rule in the other, and a leathern apron before him; then, very quickly after, with a scrip by his side, a sheep-hook in his hand, and a basket full of flowers to make nosegays for his mistress: and now, drawing to a closure, he rants it, first, in cuerpo, and vapouring it with jingling spurs, and his arms a-kenbol, like a Don Diego, he struts it, and, by the loftiness of his gait, plays the Capitan Spavento; then, in the very twinkling of an eye, you would have seen him again issue forth with a cloak upon his arm, in a livery garment, thereby representing the serving man: and lastly, at one time, amongst those other, he came out with a long grey beard and pucked ruff, crouching on a staff tipt with the head of a barber's cithern, and his gloves hanging by a button at his girdle."

Crichton's brilliant career was, however, brought to an untimely, and most premature conclusion. "When walking one night through the streets of Mantua, returning from a visit which he had paid to his mistress, and playing, as he went along, upon his guitar, he found himself suddenly attacked by a riotous company of persons in masks, whom, with that skill and activity for which he was so remarkable, he soon foiled and put to flight. Before this, however, he had disarmed and seized the leader of the party, and upon unmasking him, discovered that it was the Prince of Mantua, to whose court he belonged. Crichton, although he had been attacked in the meanest manner, and had only disarmed his master, in defending himself, was yet affected by the deepest concern, upon this discovery. He instantly dropped upon one knee; and taking his sword by the point, with romantic devotion, presented it to the prince, his master. Vincenzo naturally of a revengeful and treacherous temper, was at this moment inflamed with wine, irritated by defeat, and perhaps by jealousy. * Certain it is, that it will require the presence of one or all, of these dark and conflicting passions, to account for the act which followed. He received Crichton's sword, and instantly, with equal meanness and brutality, employed it in piercing his defenceless, and injured benefactor, through the heart.

Thus died the Admirable Crichton, in the twenty-second year of his age; preserving, in this last fatal encounter, that superiority to all other men which rendered his life so remarkable; and then, only, conquered, when his romantic ideas of honour had made him renounce the powers and the courage which, upon every other occasion, had so pre-eminently distinguished him.

The absolute amount of Crichton's abilities has been latterly much disputed. Attempts have been made to show that he was a mere impostor in literature. There appears no reason however to doubt his being a man of extraordinary cleverness and accomplishment. He was the intimate and esteemed friend of some of the first eminent men of his day; his pupil, Vincenzo of Gonzaga, was the patron of Tasso. Scaliger bears testimony to his amazing talent, while his censure testifies to his impartiality. "I have heard," says the author, "when I was in Italy, of one Crichton, a Scotchman, who had only reached the age of twenty-one, when he was killed by the command of the Duke of Mantua, who knew twelve different languages,—had studied the fathers and the poets,—disputed de omni scibili, and replied to his antagonists in verse. He was a man of very wonderful genius; more worthy of admiration than of esteem. He had something of the corcomb about him, and only wanted a little common sense. It is remarkable that princes are apt to take an affection for geniuses of this stamp, but very rarely for truly learned men."

Crichton did nothing for philosophy. He invented nothing. He was not a teacher; he was only a specimen of what a man may be taught. He appears to have possessed great beauty, great personal adroitness, a quick power of perception joined to a most prodigious memory; and added to these, the ready address that naturally resulted from a confidence in his own resources. This last faculty alone would have ensured a triumphant career in debate, even though his reason were not of a profound order. His memory, however, appears to have been the most remarkable thing about him. He could recollect a discourse word for word after once hearing it. Sir Walter Scott (a real genius) partook of this faculty. Magliabecchi, the Florentine librarian, could recollect whole volumes, all in fact that he read.—He once supplied an author from memory with a copy of his own work, of which the original M.S. had been lost. Magliabecchi however does not appear to have been other than a dull man. Could we imagine him adroit in mind, and adroit too in person, we immediately have a second Crichton; and it is not great stretch of imagination. The philosophy of the schools in Crichton's time was very cut and dry; reduced to heads and sections, and the motions in argument as much reduced to rule, as a game of chess by Sarratt or Philidor. Crichton then had a mind to learn, address and person to execute; a coincidence of faculties neither difficult to imagine, nor improbable to exist. He was perhaps, without vastness, profoundness, or even originality of intellect, the cleverest man that has appeared. It must be remembered too, that from the prematurity of his death, his was rather a life of promise than performance; and, in spite of the proverb, promises are not always made to be broken.

A MASONIC EXHORTATION.

Oh, un-in-one-breath-utterable skill!

BEN JONSON.

If your soul be not too drony,
Go and hear the great Masoni!
Scarce Napoleon (nicknam'd Boney)
Was more wondrous than Masoni:
'Pollo's pet, Euterpe's cronym,
Is the exquisite Masoni.
All the sweets that live in honey
Are concentred in Masoni,
And more swift than fleetest pouey
Run the triplets of Masoni.
Utterly himself unknown he Should be, who not knows Masoni!
E'en from Greece Colocotroni
Ought to come, to hear Masoni.
That heart must be ultra-stony
That is touch'd not by Masoni,
Fiddler rich and rare, and toney
Soul-enrapturing Masoni!
Money without ceremony
Should be shower'd on Masoni.
Oh, ye marvel-seekers, on'y
Go and hear the great Masoni!

A PRACTICAL JOKE.

"TRISTE BUT TRUE."

(For the London Journal.)

In a certain northern city, which shall be nameless—indeed all herein narrated shall be as nameless as the narrator—the people grew their own mirth, their own wine, or a substitute for it, and their own wit, and they managed matters with so much philosophic equality, that those who had the least wit of their own were made the most efficient in bringing out the wit of others, just as women after the turn of life are the handiest for dry-nursing babies. The wit went round in a circle: at one time it was quip and lampoon, at another, hoax, and at a third practical jokes; and the last was the state of the wheel when I knew it.

Well, in this city there was a man of much importance in his own eyes; as what city ever failed in being blessed with such characters. And they are excellent and useful ones they absorb all the adulations which might turn the heads of wiser people. I have always admired that wise provision of nature, by which weak men drink in the overflowings of flattery, such as cess-pools drink in the overflowings of the streets. And it is a rare provision; for the most excessive adulation can do no harm in an empty skull, any more than the most arrant thief can steal in an empty house. The personage alluded to was rich, because his father had been so; and he held an important office—ditto. If there were not enough to "make a man of him," alas for many of the "full moons," which are blazoned in history. [Heralds call full moons by another name; but I am unskilled in heraldic lore, and so every one may use what name suits best with his own views of the matter.] This man of office dined in style that would have won him fame at any civic board in the world—that of Quanty Chanty Qua, or what else they call him, the Lord Mayor of Madagascar excepted; for putrid fish would have heightened his stomach into his skull and he would never have got it out again. By the way he would not have been the first with the stomach there; and therefore when Pliny describes the men with "heads below their stomachs," he slyly satirizes many a Roman gourmand.

But to our man of office. He could play cribbage, and I think whist; draughts, but I am certain not chess; and he could laugh at the speech of any man, greater (in wealth and office) than himself, whether there happened to be any wit in it or not.

One thus gifted, in other respects, was of course proportionally gifted in the article of ears; and thus he could not but hear who were the wage of the day, and could not choose but be of their company, when opportunity served.

In the month of —, the snow fell deep, and lay long, the mails were stopped, and the whole city thrown upon its own resources; and one evening our official gentleman met two of the prime artificers of fun. Night was closing in, and the frost was such as to turn the breath to ice within a quarter of an inch of the lips. In such cases and such countries, there is but one resource—to heat the breath till it can thaw for itself a passage through the ice-hardened atmosphere. Some one says that "there is no getting radical hent but through the medium of radical moisture," and so the trio adjourned to the tavern, whose portal was invitingly new. In they went, seated themselves in the best parlour, with the little horse shoe table between them and the fire; below which, their toes could have defied the frost of Boothia, or Melville Island. The man of office was placed in the middle, like a royal scutcheon between two "supporters"—id est, rampant beasts of fury. The bottle—I rather think it was a jug, but n'importe—"passed and returned;" and the "middle man" bumpered with right and with left, the adulation of his supporters falling sweet the while upon him. He was Adonis; he was Solon, he was—but I was to mention no modern name. In the last of these characters, he played the orator, till the manual plaudits made glasses and jug dance again, as if they had been inspired by the all-overpowering bounds. When he could play the orator no longer, he was woke to glory in the histrionic art: now comedy, and then tragedy, till he fell in the field of Bosworth in a style, which Kean could not have out-done—for it was nature itself.

There he lay quiescent as Cæsar a year after the stab of Brutus; and then began the "practical joke." The dining tables were ranged in the middle of the apartment; and covered with the purest linen. The hero was stretched on them, with crape cap and ruff, and covered with the same. Candles in pairs were placed at the head, the shoulders, the knees, and the feet, and a silver salver bearing a silver salt-cellar was set on the breast. The room was festooned with extempore drapery; the candles were lighted in the sconces; the casements were thrown wide open; and the fire was extinguished. One part of the arrangement I had almost forgotten to mention; a pile of rummers and wine-glasses was placed on the upper cloth nearly in contact with the hero's elbow, and the carpet was removed from the floor.

Having made these arrangements, the other parties adjourned into another apartment, where they could readily hear any sound uttered in that which they had left. As their share of the carouse had not been half a glass to the official man's bumper, and as they had used no superfluous viands that could ferment their potation, they were in a condition for resuming it after supper while they waited the result; but they occasionally peeped through the clink of the door which was left ajar, and fortified sitting-head-high by a screen.

The bell tolled twelve, and there was no sound save that of one who monopolizes to himself all the sleep within hearing. The night-cold had indeed entered to see what was the matter, and the candles were turned to ignis fatui by halves of speculi of ice; but the internal caloric of the man of office, latent as it was, would have defied the summit of Caucasus or Chimborazo, and he snoozed away like a trombone.

The bell tolled one, and still no pause to the usual melody. But when the lazy hour index was creeping towards two, there was a yawn, and crack went the glasses. Steadily both crept to the chink, to catch the soliloquy which, in the original tongue, ran thus:—"I'm dead—that's a clear case—I'm sure I'm dead. They ne'er wad set out the lions this gate far a leevin' man. Weel, weel, gin I'm dead, I'm dead; an' a' body maun dee sometime. But sin' I'm dead, I'm thankfu' that it's nae war'; for, though I'm certain I'm dead, I'm as certain I'm nae damned:—this canna be hell—its sue aufu' caul."

In an instant the masters hurried him out of the apartment, refreshed him with a glass of warm brandy and water, saw him home in a sedan chair, and to bed; and as his brandy and water had been "docktered" a little, he slept so long and so soundly that he forgot all the death scene after the death of Richard, and "de-clareth unto this day," that that was the "white-letter" evening of his whole life

N.

* I have said that the prince was inflamed by jealousy, because other historians have represented the whole of this transaction as the result of a midnight brawl, in which Crichton, who was then in company with a lady to whom he had secretly paid his addresses, and who was also admired by the prince, was attacked by the latter and his attendants, in a fit of jealousy, and killed upon the spot. I have given the best authenticated and most probable account of this mysterious event. It seems, however, still uncertain whether Crichton owed his death to an accidental encounter, or to a purpose of premeditated assassination. But all his biographers agree, that whatever may have been the particular circumstances accompanying this calamitous event, he fell by the hand of his own master, Vincenzo, Prince of Mantua. His death, as was to be expected from the impression made by his uncommon talents, occasioned great and universal lamentation.—Lord Woodhouselee.

PART I.—THE ELEMENTS OF KNOWLEDGE.

PART II.—OUTLINES OF GEOLOGY.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilisation; up to a late period it has been too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which have attended its acquisition. It was with the desire of relieving science from these encumbrances that Dr. Arnot, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent helpmate men, commenced their labours; and it is as a humble but honest in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of much of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Library of Popular Instruction" will be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

CRICKET, AND EXERCISE IN GENERAL.

THE fine, hard, flat, verdant floors are now preparing in the cricket-grounds for this manly and graceful game, and the village-greens (where they can) are no less getting ready, though not quite so perfect. No matter for that. A true cricketer is not the man to be put out by a trifle. He serves an apprenticeship to patience after her handsomest fashion. Henry the Fourth wished a time might arrive in France, when every man should have a pallet in his kettle. We should like to see a time when every man played at cricket, and had a sound sleep after it, and health, work, and leisure. It would be a pretty world, if we all had something to do, just to make leisure the pleasanter, and green merry England were sprinkled all over, "of afternoons," with gallant fellows in white sleeves, who threshed the earth and air of their cricket-grounds into a crop of health and spirits; after which they should read, laugh, love, and be honourable and happy beings, bringing God's work to its perfection, and suiting the divine creation they live in.

But to speak in this manner is to mix serious things with mirthful? Well; and what true joy does not? Joy, if you did but know him thoroughly,—is a very serious fellow,—on occasion; and knows that happiness is a very solid thing, and is zealous for nature's honour and glory. The power to be grave is the proper foundation for levity itself to rejoice on. You must have floor, for your dancing,—good solid earth on which to bother your cricket-balls.

The Spring is monstrously said to be a sickly time of the year! Yes, for the sickly; or rather (not to speak irreverently of sickness which cannot be helped) for those who have suffered themselves to become so for want of stirring their bloods, and preparing for the general movement in Nature's merry veins. People stop in doors, and render themselves liable to all "the skiey influences," and then out of the same thoughtless effeminacy of self-indulgence, they expose themselves to the catching of colds and fevers, and the beautiful Spring is blamed, and "fine Mays make fat church-yards." The gypsies, we will be bound, have no such proverbs. The cricketer has none such. He is a sensible, hearty fellow, too wise not to take proper precautions, but above all, too wise not to take the best of all precautions; which is, to take care of his health, and be stirring. Nature is stirring, and so is he. Nature is healthy, and so is he. Nature, in a hundred thousand parts to a fraction, is made up of air, and fields, and country, and out-of-doors, and a strong teeming earth, and a good-natured sky; and so is the strong heart of the cricketer.

Do we then blame any of the sick, even those who are "blameable?" Not we; we blame nobody; what is the use of it? Besides, we don't like to be blamed ourselves, especially when we are in the wrong. We like to be coaxed and called sensible, and to have people wonder good-naturedly (not spitefully) how people so very shrewd can do any thing erroneous; and then we love them, and wish to be led right by people so very intelligent, and know no bounds to our wish to please them. So the measure which we like ourselves, we would fain deal out to others. You may do it without any insincerity, if the patient have but one good or sensible quality, or one sweet drop in his heart, from which comfort is to be squeezed into the cup of advice. And who has not got this? But it may be said, it is not to be found. No! Then the eyesight is very bad, or the patient is not to be mended,—a case luckily as rare as it is melancholy, and to be looked upon as a madness. The best step to be taken in that instance is, to give him as little advice, and see that he does as little harm as possible. For all reasonable care is to be taken of the comfort even of those who give none. They are a part of the human race.

As to our sickly friends before mentioned, all we shall say to them is, what was said by an abrupt but benevolent friend of ours, to the startled ears of a fine lady—"Get out."

"Well, I never!" exclaimed the lady.

The reader knows the perfection of meaning implied by that imperfect sentence, "Well, I never!" However the lady was not only a fine lady, but a shrewd woman; so she "got out," and was a goer out afterwards, and lived happily enough to benefit others by her example.

Many people take no exercise at all, because they cannot take, or think they cannot take, a great deal. At least this is the reason they give their consciences. It is not always a sincere one. "They had better say to themselves at once 'I am too idle,' or 'I am too accustomed to sit still, to make exercise pleasant.'" Where the fault is aware of itself, there is better hope of its mending. But the least bit of exercise is better than none. A walk, five minutes before dinner in a garden, or down a street, is better than no walk at all. It is some break, however small a one, into the mere habit of sitting still and growing stagnant of blood, or corpulent of body. A little tiny bit of the sense of doing one's duty is kept up by it. A glimpse of a reverence is retained for sprightliness of mind and shapeliness of person; and thus the case is not rendered hopeless, should circumstances arise that tempt the patient into a more active system. A fair kinswoman of ours, once reckoned among the fairest of her native city,—a very intelligent woman as far as books went, and latterly a very sharp observer into the faults of other people, by dint of a certain exasperation of her own, literally fell a sacrifice to sitting in doors, and never quitting her favourite pastime of reading. The pastime was at once her bane and her antidote. It would have been nothing but a blessing, had she varied it. But her misfortune was, that her self-will was still greater than her sense, and that being able to fill up her moments as pleasantly as she wished during health, she had persuaded herself that she could go on filling them up as pleasantly by the same process, when she grew older; and this "wouldn't do." For our bodies are changing, while our minds are thinking nothing of the matter; and people in vain attribute the new pains and weaknesses which come upon them, to this and that petty cause,—a cold, or a heat, or an apple; thinking they shall "be better to-morrow" and as healthy as they were before. Time will not alter with the real state of the case, for all our self-will and our over-weening confidence. The person we speak of, literally rusted in her chair; lost the use of her limbs, and died paralytic and ghastly to look upon, of premature old age. The physicians said it was a clear case. On the other hand, we heard some years ago, of a gentleman of seventy, a medical man, (now most probably alive and merry—we hope he will read this,) who, meeting a kinsman of ours in the street, and being congratulated on the singular youthfulness of his aspect, said that he was never better or more active in his life; that it was all owing to his having walked sixteen miles a day, on an average, for the greater part of it; and that at the age of seventy, he felt all the lightness and cheerfulness of seventeen! This is an extreme case, owing to peculiar circumstances; but it shews of what our nature is capable, where favourable circumstances are not contradicted. This gentleman had cultivated a cheerful benevolence of mind, as well as activity of body, and the two together were irresistible, even to old Time. The death of such a man must be like going to sleep after a good journey.

The instinct which sets people in exercise is one of the most natural of all instincts, and where it is totally stopped, must have been hurt by some very injudicious circumstances in the bringing up, either of pampered will or prevented activity. The restlessness felt by nervous people is Nature's kindly intimation that they should bestir themselves. Motion, as far as hitherto has been known, is the first law of the universe. The air, the rivers, the world move; the very "fixed stars," as we call them, are moving towards some unknown point; the substance, apparently the most unmoving, the table in your room, or the wall of the opposite house, is gaining or losing particles: if you had eyes fine enough, you would see its surface stirring: some philosophers even hold that every substance is made up of vital atoms. As to oneself, one must either move away from death and disease, and so keep pleasantly putting them off, or they will move us with a vengeance, aye, in the midst of our most sedentary forgetfulness, or while we flatter ourselves we are as still and as sound as marble. Time is all the while drawing lines in our faces, clogging our limbs, putting ditch-water into our blood;—preparing us to mingle with the grave and the rolling earth, since we will not obey the great law, and move of our own accord.

Come, dear readers, now is the season for such of you as are virtuous in this matter, to pride and rejoice yourselves; and for such of you as have omitted the virtue in your list, to put it there. It will grace and gladden all the rest. A cricketer is a sort of glorifier of exercise, and we respect him accordingly: but it is not in everyone's power to be a cricketer; and respect attends a man in proportion as he does what he is able. Come then be as respectable in this matter as far you can;—have a whole mile's respectability, if possible,—or two miles, or four: let our homage wait upon you into the fields, thinking of all the good you are doing to yourselves, to your kindred, to your offspring, born or not born, and to all friends who love you, and would be grieved to lose you. Healthy and graceful example makes healthy and graceful children, makes cheerful tempers, makes grateful and loving friends. We know but of one inconvenience in virtue of any sort; and that is, that it sometimes makes one love it too much, and long to know it, and show our gratitude. A poet has said, that he never could travel through different places and think how many agreeable people they probably contained, without feeling a sort of impatience at not being able to make their acquaintance. But he was a rich poet, and his benevolence was a little pampered and self-willed. It is enough for us that we sometimes resent our inability to know those whom we behold,—who charm us visibly, or of whose existence, somehow or other, we are made pleasantly certain, without going so far as to raise up exquisite causes of distress after his fashion. Now, as we never behold the cricketer, or the horseman, or the field-stroller (provided we can suppose him bound on his task with a liking of it) without a feeling of something like respect and gratitude (for the twofold pleasurable idea he gives us of nature and himself) so we cannot look upon all those fair creatures, blooming or otherwise, who walk abroad with their friends or children, whether in village or town, fine square or common street, without feeling something like a bit of love, and wishing that the world were in such condition as to let people evince what they feel, and be more like good, honest folks, and chatty companions. If we sometimes admire maid-servants instead of their mistresses, it is not our fault, but that of the latter, who will not come abroad. Besides, a real good-humoured maid-servant, with a pretty face, playing over the sward of a green square with her mistress's children, is a very respectable, as well as pleasant object. May no inferior of the other sex, under pretence of being a gentl-man, deceive her, and render her less so.

FOURTH WEEK IN MAY.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CRICKET.

WHEN we began our preceding article, we intended only to make a few introductory remarks on the following extract from Messrs. Clarke and Nyren's pleasant little reliabing book, The Young Cricketer's Tutor,* whose bats and balls are now coming into season. But we found ourselves running to such lengths, that we were obliged to make a separate paper of it. "Reliabing," this book may be truly called; for Mr. Nyren remembers, and Mr. Clarke records, every thing with a right taste; masculine as the game, and pleasant as the punch after it. Cricketers may venture upon punch: they have a stomach for it. To most men it is little better than a punch in the stomach. It is a pity the reader cannot have the pleasure of seeing Mr. Nyren, as we have had. His appearance and general manner are as eloquent a testimony to the merits of his game, as any that he or his friend has put upon paper. He is still a sort of youth at seventy, hale and vigorous, and with a merry twinkle of his eye, in spite of an accident some years ago—a fall—that would have shattered most men of his age to pieces. A long innings to him in life still, and to all friends round the wicket.

The game of cricket, (says our author) is thoroughly British. Its derivation is probably from the Saxon "cryce, a stick." Strutt, however, in his "Sports and Pastimes," states that he can find no record of the game under its present appellation, "beyond the commencement of the last century, where it occurs in one of the songs published by D'Urfey." The first four lines "Of a noble race was Shenkin," run thus:—

"Her was the prettiest fellow
At foot-ball, or at cricket,
At hunting chase, or nimble race,
How feastly her could prick it."

The same historian of our games doubts not that wicket derived its origin from the ancient game of club-ball, the patronymics of which being compounded of Welch and Danish (clwppa and bol), do not warrant his conclusion, the Saxon being an elder occupant of our island. From the circumstance, however, of there being no illustration extant—no missal illuminated with a group engaged in this king of athletic games, as is the case with its plebeian brother, the club-ball; also from its constitution, being of a mere civil and complicated character—we may rationally infer that it is the offspring of a more polite, at all events, of a maturer age than its fellow. The game of club-ball appears to have been no other than the present well known bat-and-ball, which, with similar laws and customs prescribed in the playing at it, was doubtless anterior to trap-ball. The trap, indeed, carries with it an air of refinement in the "march of mechanism."

They who are acquainted with some of the remote and unfrequented villages of England, where the primitive manners, customs, and games of our ancestors survive in the perfection of rude and unadulterated simplicity, must have remarked the lads playing at a game which is the same in its outline and principal features as the consummate piece of perfection that at this day is the glory of Lord's—and the pride of English athletes. I mean the one in which a single stick is appointed for a wicket, ditto for a bat, and the same repeated, of about three inches in length, for a ball. If this be not the original of the game of cricket, it is a plebeian imitation of it.

I never saw a finer specimen of the thorough-bred old English yeoman than Richard Nyren. He was a good face-to-face, unflinching, uncompromising, independent man. He placed a full and just value upon the station he held in society, and he maintained it without insolence or assumption. He could differ with a superior, without touching upon his dignity, or losing his own. I have known him maintain an opinion with great firmness against the Duke of Dorset and Horace Mann; and when, in consequence, of his being proved to be in the right, the latter has afterwards crossed the ground and shaken him heartily by the hand.

SMALL was a good fiddler, and taught himself the double bass. The Duke of Dorset having been informed of his musical talent, sent him as a present a handsome violin, and paid the carriage. Small, like a true and simple-hearted Englishman, returned the compliment, by sending his Grace two bats and balls, also paying the carriage. We may be sure that on both hands the presents were choice of their kind. Upon one occasion he turned his Orphean accomplishment to good account. Having to cross two or three fields on his way to a musical party, a vicious bull made at him, when our hero, with the characteristic coolness and presence of mind of a good cricketer, began playing upon his bass, to the admiration and perfect satisfaction of the mischievous beast.

What a handful of steel-hearted soldiers are in an unimportant pass, such was TOM SUETER in keeping the wicket. Nothing went by him; and for coolness, and nerve in this trying and responsible post, I never saw his equal. As a proof of his quickness and skill, I have numberless times seen him stump a man out with Brett's tremendous bowling. Add to this valuable accomplishment, he was one of the manliest and most graceful hitters. Few would cut a ball harder at the point of the bat; and he was, moreover, an excellent short-runner. He had an eye like an eagle—rapid and comprehensive. He was the first who departed from the custom of the old players before him, who deemed it a heresy to leave the crease for the ball; he would get in at it, and hit it straight off, and straight on; and, egad! it was as if it had been fired. As by the rules of our club, at the trial-matches, no man was allowed to get more than thirty runs, he generally gained his number earlier than any of them. I have seldom seen a handsomer man than Tom Sueter, who measured about five feet ten. As if too Dame Nature wished to shew at his birth a specimen of her prodigality, she gave him so amiable a disposition, that he was the pet of all the neighbourhood: so honourable a heart, that his word was never questioned by the gentlemen who associated with him; and a voice, which for sweetness, power, and purity of tone, (a tenor) would, with a proper cultivation, have made him a handsome fortune. With what rapture have I hung upon his notes when he has given us a hunting song in the club-room after the day's practice was over!

GEORGE LEAR of Hambledon, who always answered to the title among us of "Little George," was our best long-stop. So firm and steady was he, that I have known him stand through a whole match against Brett's bowling, and not lose more than two runs. The ball seemed to go into him, and he was as sure of it as if he had been a sand-bank. His activity was so great, and, besides, he had so good a judgment in running to cover the ball, that he would stop many that were hit in the slip, and this, be it remembered, from the swiftest bowling ever known.

BUCK, whose real name was Peter Steward, is the next Hambledon man that occurs to my recollection. He, too, played long field, and was a steady man at his post; his batting, too, reached the same pitch of excellence; he could cut the balls very hard at the point of the bat—nothing like Sueter however—very few could have equalled him. Buck was a dark-looking man, a shoemaker by trade, in height about five feet eight, rather slimly built, and very active. He had an ambition to be thought a humourist. The following anecdote may serve both as a specimen of his talent, and of the unfastidious taste of the men of Hambledon. When a match was to be played at a distance, the whole eleven, with the umpire and scorer, were conveyed in one caravan, built for their accommodation. Upon one occasion, the vehicle having been overturned, and the whole cargo unshipped, Buck remained at his post, and refused to come out, desiring that they would right the vessel with him in it; for that "one good turn deserved another." The repartee was admired for a week.

The tenth knight of our round table (of which old Richd. Nyren was the King Arthur) was a man we always called "The Little Farmer;" his name was LAMBERT. He was a bowler—right handed, and he had the most extraordinary delivery I ever saw. The ball was delivered quite low, and with a twist; not like that of the generality of right-handed bowlers, but just the reverse way: that is, if bowling to a right-handed hitter, his ball would twist from the off stump into the leg. He was the first I remember who introduced this deceitful and teasing style of delivering the ball. When all England played the Hambledon Club, the Little Farmer was appointed one of our bowlers; and, egad! this new trick of his so bothered the Kent and Surrey men, that they tumbled out one after another, as if they had been picked off by a rifle corps. For a long time they could not tell what to make of that cursed twist of his. This, however, was the only virtue he possessed as a cricketer. He was no batter, and had no judgment of the game. The perfection he had attained in this one department, and his otherwise general deficiency, are at once accounted for by the circumstance, that when he was tending his father's sheep, he would set up a burdle or two, and bowl away for hours together. Our General, old Nyren, after a great deal of trouble (for the Farmer's comprehension did not equal the speed of lightning), got him to pitch the ball a little to the off side of the wicket, when it would twist full in upon the stumps. Before he had got into this knack, he was once bowling against the Duke of Dorset, and, delivering his ball straight to the wicket, it curled in, and missed the Duke's leg-stump by a hair's breadth. The plain-spoken little bumpkin, in his eagerness and delight, and forgetting the style in which we were always accustomed to impress our aristocratical play-mates with our acknowledgment of their rank and station, bawled out—"Ah! it was near tedious you, Sir!" The familiarity of his tone, and the genuine Hampshire dialect in which it was spoken, set the whole ground laughing.

There was high-feasting held on Broad-Halfpenny during the solemnity of one of our grand matches. Oh! it was a heart-airing night to witness the multitude forming a complete and dense circle round that noble green. Half the county would be present, and all their hearts with us. Little Hambledon, pitted against all England, was a proud thought for the Hampshire men. Defeat was glory in such a struggle—Victory, indeed, made us only "a little lower than angels." How these fine brown-faced fellows of farmers would drink to our success! And then, what stuff they had to drink!—Punch!—not your new Ponche a la Romaine, or Ponche a la Grosseille, or your modern cat-lap milk punch—punch be-deviled; but good, unsophisticated, John Bull stuff—stark!—that would stand on end—punch that would make a cat speak! sipience a bottle! We had not sixty millions of interest to pay in those days. The ale, too!—not the modern horse under the same name, that drives as many men melancholy-mad as the hypocrites do:—not the beastliness of these days, that will make a fellow's inside like a shaking bog—and as rotten; but barleycorn, such as would put the souls of three butchers into one weaver. Ale that would flay like turpentine!—genuine Boniface!—this immortal viand (for it was more than liquor) was vended at twopence per pint. The immeasurable villany of our vintners would, with their march of intellect, (if ever they could get such a brewing,) drive a pint of it out into a gallon. Then the quantity the fellows would eat! Two or three of them would strike dismay into a round of beef. They could no more have pecked in that style than they could have flown, had the infernal black stream (that type of Acheron!) which soddens the carcass of a Londoner, been the fertiliser of their clay. Here would this company, consisting most likely of some thousands, remain patiently and anxiously watching every turn of fate in the game, as if the event had been the meeting of two armies to decide their liberty. And whenever a Hambledon man made a good hit, worth four or five runs, you would hear the deep throats of the whole multitude baying away in pure Hampshire—"Go hard!—go hard!—Tick and turn!—tick and turn!" To the honour of my countrymen, let me bear testimony on this occasion also, as I have already done upon others. Although their provinciality in general, and personal partialities individually, were naturally interested in behalf of the Hambledon men, I cannot call to recollection an instance of their wilfully stopping a ball that had been hit out among them by one of their opponents. Like true Englishmen, they would give an enemy fair play. How strongly are all those scenes, of fifty years by-gone, painted in my memory!—and the result of that ale comes upon me as freshly as the new May flowers.

The DUKE OF DORSET or LORD TANKERVILLE, sometimes both, would play, to complete the eleven. Neither of these noblemen were to be compared to Lord FREDERICK BEAUCLERC. Whether in batting, bowling, or, indeed, in any department of the game, he would have distanced them; yet they were pretty players. Each usually played in the slip when the other was not present. This station was the Duke's forte. He was in height about five feet nine, very well made, and had a peculiar habit, when unemployed, of standing with his head on one side.

And now for those anointed clod-stumpers, the WALKERS, Tom and Harry. Never, sure, came two such unadulterated rustics into a civilized community. How strongly are the figures of the men (of Tom in particular) brought to my mind when they first presented themselves to the club, upon Windmill-down,—Tom's hard, ungain, scrag-of-mutton frame; wilted, apple-john face (he always looked twenty years older than he really was), his long spider legs, as thick at the ankles as at the hips, and perfectly straight all the way down—for the embellishment of a calf in Tom's leg, Dame Nature had considered would be but a wanton superfluity. Tom was the driest and most rigid-limbed chap I ever knew; his skin was like the rind of an old oak, and as sapless. I have seen his knuckles handsomely knocked about from Harris's bowling; but never saw any blood upon his hands—you might just as well attempt to phlebotomize a mummy. This rigidity of muscle (or rather I should say of tendon, for muscle was another ingredient economised in the process of Tom's configuration)—this rigidity, I say, was carried into every motion. He moved like the rude machinery of a steam-engine in the infancy of construction, and when he ran, every member seemed ready to fly to the four winds. He toiled like a tar on horseback. The uncouth actions of these men furnished us, who prided ourselves upon a certain grace in movement and finished air, with an everlasting fund of amusement, and for some time they took no great fancy to me, because I used to worry, and tell them they could not play. They were, however, good hands when they first came among us, and had evidently received most excellent instruction; but after they had derived the advantage of first-rate practice, they became most admirable batters, and were the truest fellows (particularly Tom) in case of emergency or difficulty. They were devilish troublesome customers to get out. I have very frequently known Tom to go in first, and remain to the very last man. He was the coolest, the most imperturbable fellow in existence: it used to be said of him that he had no nerves at all. Whether he was only practising, or whether he knew that the game was in a critical state, and that much depended upon his play, he was the same phlegmatic, unmoved man—he was the Washington of cricketers. Neither he nor his brother were active, yet both were effective fieldmen. Upon one occasion, on the Mary-le-bone grounds, I remember Tom going in first, and Lord Frederick Beaucherc giving him the first four balls, all of an excellent length. First four or last four made no difference to Tom—he was always the same cool, collected fellow. Every ball he dropped down just before his bat. Off went his lordship's white hat-dash upon the ground (his constant action when disappointed) calling him at the same time "a confounded old beast." "I don't care what he says," said Tom, when one close by asked if he had heard Lord Frederick call him "an old beast." No, no; Tom was not the man to be flustered.

The BELDHAMS, George and William, came next in succession, brothers, and both farmers. George was what would be called a fine player; a good batter, and generally competent to fill the different posts in the game; but as he attended the club a few times only during my stay in it, I am unable to discriminate or to speak pointedly to his merits. Upon turning, however to his brother William, we come to the finest batter of his own, or perhaps of any age. William Beldham was a close-set active man, standing about five feet eight inches and a half. He had light coloured hair, a fair complexion, and handsome, as well as intelligent features. We used to call him "Silver Billy." No one within my recollection could stop a ball better, or make more brilliant hits all over the ground. Wherever the ball was bowled, there she was hit away, and in the most severe, venomous style.

Beldham was quite a young man when he joined the Hambledon Club; and even in that stage of his playing, I hardly ever saw a man with a finer command of his bat; but, with the instruction and advice of the old heads superadded, he rapidly attained to the extraordinary accomplishment of being the finest player that has appeared within the latitude of more than half a century. There can be no exception against his batting, or the severity of his hitting. He would get in at the balls, and hit them away in a gallant style; yet, in this single feat, I think I have known him excelled; but when he could cut them at the point of the bat, he was in his glory; and upon my life, their speed was as the speed of thought. One of the most beautiful sights that can be imagined, and which would have delighted an artist, was to see him make himself up to hit a ball. It was the beau-ideal of grace, animation, and concentrated energy. In this peculiar exhibition of elegance with vigour, the nearest approach to him I think was Lord Frederick Beauclerc.

BIRTH-DAYS.

May is full of pleasant birth-days. To-morrow we have one, for which all the thrushes and nightingale's ought to sing their best, to wit, that of Pacsiello. Giovanni Pacsiello was born on the 22nd of May (9th old style) at Tarento, in the kingdom of Naples, Anno Domini 1741. He was one of the most beautiful melodists in the world, as the airs of "La Rachelina" and "Io sono Lindoro" would be sufficient to testify, if he had left us none of all his others. Those two are well known to the English public under the titles of "Whither my love" and "For tenderness formed." But they who wish to know how far a few single notes can go, in reaching the depths of the heart, and sufficing it, should hear the song of poor Nina, "Il mio ben," in the opera of "Nina Pazzo per Amore" (Nina mad for love). The truth and beauty of passion cannot go further. We are admirers of the rich accompaniments of the Germans; but more accompaniment than the author has given to that song, would be like hanging an embroidered robe on the shoulder of Ophelia.

Turgot (Ann Robert Jaques) was born at Paris on the 23rd of May (10th old style) in the year 1727. A philanthropic and enlightened French minister.

Fahrenheit (Gabriel Daniel) the improver of the thermometer known by his name, was born, at Dantzic, May, 27 (14th old style) 1686.

A SURPRISE FOR A SULTAN.

THE following lively sketch, with its very dramatic termination, is taken from the French, and appeared in one of the numbers of the Jamaica Herald, which has been kindly sent us by a correspondent. The editor of the Jamaica paper calls it "A Lesson for Husbands," intending it for the benefit, we suppose, of some of his friends the planters, whose wives may be a little too fond of playing the empress. We hope no Jamaica gentleman is afraid for his head. It is an allegory, perhaps,—meaning that the "head of the house" will be brought low, if it does not take care, and that the pretty lips will reign in its stead.

To call it, however, a "Lesson for Husbands," is too exclusive. It is a lesson for wives also, and for lovers,—for all, in short, who confound the merely beautiful with the loveable, and who in admiring wilfulness in others, at once betray the propensity to it in their own natures, and tempt it to make them its unpitied victims. A handsome tyrannical husband may "snap off his wife's head," as well as a handsome vixen her husband's. "Lessons" for either party are invidious. Bad educations and undisciplined wills are of both sexes, and have a right to demand instruction through the medium of lessons for all.

(* Noble! and sensible!)

Semiramis, whose name has become proverbial for an able and despotic female sovereign, has the reputation of having been one of those perplexing personages whose private and public actions appear to be at variance, and who have allowed themselves to do every bad thing they chose, upon the plea of turning it to some great general account. Catherine the Second of Russia was such a woman, and has been called the "Semiramis of the North." Semiramis is said to have really got rid of her husband by means of his own delegated authority; though the French writer has invented the details. After all, she lived as far back as the time of Abraham! so that our certainty as to her proceedings, whether of love or murder, cannot be very precise. But the Frenchman has wisely considered, that a wilful undisciplined nature has nothing to do with chronology; and that foolish clever women, disagreeable beauties, and other ill-regulated phenomena, have talked and acted in the same high style of absurdity, in all ages.

"—Yes, of all my wives, thou art the one I love best (said King Ninus to Semiramis). No one possesses so many graces and attractions as you. For you I willingly renounce all my other wives.

S. How the wisdom of the king watches over his words! I suppose I should believe my master?

K. So long as you love me, what care I for the beauty of others?

L. So then, if I desired it, you would shut up your seraglio—you would send away the women who fill it. I should be the only one you would love, and who would share your power; I should be your only wife; I should be the queen of Assyria.

Semiramis spoke with an ardour which made her a thousand times handsomer. However, to shut up his seraglio, and send away his wives, was rather a delicate matter. Ninus, therefore, did not answer her, but renewed his conversation and caresses.

N. Queen of Assyria! and art thou not so, since by thy beauty thou reign'st over the king of Assyria?

S. No, I am only a slave that you love to-day. Who can answer for to-morrow? I do not reign; I happen to please. If I give an order, they consult you before obeying me.

N. Do you think it then so great a pleasure to reign?

S. Yes, for those who have never enjoyed it!

N. Well—would you reign for a few days in my place?

S. Take care that you do not propose to be too generous.

N. Nay, I repeat, if you would for one day be the absolute mistress of Assyria, you shall.

S. Shall I—and every thing that I command—shall it be obeyed?

N. Yes, I will cede to you, for one day, my power, and my golden sceptre, its emblem.

S. Suppose I should desire them to shut up the Seraglio?

Ninus smiled.—I will not retract my word. For one day, one entire day, you shall be queen and mistress—I swear it. It shall no longer be to me, that the palace and empire pay obedience, but to you, to you alone. Summon up then all your whims and caprices, for you shall have absolute power.

S. And when shall this be?

N. To-morrow, if you wish it.

S. I do.

Semiramis sweetly bent towards Ninus, letting her head fall on the shoulder of the king. She had the air of a pretty woman, begging pardon for a little caprice, after it had been ceded to her. Never had she been so pleasing: never had Ninus been so happy. In the morning the king said to Semiramis,—"Behold thy day to be queen!"

Semiramis called her women and made them dress her magnificently—she placed on her head a crown of precious stones, and appeared with it in the presence of Ninus—Ninus, enchanted with her beauty, ordered that all the officers and servants of the palace should repair to the hall of state, and that they should take from the treasury his sceptre of gold, and bring it to him. When this was done, and every one had assembled before the throne in expectation of some great event, he made them open the doors of the chamber, where he sat with Semiramis, and taking her by the hand, repaired with her to the hall. All the officers and servants prostrated themselves before the king. Ninus conducted Semiramis to the throne placed in the centre of the hall, and made her sit on it; then commanding every one to rise, he announced to them his wish, that during the present day they should obey Semiramis, as if she were himself. He took the golden sceptre from the hands of the chief slave, and putting it in the hands of Semiramis—"Queen," said he, "behold the sign of sovereign power; take it, use it, and command as queen. You have here only slaves, and I myself, during the whole of this day, am but one among them. Whoever are slow to obey your orders, let them be punished, as if they had disobeyed the king." Having thus spoken, he kneeled before the queen, who smilingly gave him her hand to kiss. The whole court then passed before the throne of Semiramis, who touched each officer with the end of her royal sceptre, and received from each of them an oath to obey implicitly her commands. She received their oaths with a majesty which Ninus admired. When the ceremony was ended, he complimented Semiramis, and asked her how she had obtained her grave and majestic air?

S. Because whilst they were swearing obedience, replied Semiramis, I was thinking what I should command each of them to do. I have only one day of power, and I would employ it well.

The king laughed heartily at this answer. Semiramis appeared to him more than ever, amiable and lovely. Let us see, thought he, how she will play her part, and with what commands she will begin. "Let the secretary of the king approach my throne," said Semiramis, in a loud voice. The secretary drew near—two slaves placed before him a small writing table. "Write! On pain of death it is commanded that the governor of the citadel of Babylon do give up the government of the citadel to him who shall hand him this order. Seal it with the seal of the king, and hand me that order. Write! On pain of death it is commanded to the chief of the slaves of the palace, that he give up the government of the slaves to him who presents this order. Close it—seal it with the signet of the king, and give me that order. Write! On pain of death it is commanded to the general of the armies encamped under the walls of Babylon, to give up the command of the armies to him who shall present this order. Close it, seal it, and give it to me!"

She took the three orders she had dictated, and put them in her bosom. The court was thunderstruck—the king himself was astonished. "Let all listen," said Semiramis—"in two hours all the officers of the state shall come to offer me presents, as it is the custom on the elevation of a new princess. Let a feast be prepared for the evening. Wait, I have still another order. On pain of death it is commanded to the chief eunuch that he present this evening, at the feast, twenty of the most beautiful women that they may be added to the seraglio. Go; let every one depart now, except my faithful servant Ninus—I would consult him on state affairs."

All the court went out—Ninus alone remained.

—You see (said Semiramis) I know how to conduct myself as queen. Yesterday you would not sacrifice to me your seraglio—to-day I have augmented it. Is not this generous?

Ninus began to laugh. "My beautiful queen (said he) you play your part admirably; but if your servant might dare to question, what are you going to do with those orders which you have dictated?"

S. I am no longer a queen, if I am to give you an account of my intentions; but (continued she, laughing) I wish to avenge myself of those three officers.

N. To avenge yourself! for what?

S. The first, the Governor of the Citadel, is ugly, and frightens me whenever I see him. The second, the Chief of the Slaves, has twice presented you fresh slaves to wean from me your love; and the third, being General of the Army under the walls, deprives me too often of your presence; you are always at the Camp—I am jealous of the army, and not being able to disband the whole, I will disgrace their chief.

This answer, mingled with folly and flattery, enchanted Ninus.—Well (said he) behold three great officers disgraced for very weighty reasons.

Oh (continued Semiramis) it is my pleasure I tell you; I mean to put your empire in disorder for one day at least.

Ninus and the queen walked in the gardens of the palace—the slaves of the gardens prostrated themselves before Semiramis.

N. These handsome gardens are yours to-day, my queen.

S. Beautiful gardens do you call them!—what is there in them that is royal, or that the meanest of your officers may not have? Oh, how few know how to use the power they possess!

N. But you have this day the power, to make use of it.

S. You shall see. Slave (cried she to the Chief of the Gardens), you see that portico on columns of granite, one hundred feet in height, and the terrace which surmounts them;—take the gardens with its flowers, its trees, and its cascades, and place it on the top of that terrace.

—Queen!! said the chief of the gardens.

—Thou dost, if I am not obeyed. Take a million of slaves, and do as I have ordered—Semiramis will then have gardens worthy of her.

The chief of the gardens stood petrified with surprise—Ninus laughed—an eunuch approached the queen.

—Great queen, (said he) the lords of the court, beg that you will deign to receive their homage.

S. Follow me, servant, (said the queen, smiling to Ninus), and she entered the hall of state.

The grandees of the court passed one by one before the throne, each bringing a present. The majority had considered it judicious to offer jewels and precious stuffs.

Semiramis paying little attention to these useless presents, ordered the treasurer to give to each lord another, three times the value of the one he brought.

—It is thus (said she to Ninus) that a prince ought to receive presents as a homage, not as a charity.

After the officers, came the servants of the palace.—These offered flowers, fruits, and roses, or elegant animals.—Semiramis received their offerings with a gracious air. Then came the slaves, who having nothing, could make no offering.—The first slaves were three young brothers, who had been brought up in the same place with Semiramis. They were young, fierce, and bold; and served as guards to the palace. Semiramis recognized them; for one day, in the place where she had resided, the females were attacked by an enormous tiger, and it was these three brothers who rushed to kill the animal. The females during the scene had remained veiled; therefore the brothers knew not Semiramis. When they passed before the throne, she said to them, "And have you no presents to make to the queen?"

— None (replied the first, whose name was Zopyrus), but my life to defend her.

— None (replied the second, who was Artaban,) but my sword against her enemies.

— None (replied the third, who was Assur,) but the respect and admiration with which her presence inspires me.

— Slaves, said Semiramis, it is ye, who of all the court have made the best presents. I cannot recompense them with the riches of the treasury of the empire, as I have done the rest; but it never shall be said that Semiramis was ungrateful. Thou who hast offered me thy sword, against mine enemies, take this order; carry it to the General of the armies encamped under the wall of Babylon, hand it to him, and wait for that which he will do for thee.—Thou who hast offered me thy life to defend me, take this order, carry it to the governor of the citadel, and wait for that which he will do for thee.—Thou who hast offered me the respect and admiration which my presence inspires, thou seemest to me a courtier; take this order, carry it to the chief of the slaves of the palace, and wait for that which he will do for thee.

The three brothers went out immediately, and the rest of the slaves passed on. The ceremony of gifts being finished, Semiramis descended from her throne, and desiring every one to quit the hall, remained alone with Ninus. "I told you (said she,) that I would upset your empire. You see I put your gardens upon high terraces, and your slaves at the head of armies; but now to my toilette for the feast. You will help me, will you not? and during that time we will judge of the beauty of the women whom I have added to your seraglio.

There was in Semiramis so much gaiety, folly, and beauty, that Ninus had never been so much in love as now. He assisted at the toilette of the queen. In a short time they introduced, one by one, the women destined for the seraglio. There were some beautiful, some only pretty. Ninus scarcely looked at them—he had eyes only for Semiramis. "You are wrong, (said she) not to pay attention to your new slaves: look at this young girl; what a timid air she has! and how pretty." Fifteen women had appeared; the eunuch announced that he had not been able to get any more. "Very well, (said Ninus with indifference,) very well." The eyes of Semiramis lightened with anger. "Slave, (said she) I told you this morning, on pain of death, twenty women for this evening, and you have only brought fifteen. Where are the others, that your head may not fall?"

The Eunuch did not answer, but kept his eyes fixed on Ninus.

S. It is not to Ninus that you are to answer for your disobedience—it is to me. Where are the five women, wanting to complete my order—I will have them or thy head.

E. My head will not fall unless the king pleases.

S. "That word has condemned thee!" then striking her hands, the slaves entered. "Seize that slave, drag him to the court-yard of the Seraglio, and take off his head—let it be presented to me before the feast this evening: begone."

N. "Will this be your last whim," said Ninus laughing.

S. No; I have yet six hours to reign.

N. My lovely queen (said Ninus, laughing,) I willingly give you the head of the slave; but is it worth your while to be angry about it? It is true, your anger gives you new charms; but a few women, more or less, what signifies it?"

Without thinking any further of the slave condemned to death, Ninus conversed with Semiramis. In a short time evening, and the time for the banquet, arrived. When Semiramis entered the hall, a slave presented a plate, from which she turned not away her eyes, but carefully examined it. It contained the head of the Eunuch. "It is well, (said she); place it in the Court of the Palace, through which the slaves must pass to the feast. Stand you by it, and repeat, that three hours since this man lived, but that having disobeyed me, his head was instantly struck off." The banquet was magnificent; there were dances, flowers, and perfumes, and a sumptuous feast prepared in the gardens. Semiramis, receiving the homage paid her, with much majesty and grace, addressed herself constantly to Ninus, as if she would pay him the honours of the feast.

S. You are (said she) a stranger king, who comes to visit me in my Palace. I must conduct myself to please you.

They were soon at table. Semiramis confounded all ranks—Ninus was placed at the foot of the table; he was the first to laugh at this change of the etiquette of the palace; and the court, following his example, allowed themselves to be seated according to the caprice of the queen. She placed near her the three brothers. "Are my orders obeyed," (she asked them). They answered, "Yes." The banquet was gay. A slave having by chance served the king first, Semiramis caused him to be hung up and flogged with thorns; his cries mingled with the laughter of the company. Every one was disposed to be joyful; it was a comedy, in which each played his part. Towards the end of the repast, when wine had inflamed the gaiety of the court, Semiramis spoke—"Sire, the treasurer has read me the list of those who have offered me gifts on the joyous event of my sovereignty; the name of one lord only is wanting to complete it."

N. Who is he? (exclaimed Ninus); he must be as severely punished.

S. It is yourself (replied Semiramis). Speak: what have you given the queen this morning?

Ninus rose, and with a smile, whispered that he had saluted her beautiful lips.

S. The queen is insulted by her slave.

N. I embrace her knees to obtain my pardon. Pardon me, powerful queen, pardon me.

S. (Abandoning him her hand, which the king was covering with kisses,) "I do not pardon such an insult from a slave: (then added in a lower voice) Slave, prepare to die."

N. What a little fool you are! (replied Ninus, still on his knees) I will, however, give way to your whims; but your reign will soon be over.

S. You will then not be angry with something which I am about to order. Slaves, seize this man—yes, even him—Ninus.

Ninus went laughingly up to the slaves, and put himself into their hands.

"Drag him out of the hall, take him in the court-yard of the seraglio, prepare everything for his death, and wait my orders."

The slaves obeyed, and took Ninus out. He went willingly, laughing all the way. They lead him past the head of the murdered eunuch. Semiramis placed herself in a balcony. Ninus allowed them to chain his hands.

Run to the fortress, Zopyrus—you to the camp, Artaban: Assur, shut all the doors of the palace. The orders were given in a low voice, and were immediately executed. "Well," said Ninus, "great queen, there remains but one word to end this comedy."—"Hear it," cried Semiramis; "slave, remember the eunuch. Strike!" They did strike, and before Ninus could utter a cry, his head fell on the ground, a smile still playing on his lips.

"Now I am queen of Assyria, (cried Semiramis,) and perish, as did the eunuch and Ninus, all those that dare to disobey."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE

XVI.—THE STRANGE FORTUNES OF CONINGSMARK.

Charles John Coningsmark was a Swedish Count, supposed, on strong circumstantial evidence, to have procured three assassins to murder Mr. Thynne, a gentleman of good family and large fortune, in the reign of Charles the Second. This atrocious deed, to which Coningsmark was stimulated by the hope of obtaining the hand of the Countess of Ogle, a beautiful young woman to whom Mr. Thynne had been contracted, was perpetrated in Pall Mall, near the bottom of St. Alban's street, as the unfortunate man was returning from the house of his mother-in-law, Lady Northumberland, who lived in St. James's street. At the hour of eight on a Sunday evening, in a crowded thoroughfare, in the heart of a great metropolis, almost within sight of a royal palace, and notwithstanding a running footman with a blazing flambeau proceeded the equipage, the villains having stopped and surrounded the coach, Charles Boratzki, a native of Poland, discharged a blunderbuss, loaded with bullets, at Mr. Thynne, which penetrating and dreadfully lacerating his body, he languished in great agonies a few hours and died. So flagrant, and, in England so unusual an enormity, as waylaying a man in order to murder him, naturally raised the indignation of the public, and excited the vigilance of the police.

The Count was seized a few days after near Gravesend, in disguise, and attempting to procure a passage in an outward bound ship. His three desperados were also soon after taken into custody, and with Coningsmark, tried at the Old Bailey, before the Chief Justices, Pemberton and North, the Chief Baron Montague, the Recorder, and others.

Three of the assassins after a long trial were clearly convicted of murder, as well by their own confession, as by depositions previously taken by the coroner and other strong evidence; but strange to tell, the original proposer and promoter of all the mischief, the infamous Coningsmark, by far the most criminal, was acquitted; while the three wretched men whom he had corrupted and employed, were executed, under circumstances of general hatred and indignation.

The contriver of an act at which the heart revolts, thus escaping punishment, was a national disappointment, and naturally exasperated the friends and family of the deceased. A writer of that period, without producing any corroborating proofs, throws out a rash charge of corruption against the presiding judge (Pemberton) and the jury. Of the latter, many of whom were foreigners, but most of them respectable men (says the author, to whom we have been indebted for so many of these romances, and whom the reader may now recognize by his style), I am not prepared to speak; but as to the judge, we must not admit lightly an accusation which would brand with everlasting infamy a man who had devoted his whole life to a profession in which eminence and promotion are not very easily attained, but which, by toil and perseverance, assisted by lucky incidents, he had procured; nor is it probable that any douceur a profligate foreign adventurer could present, would have seduced an eminent judge, of moderate enjoyments, to forget his duty and risk his independence, his fame, and his life. I rather impute the guilty count's acquittal to the fraudulent conduct of an interpreter employed to explain the evidence to the foreign part of the jury; he had been long connected with the count's family in some subordinate situation, appeared during the whole trial to interest himself strongly in his behalf, and was several times checked by the counsel on the part of the crown, for coming forward too officiously when not called upon; and was told that he acted the part of an advocate rather than an interpreter. The Chief Justice Pemberton, I confess, appears to have had a bias in favour of the prisoner; I hope and believe not a corrupt one. It was also remarked that the three condemned were not asked, as is usual in such cases, what they had to say in their defence; why sentence should not be pronounced against them. I have perused the trial with some attention, and confess, that there is not the shadow of a doubt on my mind of the count's guilt. In such infernal transactions, positive evidence can very rarely be procured, as they are generally carried on in darkness and mystery; but Coningsmark's previous and frequent intercourse with the murderers; his purchasing clothes for one, and weapons for another; the virulent manner in which he had long spoken of Mr. Thynne, and a singular question he directed a person to ask of the Swedish envoy, concerning the legality of marrying lady Ogle, in case of Mr. Thynne's falling in a rencontre with him; his perpetually changing lodgings and going by a feigned name when he came to London, to direct the nefarious business; and lastly, his attempting to escape in disguise, and telling the people of the house he lodged in that he was going to Windsor, when he actually went to Gravesend; were proof circumstantial it is true, but sufficiently strong to convince most persons of his guilt. It is impossible to peruse the trial, without remarking the great lenity, inclination to mercy, and scrupulous attention in every minute particular, paid to these abominable culprits. It appears to have been carried to rather a dangerous extreme with respect to them; and I am of opinion, enabled the count, who was treated with too much respect and delicacy, to make impressions on the jury, which ultimately tended to his acquittal.

But all the pains he took, all the guilt he incurred, and the innocent blood he had shed, could not accomplish the purpose he wished. Abhorring his crime, and detesting the perpetrator of it, lady Ogle would never admit him into her presence, and was afterwards married to the Duke of Somerset, who although she was a virgin widow, was, in fact, her third husband; the lady having been betrothed in her infancy, to Henry, Earl of Ogle, only son of Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, who died in his childhood. After escaping punishment for a crime he had committed, the count, in the midst of a career of unbridled profligacy, and with the conscience of a murderer, was put to death for a crime of which he was innocent.

Wandering, restless, and self-tormented, over various parts of Europe, he visited the court of (I believe at that time) the Duke of Hanover, whose son, the Prince of Zell, was afterwards George I., King of England. In the indiscriminate ardour of vicious passion, and taking advantages of domestic discord, he presumed to cast unhallowed looks on the princess of Zell, who had for some time lived in a comfortless state of estranged nuptial affection; the prince indulging a culpable latitude in female intercourse, whilst his wife lived almost in a state of seclusion in her own apartments.

But one of the frail court favourites, a most artful creature, afterwards created Duchess of Munster, having lately displeased this unfaithful husband, and being fearful of a reconciliation with his wife, saw with pleasure, and privately encouraged the insolent pretensions of the count; assuring him that a man of his personal accomplishments and merit, could not fail succeeding, after a little perseverance, with a lady so very ill-used.

Having, at the same time, excited the jealousy of the prince, by apt emissaries, and distant suggestions, concerning the marked attentions and known character of Coningsmark (for, generally speaking, husbands, however negligent, are not fond of being made ridiculous) this abominable woman, by means of a bribe, prevailed on a valet of court Werenhausen, who attended the Princess, to go to the Count's lodging, and inform him that the Princess of Zell wished to speak with him immediately on an affair of importance. The man of gallantry, flattering himself that the lady's reserve had at length relaxed, hurried to what he considered as an appointment; while the insidious contriver of the meditated mischief, repairing, without delay, to the Prince, and effecting a concern for the honour of his house, told him, she could no longer be a silent observer of the flagitious conduct of his wife; that if any doubt remained of her infidelity, his highness had now an opportunity of being an eye witness of his own dishonour; that the favoured lover, at the moment she spoke, was with the Princess in her bed-chamber,—the conspirers against this unfortunate lady having chosen an hour when they knew she would be in that place, and the valet being previously instructed, to which room he was to conduct the count.

The irritated husband, constitutionally and ungovernably passionate, rushed furiously, sword in sword, to the apartment, and meeting the count at the door just returning from the princess, who had assured him she had never sent; he, without uttering a word, plunged his weapon into the bosom of the assassin; and, after bitterly reproaching his wife, and refusing to listen to any explanation, imprisoned the unhappy woman for the remainder of her life, in a solitary castle.

We have heard the catastrophe of the above story related differently; Coningsmark being said to have been thrown down a trap door, like the more innocent subject in the Romance of Kenilworth. Other circumstances have also given rise to different conjectures; but all the relaters are agreed in loading the character of the Swedish Count with obloquy. Thynne is the man who has the extraordinary monument in Westminster Abbey, where the assassination is actually sculptured, coach, wig, and all; as if to be murdered was a sort of honour.

FEARFUL INTERIOR OF A MOORISH GOVERNMENT AND FAMILY.

The following incidents are abstracted from letters written by the sister of Mr. Tully, at that time British Consul in Tripoli. The high favor the English had gained in Tripoli, aided by the personal character of Mr. Tully, (who appears to have enjoyed the esteem of all parties during his residence there) procured his family an unprecedented degree of confidence from all the principal people of the place, especially the reigning family.

Ali Bashaw appears to have been a mild and kind governor, but a very weak one; and being irresponsible, except remotely to the Grand Seigneur he was led to tolerate worse deeds than he could have perpetrated himself. Altogether the narrative presents a painful view of a people at the mercy of weaknesses of all kinds. Whatever happens, they have no help for themselves; but are driven hither and thither, and butchered as remorselessly as sheep. They are every way oppressed,—by their rulers,—and by custom, superstition, and miserable ignorance.

A more immediate interest is added to a narrative of this kind, by the curious existing attempt on the part of the French government to colonize the still more barbarous territory of Algiers.

"Previously to entering the bay of Tripoli, a few miles from the land, the country looks picturesque, various tints of beautiful verdure being perceptible: no object whatever seems to interrupt the evenness of the soil, which is of a light colour, almost white, interspersed with long avenues of trees, for such the numerous palms planted in regular rows appear, being kept in the finest order. Their immense branches, coarse when near, are neat and distinct at a distance. The land being low and very level, the naked stems of these trees are scarcely seen, and the plantations of dates resemble for many miles luxuriant woods and groves. On a nearer view, they make a more straggling appearance, and afford neither shelter nor shade from the burning atmosphere that every where surrounds them. The whole of the town appears in a semicircle, some time before reaching the harbour's mouth. The extreme whiteness of square flat buildings covered with lime, which in this climate encounters the sun's fiercest rays, is very striking. The baths form clusters of cupolas very large to the number of eight or ten, crowded together in different parts of the town. The mosques have in general a small plantation of Indian figs and date trees growing close to them, which, at a distance appearing to be so many rich gardens in different parts of the town, give the whole city an aspect truly novel and pleasing. On entering the harbour, the town begins to discover its dilapidations from the destructive hand of time, large hills of rubbish appearing in different parts of it. The castle, or royal palace, where the Bashaw resides, is at the east end of the town, within the walls, with a dock-yard adjoining, where the Bey, (the Bashaw's eldest son, and heir to the throne), builds his cruisers. This castle is very ancient, and is inclosed by a strong high wall that appears impregnable, but it has lost all symmetry on the inside, from the innumerable additions made to contain the different branches of the royal family; for there is scarcely an instance of any of the blood royal, as far as to the Bashaw's great grandchildren, living out of the castle walls. These buildings have increased it by degrees to a little irregular town. The arrival of Christians in the harbour occasions a great number of people to assemble at the mole-end and along the sea shore, the natural consequence of an African's curiosity, who never having been out of his own country, finds as much amusement at the first sight of an European, as his own uncouth appearance affords to the newly arrived stranger; and it was not easy for some minutes to draw off our attention from the extraordinary group we perceived collected. It was noon when we disembarked, an hour when, on account of the extreme heat of this season, no Moor of distinction leaves his house; but a number of the Bashaw's chief officers, some from the Bashaw, and some on their own account, came to welcome Mr. Tully on his return to Tripoli. This being the first time we had seen so many persons, splendidly arrayed in the fashion of the east, assembled together, rendered their appearance more striking. Their long flowing robes of satin, velvet, and costly furs, were exhibited amidst a crowd of miserable beings whose only covering was a piece of dark brown homespun cotton, or a lighter web, resembling a dirty blanket, and which, (by a wretched contrast), heightened the lustre of those who passed through them towards us.

The Bashaw, Ali Coromalli, is short in stature, and by no means equal to his sons in figure, but he looks both consequential and venerable. Though not sixty, he appears an old man from the whiteness of his beard. The Bey, his eldest son, is about thirty, a fine majestic figure, much beloved, being extremely mild and just to his people. His guards and power are nearly equal to the Bashaw's, a circumstance which raises a jealousy in his younger brothers, Sidy Hamet, and Sidy Useph, which is cruelly heightened by disaffected persons around them, and renders them both exceedingly troublesome to him. Though the Moors and Turks are allowed to marry four wives, the Bashaw has only married Lilla Hullama, a truly amiable princess.

December 29, 1783. The Bashaw, the Bey, and his second son Sidy Hamet, went to day to attend the mosque. None but the royal family ride in town. Their suite follows on foot, excepting the head Chaux, who is first in the procession, richly dressed and mounted on a stately horse; he has a large kettle-drum before him on which he strikes minute strokes, going before in the manner of a herald, proclaiming the Bashaw at the entrance of every street. He rides before the Bey in the same manner when the Bashaw is not present, but does not accompany any of the other sons. His dress is nearly the same with that of the other chauxes, with the difference of a large gold claw on the left side of his turban; and the front of his under jileck, or waistcoat, was almost an entire breastplate of silver. Six chauxes followed him on foot, dressed uniformly in scarlet cloth close dresses, quite plain, not very long, and fastened round the waist with a leather belt. They had all of them plain white stiff high caps, made exactly in the shape of a cornucopia. The tails were borne next (the sovereign of Tripoli is a Bashaw of three tails); then followed the hampers, or the Bashaw's body guard: some of these guards were with the Bey; the younger sons have none at present. They were dressed very showily and carried a short silver stick in their hands. After these followed the attendants and suite of the Bashaw; round him were the officers of state, those highest in rank, of course, nearest his person. The sword-bearer was on one side of him, and his first minister of state on the other, to whom he seemed talking very earnestly. He was dressed in a yellow satin caftan, lined with a rich fur. His turban was very large with gold ends. He was without jewels to-day, though usually adorned with very fine ones. This omission of precious stones is to indicate to his subjects, that the Bashaw's mind is oppressed. The horses of the Bashaw and Bey were particularly beautiful; they were buried in their trappings. Both their saddles were embossed gold, and had gold stirrups weighing more than thirteen pounds each pair. The Bashaw's horse had on five solid gold necklaces; the Bey's horse had three. The Bey wore a pale green and silver caftan, and a crimson shawl with rich gold ends twisted over his turban. One of his officers of state had on a caftan of gold tissue, with a fine purple cloth burnuse over it. You may perceive, that in few places, the costume can be grander than it is here.

The Bashaw looks venerable, but the Bey looks much more like a sovereign. He is a noble figure and remarkably handsome. An immense number of black slaves and servants encircled the whole procession and kept off the crowd. The Bashaw visits the mosque on every particular event, good or bad, that concerns himself or his state. He sometimes, though not often, pays a visit to the Raia of the marine, who cannot wish much for the honour, as it costs him two of his blacks, whom he is obliged to present to the Bashaw for his gracious condescension. While the Bashaw was passing, a man who was in a consul's house for protection (all the consular houses being sanctuaries) ran out and touched his horse, and was on that account pardoned. This privilege extends to the touching any part, not only of the Bashaw's, but of the Prince's garments or horses when they are out: but the Bashaw's horse protects at all times, even in his stable: if a criminal can get under him or cling round him, his life is safe. When the Bashaw goes to any of his gardens, which he always does on horseback, he has three relay horses, richly caparisoned, led before him by slaves, and all his suite then ride.

May 24th, 1784.—The Bashaw has not given his consent for some time past to the Christians to reside in the country, at a greater distance from the city of Tripoli than four or five miles, as he cannot answer for their safety, on account of the incursions of the Arabs, or even of the Moors, many of the cyderies being at present nearly in a state of revolt. We have the use of a large Moorish country-house on the skirts of the sands; though the grounds belonging to it are not in the best order, yet they are in the style of all African gardens—a mixture of beauty and desolation. The orange, citron, and lime trees are in their fullest bloom: their branches, covered with flowers, are bending down with the weight of fruit ready for gathering. The Arabian jessamine and violets cover the ground; yet in various parts of the garden wheat, barley, water-melons, and other still coarser plants are indiscriminately found growing. The high date tree, with its immense spreading branches, is planted round the gardens near the walls. The branches of this tree extend fourteen feet; they grow from the top of it, furnished with close leaves from two to three feet long. Each bunch of dates, which resemble colossal bunches of grapes, weighs from twenty to thirty pounds. The tree grows nearly a hundred feet high. From this tree the Arab gathers the richest nourishment for his family, and from its juices allays fevers with the freshest lakaby, and cheers his spirits with that which has been longer drawn. They extract the juice from the tree by making three or four incisions at the top of it. A stone jar that will contain a quart is put up to each notch: the jars put up at night are filled by the morning with the mildest and most pleasant beverage, and, on the contrary, those jars put up in the morning, and left till late in the day, become a spirituous strong drink, which the Moors render more perniciously strong by adding leaven to it. The tree will yield this juice for six weeks or two months every day, and after the season, if taken care of, recovers in three years, and bears better fruit than before it was bled, as the Moors term it. It is customary in noble families to have the heart of the date tree at great feasts, such as weddings, the first time a boy mounts a horse, the birth of a son, or the return of an ambassador to his family. The heart lies at the top of the tree between the branches of its fruit, and weighs when cut out from ten to twenty pounds; it is not of a substance to take out before the tree has arrived at the height of its perfection. When brought to table its taste is delicious, and its appearance singular and beautiful. In colour it is composed of every shade, from the deepest orange and bright green (which latter encompasses it around) to the purest white; these shades are delicately inlaid in veins and knots, in the manner of the most curious wood. Its flavour is that of the bannan and pine; except the white part, which resembles more a green almond in consistence, but combines a variety of exquisite flavours that cannot be described.

The best dates, called by the Moors and Arabs, ta-pouis, when fresh gathered have a candied transparent appearance, far surpassing in richness any other fruit. In these gardens the Moors form no walks, only an irregular path is left, which you trace by the side of the numerous white marble channels that cross it with rivulets of water, as I have before described to you, through an almost impenetrable wood of aromatic trees and shrubs. The sweet orange of Barbary is reckoned finer than those of China, both in flavour and beauty; the next best is a small white orange which grows at Malta, almost crimsoned withinside. Cherries are not known here, and pease and potatoes only when cultivated by the Christians. Water melons, as if ordered by Providence, are particularly excellent and plentiful. Many owe their lives to this cooling and grateful fruit, when nearly expiring through insupportable heat. The pomegranate is another luxurious fruit of this country. The Moors, by pressing the juice through the rind of it, procure a most exquisite drink. The Indian and Turkey figs are acknowledged to be extremely good here. There are two sorts of apricots: one remarkable for its large size and excellence, the other, with the musk, melons, and peaches, are very indifferent. There are several sorts of fine plums and some very high-flavoured sweet grapes, which, if cultivated in quantities for wine, would render this country rich in vineyards, from the ease and excellence of their production; but Mahomet has too expressly forbidden Mussulmans wine, to admit of its being made in their presence, for even the sight of it is repugnant to the laws of the Koran. There are delightful olive woods near us, but when the olives are ripe, it is inconvenient to walk under the trees on account of the olives continually falling loaded with oil. Near to these woods are marble reservoirs to receive the oil the Moors extract from the olives, and from these reservoirs they collect it into earthen jars: it is as clear as spring water, and very rich. The natives who can afford it are so delicate in their taste of oil, that they allot it to their servants when it has been made eight or nine months, and yet when a year old it often surpasses the finest Florence oil. The walls which surround the houses and gardens of the principal people divide this part into a number of narrow roads in all directions; beyond them are date-trees interspersed with fields of barley and high Indian corn. Spaces of sand separated by olive plantations, sun-burnt peasants, and camels without number, add to these a burning sun and the clearest azure sky, and a just picture may be formed of Tripoli. The deserts adjoining, though singular in appearance seem frightful from the frequent and recent proofs we have had of their victims. A party arrived from them yesterday so exhausted that they would have died on the road if they had not been instantly relieved by the Moors. Four of their companions had perished the day before for want of water and from the excessive heat. Haggi Abderrahman, who is just named ambassador to England, often speaks of the death of his favourite daughter, who died in great anguish two days after crossing these deserts with him in his last return from Mecca. Being extremely delicate in her constitution from the scorching heat of the ground at the different times they stopped with the tents, her feet became blistered and mortified."

In this fertile country, so fatal are the despotic laws to agricultural prosperity, that in the year 1785, a frightful famine reigned. While still the famine possessed the town, the plague made its horrid appearance, and the Christians were forced to shut up their houses. It is against the Mahometan faith, to endeavour to avert the decrees of destiny; pestilence is therefore almost totally unchecked by precautionary, or even remedial measures. Before the first attack had yet died away, the plague revived with increased horror, and the new year, 1786, was ushered in, in the midst of pestilence and famine. At this time a vessel was expected from Europe with grain; it arrived, and was found to be freighted with Venetian boards, to cover the graves, and make boxes for the dead. The people were ready to tear in pieces the unfeeling Moor who had speculated in this dismally prophetic fashion.

Before the plague and famine had withdrawn themselves from the unhappy people of Tripoli, the more dreadful pestilence, discord, had completed a sad triumvirate. Owing to the restlessness of the Bashaw's two younger sons, especially the youngest, the place was for years after in unceasing anxiety and excitement.

The city of Tripoli, after the plague, exhibited an appearance awfully striking. In some of the houses were found the last victims that had perished in them, who having died alone, unpitied and unassisted, lay in a state to bad too be removed from the spot, and were obliged to be buried where they were; while in others, children were wandering about deserted, without a friend belonging to them. The town was almost entirely depopulated, rarely two people walked together. One solitary being, pacing slowly through the streets, his mind unoccupied by business, lost in painful reflections; if he lifted his eyes, it was with mournful surprise to gaze on the empty habitations around him; whole streets he passed without a living creature in them; for beside the desolation of the plague before it broke out in this city, many of the inhabitants, at the greatest inconvenience, left their houses and fled to Tunis, (where the plague then raged), to avoid starving in the dreadful famine that preceded it here.

Amongst those left in this town some have been spared to acknowledge the compassion and attention shewn them by the English consul. In the distresses of the famine, and in the horrors of the plague, many a suffering wretch, whose days have been spun out by his timely assistance, has left his name on record in this place. Persons saved from perishing in the famine, who have remained sole possessors of property before divided among their friends (all now swept off by the plague), come forward to thank him with wild expressions of joy, calling him bani (father), and praying to Mahomet to bless him. They say that besides giving them life he has preserved them to become little kings, and swear a faithful attachment to him, which there is no doubt they will shew, in their way, as long as he is in their country.

August 29, 1786.—The appearance of a new moon three nights ago put an end to the Moor's great fast of Ramadan, which had begun on the appearance of the new moon preceding.

During thirty days a number of circumstances having happened to create very alarming dissensions between the three sons of the Bashaw. Lilla Halluma, by exerting every effort, hoped during the feast of Beiram, which begins on the day after the fast, to put an end to these disputes and reconcile her sons; for that feast is the time at which every good Mussulman endeavours to settle all quarrels which may have disturbed the peace of his family in the foregoing year.

On the first day of Beiram, which feast continues three days in town, the Bashaw usually has a numerous court, which he should receive in the chamber built for that purpose, called the Messelees; but owing to the prophecy I have mentioned to you before, of some years standing, delivered by one of their most famous marabouts, that "the Bashaw shall end his reign in this chamber, by being stabbed on the throne by an unknown hand," he will not follow his inclination of resuming the custom of going there when dissensions happen at the castle; and there have been such serious quarrels between his sons during this Ramadan, that he still continues to receive his court in another part of the palace.

All his subjects are permitted to approach the throne to do homage to their sovereign on the first day of the feast. Two of the people in whom the Bashaw has the greatest confidence, stand on each side of him; their office is to lay hold of the arm of every stranger that presents himself to kiss the Bashaw's hand, for fear of any hidden treachery, and only people of consequence and trust are permitted to enter his presence armed; others are obliged to leave their arms in the skiff on entering the palace.

The drawing-room, in honour of the day, was uncommonly crowded; when all the courtiers were, in a moment, struck with a sight that seemed to congeal their blood; they appeared to expect nothing less than the slaughter of their sovereign at the foot of his throne, and themselves to be sacrificed to the vengeance of his enemies. The three princes entered with their chief officers, guards, and blacks, armed in an extraordinary manner, with their sabres drawn. Each of the sons, surrounded by his own officers and guards, went separately up to kiss the Bashaw's hand. He received them with trembling, and his extreme surprise and agitation were visible to every eye, and the doubtful issue of the moment appeared terrible to all present. The princes formed three divisions, keeping distinctly apart; they conversed with the consuls and different people of court as freely as usual, but did not suffer a glance to escape to other. They stayed but a short time in the drawing-room, each party retiring in the same order they had entered; and it became apparent, that their rage was levelled against each other, and not against their father, though the Bashaw seemed only to recover breath on their departure. The next morning, the second day of the feast, the Bey went to his mother's apartments to pay his compliments to her on the Beiram. She was very anxious to see him shake hands with his brother, Sidy Hamet, the second son, at least to make up the last breach between them; she began by insisting, therefore, that the Bey should not touch her hand, till he consented to stay with her till she sent for Sidy Hamet's wife to come and kiss his hand, a token of respect never omitted by any of the women in the family of the Bey on this occasion, unless their husbands are at variance with him. Lilla Halluma hoped, by this mark of respect from Sidy

Hamet's wife, to begin the work of reconciliation between the Bey and his brother, as this would have been the means of disarming the anger of Sidy Useph, the youngest son. The Bey, at length, consented to his mother's entreaties, and a message was instantly sent to Sidy Hamet's wife, who most unfortunately was, at that moment, attending on her husband at dinner. The message was delivered in his hearing, and it is thought with design, as there are so many intermeddlers at the castle. Sidy Hamet immediately ordered his wife to send a very severe answer back to the Bey. His wife was so alarmed and hurt at this new misfortune, which must occasion a further breach, that her women were obliged to support her. When she recovered, being willing to soften the matter as much as possible, she only sent word to the Bashaw's wife that she could not come because her husband was eating, and begged her to make as light of it as possible to the Bey; but the answer was delivered in the worst words Sidy Hamet had delivered it, and the Bey left his mother's presence too much enraged for her to pacify him, while Lilla Halluma remained agonised, meditating on the scenes of blood that would, in all probability, be soon perpetrated in the castle.

On returning to his apartment, the Bey found that one of his servants had been laid down at his youngest brother's, Sidy Useph's, feet, and almost bastinadoed to death, for a dispute with one of Sidy Useph's servants. Had the brothers met at that moment it would have proved fatal to one or both of them. The next morning (the third and last day of Beiram) the Bey went again to court, and in the presence of his father, Sidy Hamet and Sidy Useph, and a very numerous assemblage of courtiers, he warned both his brothers of putting his prudence any further to trial; he said he scorned to take an unfair measure, though in his power to silence both of them; that if either of them wished to call him out he would condescend (for they had no right to demand it of him), to meet them on the Pianura, where he did not fear the zeal or numbers of his people, and where, if they irritated him too much, he would shortly summon them to feel his power. The Bey's suite seemed hardly able to abstain from confirming with their actions what their master had said, who, upon saluting his father, retired from the court.

With various degrees of violence the same animosity was exhibited between the Bashaw's children up to the year 1790. Settled disputes among relatives seldom do otherwise than increase in bitterness with time. At this period the two younger brothers disagreed with each other. The dispute arose among their servants; but grew to such a height between themselves, that their old father was called out of his bed to settle it. He is accused, and it would appear with some justice, of favouring his youngest child, after the manner of most parents. Sidy Useph, though married, was quite a lad in age, being only about sixteen or seventeen years old. He was however a most "Angry boy." He had been early in life accustomed to the fantastic tricks of Muleh Yesied, an infamous tyrant, the son of the then reigning emperor of Morocco. Sidy Useph was esteemed the cleverest of his family. His cleverness however did not extend to a perception of propriety; and accordingly he was a cunning, fierce, wilful spoiled child; a singular mixture of boyish perverseness, matured cunning, and despotic contempt both of difficulty and decency.

June 2, 1790.—To our very great surprise, the Bey, Sidy Hamet and Sidy Useph rode on the sands together to-day. The Bey's people were nearly double the number he has in general with him, while Sidy Hamet and Sidy Useph's attendants were not near so numerous as usual.

The Bey's friends are much alarmed for his safety, and are very sorry to see him so reconciled to Sidy Useph. When they wish to caution him, the Bey's language is, that Sidy Useph has no power to injure him, as he can bring in no Arabs without his father's leave; and as the Bashaw's life is expected to terminate daily, he will not have it on his conscience to shorten its duration. The people, he says, know and acknowledge the throne to be his, therefore, while his brothers do not openly molest him, it is time enough when the Bashaw's life is ended to set limits to their power and possessions; "and then," continued he, "unless they aim at the throne, they will have every reason to be satisfied with what I shall do for them."

The Bey depends on the vigilance of his people to guard his person from treachery; it is impossible for them to give greater proofs of attachment to him, or to be more on the alert than they are. Those who are not at the palace with the Bey, keep a watch at night in their own houses, in case of the least alarm at the castle, and this they do without any orders from their Prince.

At length, however, Sidy Useph determined upon his eldest brother's destruction. With this view he paid a visit to his mother. He brought his chosen blacks with him and had well instructed them. The moment he entered the castle, he proceeded to Lilla Halluma's apartment, to whom he declared his intentions of making peace with his eldest brother, and intreated her to forward his wishes, by sending for the Bey to complete their reconciliation in her presence. Lilla Halluma, transported with the idea of seeing her sons again united, as she flattered herself, in the bonds of friendship, sent instantly to the Bey, who was in Lilla Aisher's (his) wife's apartment, informing him that his brother, Sidy Useph, was with her without arms and waiting to be reconciled to him in her presence; that she would herself join their hands together; and that, by the Bashaw's head, the Bey if he loved he would come to her directly unarmed.

The Bey, actuated by the first impulse, armed himself with his pistols and yatagan, or sabre. Lilla Aisher was certain, from the love Lilla Halluma bore the three princes, that no open danger would threaten the Bey's life in her apartment. She only dreaded treachery, which the Bey would never listen to. In the present moment she was alarmed lest the Bey's passing to Lilla Halluma's apartments with a hostile appearance, so contrary to the rules of the harem, might give a pretext for his being assaulted by Sidy Useph's people: she therefore reminded him that he was going to his mother's apartment, where it was sacrilegious to carry arms; and after the message Lilla Halluma had sent him his going with them might seem as if he purposed to assassinate his brother, and would, perhaps, draw the vengeance of the castle on him while he was unprepared. The Bey, hesitating a moment, pulled off his arms, embraced Lilla Aisher and was departing, when she threw herself at his feet, and presenting him his sabre, entreated him not to leave all his arms, and would not let him go till he consented to take that with him.

When the Bey came to his mother's apartment, Lilla Halluma perceiving his sabre, begged him to take it off before they began to converse, as she assured him his brother had no arms about him. The Bey, to whom there did not appear the smallest reason for suspicion, willingly delivered his sabre to his mother, who laid it on a window near which they stood, and feeling herself convinced of the integrity of the Bey's intentions, and being completely deceived in those of Sidy's Useph's, she with pleasure led the two princes to the sofa, and seating herself between them, held one of each of their hands in hers, and, as she has since said, looking at them alternately, she prided herself on having thus at last brought them together as friends.

The Bey, as soon as they were seated, endeavoured to convince his brother, that though he came prepared to go through the ceremony of making peace with him, yet there was not the least occasion for it on his part, for that he had no animosity towards him; but, on the contrary, as he had no sons of his own living, he considered Sidy Hamet and himself as such, and would continue to treat them as a father whenever he came to the throne. Sidy Useph declared himself satisfied, but said, to make Lilla Halluma easy, there could be no objection, after such professions from the Bey, to their both attesting their friendship on the Koran, the Bey answered, "with all my heart, I am ready." Sidy Useph rose quickly from his seat, and called loudly for the Koran which was the signal he had given his infernal blacks to bring his pistols, two of which were immediately put into hand, and he instantly fired at the Bey, as he sat by Lilla Halluma's side on the sofa. Lilla Halluma raising her hand to save her son, had it most terribly mangled by the splinters of the pistol, which burst and shot the Bey in his side. The Bey rose, and seizing his sabre from the window, where Lilla Halluma had laid it, he made a stroke at his brother, but Sidy Useph instantly discharged a second pistol and shot the Bey through the heart. To add to the unmerited affliction of Lilla Halluma, the murdered prince, in his last moments, erroneously conceiving she had betrayed him, exclaimed "Ah, madam, is this the last present you have reserved for your eldest son!" What horror meet such words from her favourite son have produced in the breast of Lilla Halluma, in her present cruel situation Sidy Useph, on seeing his brother fall, called to his blacks, saying, "There is the Bey, finish him." They dragged him from the spot where he lay yet breathing, and discharged all their pieces into him. The Bey's wife, Lilla Aisher, hearing the sudden clash of arms, broke from her women, who endeavoured to restrain her, and springing into the room, clasped the bleeding body of her husband in her arms, while Lilla Halluma endeavouring to prevent Sidy Useph from disfiguring the body had thrown herself over it, and fainted from the agony of her wounded hand. Five of Sidy Useph's blacks were at the same moment stabbing the body of the Bey as it lay on the floor; after which miserable triumph they fled with their master.

The Bashaw took little pains to resent the murder of his eldest son; but endeavoured to let the transaction pass off as quietly as possible. Sidy Hamet, his second son, was presently proclaimed Bey. Upon the elevation of Sidy Hamet, his younger brother's chief hostility was immediately addressed to him. Their disputes, invariably arising in the indomitable insolence of the younger, were perpetual.

June 23, 1791.—The town has been in a state of great alarm. The twentieth of this month was fixed for Sidy Useph to meet the Bashaw and Bey in the castle, and make peace again with the Bey in the Bashaw's presence; but Sidy Useph sent a letter to his brother the preceding evening, to say he should not come to the castle without his arms, and desired the Bey to remember the words of the prophet, which declared that nothing could shorten or lengthen the life of a man, and that if the Bey believed in their strongest tenet (mugh-tube, fate), he could not want courage. The Bashaw sent immediately an answer to Sidy Useph, to tell him that he would not suffer him to come into his presence armed; but, notwithstanding this order, Sidy Useph approached the town next morning, with three hundred men under arms. In consequence of Sidy Useph's approach with such numbers, a proclamation was issued from the castle to the Moors of the town, that if they were molested, every one had the Bashaw's leave to defend themselves, not only against Sidy Useph's people, but against Sidy Useph himself. Such a defence, with out this edict, would have been considered high treason.

Before Sidy Useph appeared in sight, his famous Marabut Fataisi came into town with some of his holy followers. They were admitted to the sovereign, and Fataisi told the Bashaw that Sidy Useph was on his way to town with twenty people only, and without arms, and implored him by the prophet to send the Bey out to meet him, and make terms with him for the peace of his family and of his people. The Bashaw instantly agreed to it, and had the prince gone he would certainly have been murdered. But the Bey having received certain information, that Sidy Useph was near the town with several hundred people, he seized the Marabut, though in the Bashaw's presence, and, holding his sabre over him, he told him, that had he not been a Marabut, he would have laid him dead at the Bashaw's feet for his treachery, and then informed the Bashaw that his brother had with him upwards of four hundred men under arms. The Bey turned the Marabut out of his presence, and the officers presented their arms at him, but the Bey ordered them not to fire. He desired they would see the Marabut out of the gates of the town, and give orders that, on pain of death, no one should suffer him on any account to enter it again.

In the evening the castle was crowded with people, and strongly guarded at the sandannar, or guard-house. At the zook, a sort of guard-house in the bazaar, the guards were trebled.

From our house we saw the bashaw sitting in his golpbar, at five in the morning of that day, and he remained almost wholly there till evening. The bashaw dispatched messengers to the different cydes of the Messeah, to send the Moors of the adjacent villages into town that night, but Sidy Useph sent immediately to tell them, that if they did not come to him, or if one of them attempted to go into town, he would massacre their families and burn their gardens.

A body of Mesurates and Arabs came in that night to assist the bey, whose situation is truly distressing. He can get no resources from the bashaw, and was so short of cash when the Arabs arrived, that he was obliged to borrow money to get provender for their horses, and the necessary provisions for his family.

In the evening the Shaiks of the streets were ordered to arm the inhabitants of the town. In the Messeah the Moors joined Sidy Useph's people, and committed dreadful ravages all the night, plundering the palaces and gardens belonging to the bashaw, and of those people who remained attached to him.

Before sufficient assistance could arrive from the Arabs for the bashaw, it was feared Sidy Useph had Moors enough on his side to enable him to enter the town, and the whole of the night of the twenty-second he was every hour expected to have forced his way in. The agitation of the Tripolians, as well as the Europeans, during the whole of that night, is not easy to be conceived.

The town being on the sea coast, the inhabitants could have fled no where from the rapacity of a banditti of Arabs, had they made their way into the city.

At half-past ten the next morning, Sidy Useph appeared for the first time in open hostilities against his family. All the atrocities he had as yet committed received a tenfold addition of guilt, by their having been achieved under the mask of friendship.

On the appearance of Sidy Useph the second day, all the consular houses were closed, as were the shops and the houses of the inhabitants who turned out with their arms, and ranged themselves in the streets.

The bashaw sent forces out early in the morning, to preserve the villages of the Messeah from the further ravages of Sidy Useph's people. In the afternoon they brought in the governor or cyde of the Messeah, who was carried to the castle to be strangled, but he is yet living. This man, instead of assisting the people and protecting them, had given every assistance he could to Sidy Useph. When the cyde arrived at the town gate, the bashaw ordered his chaouzes to proclaim Sidy Useph a rebel, and that it should be lawful to seize him wherever he could be taken, excepting in the marabouts or mosques, which may not be violated.

A noble moor came into town in the evening of the twenty-second, and pretended not to have joined Sidy Useph, or to have approved of his measures; but he returned again to him early in the morning, and, a short time after his departure, a quantity of provisions and ammunition was stopped at the town gate, which he had endeavoured to send out to him.

About an hour before noon Sidy Useph's people attacked the town. We saw Sidy Useph for some time seated as cyde of the Messeah in the Pianura, in the place the cyde should have occupied had he been present. Just at this moment the cyde of the Messeah was brought into the castle-yard to be strangled, but he was remanded back. This is the second time in one day that he has undergone the terrors of being put to death.

The bashaw has sent round the coast to collect the Arabs. We saw a number of horsemen at a very great distance, approaching from the west; this circumstance gives courage to the people here, who were much cast down. The cannon from the town were fired at Sidy Useph's people during the whole of the day, which had the desired effect of keeping them back. But though the firing was incessant, it did little execution on either side. Sidy Useph lost five men, and a few horses belonging to the town were killed, notwithstanding there were upwards of three thousand shot fired. The cannon were not even mounted upon carriages; they were fired by a Russian so badly, that he frequently pointed them into the sea on his left instead of into the Pianura exactly before him. This account, I assure you, extraordinary as it appears, is true, for we saw every one fired.

Things continued pretty much in this way till the November following.

The town is badly off for articles from the country: none are brought in, as the Moors cannot venture out for fear of being plundered by Sidy Useph's people. A fowl, fresh meat, or even an egg, cannot be had without great difficulty and danger; and at an enormous expense, vegetables and other provisions have already been procured, at the risk of the lives of those who have been sent for them.

Tripoli may now be said to be overrun with strangers, and those of the most dangerous cast. In fact the Bashaw's allies are nearly as troublesome as his enemies; untamable Arabs, of all tribes, and treacherous friends, are among his most trusted supports.

January 18, 1792.—This year, like the last, finds Tripoli involved in accumulated difficulties. A day does not pass without hearing of families despoiled, and wandering into town, reduced from affluence to beggary. Such a general consternation reigns, that it is impossible to discover who are friends or enemies, and war surrounds us with increasing horrors, aggravated by the dreadful consideration of its being between father and son.

Sidy Useph still exerts his utmost efforts to excite the Arabs to arm for him, and they are joining him very fast; they are so much in his interest that when the Bashaw sends to any of the Arab chiefs to assist him, their terms are so cruelly unreasonable that it is often impossible to employ them. Sidy Useph is at present at Querra on the coast, a short distance from hence; but he is so continually expected here, that every outlet leading from the suburbs of Tripoli to the sands is kept blockaded with stones, to impede the approach of his people.

Matters continued as bad till the month of July of the year 93. Sidy Useph continually harrassing the town, in most unnatural warfare with his father and elder brother. It is surprising how they could have born with him so long. The poor old Bashaw had indeed been induced to offer a reward for the head of his favourite son; but Useph had now got too much power in his hands to make his capture an easy task. While this family were disputing among themselves for the city, in comes a wolf to take it from them.

July 29, 1793. This has been, my dear friend, a very extraordinary day with us, and we are for the present moment most dangerously situated. Though we are so near quitting this place, we are destined to see an entire new government, and the whole of the Bashaw's family driven from Tripoli, before our departure, by a Turkish invader; even Sidy Useph, with all his efforts against his father, must leave the throne to this usurper, who came into the bay at five this afternoon. We were taking our usual afternoon walk upon the terrace, when we perceived a fleet of Turkish vessels anchor in the harbour. As the Turks are never welcome visitors here, the dragoman was sent directly to inquire what Captain Pachá commanded the fleet that was just anchored. We were immediately informed that a Turk named Ali Ben Zool, was on board, with an order from the Grand Signior to depose our Bashaw, and mount the throne himself.

With the servility to which the eastern people have habituated themselves, the Bashaw and Bey immediately succumbed to the mandate of the Grand Signior. In the hour of common danger they joined Sidy Useph; and altogether took refuge in the court of the Bey of Tunis, who entertained them with much hospitality. It turned out ultimately that they had yielded to a shadow, as the pretended order was a forgery. The Grand Signior generously gave the Barbaric powers leave to do themselves justice! Accordingly, after a short and iniquitous reign, Ali Ben Zool was driven from Tripoli, by the Bashaw's two sons. The Bashaw did not long survive his restoration; and the Bey, Sidy Hamet, was, after all, cheated of his birth-right by his ambitious and unscrupulous younger brother.

The Bey, warned by his friends or by his own apprehensions, had for a long time since his return to Tripoli, avoided quitting the town but in company with Sidy Useph, from the fear of the latter acting inimically while absent, or preventing his entering the town again on his return. But the two princes being out in the Messeah together, Sidy Useph on a dispute with his brother left him, reached the gates of the town some minutes before him, and without further ceremony closed them against the Bey; he then ordered him from the walls to retire to Derner, of which he permitted him to be Bey, adding that on his refusal he should be sacrificed before the walls of Tripoli. The Bey having no other resource, turned about with the few people he had with him and went to Derner, of which place he is now chief; leaving his brother, Sidy Useph, quietly seated on the throne, as Bashaw of Tripoli.

SHOPPING.

[To the Editor of the London Journal.]

SIR,—I am sorry to break in upon the beautiful creations of your fancy at this season of inspiration, with anything in the shape of a grievance, but seeing how happily you can convert even evils into sources of goodness and joy, I submit a case which I hope will not be deemed unworthy your consideration; especially as it may serve to put some of your fair readers of the metropolis upon their guard, at a time when too many of them are apt to forget themselves.

To say that I agree with you in your recommendations to all who desire to be amiable, and to be thought so, to go forth in these May mornings, where sunny banks and flowery fields are "stealing and giving odours," and by their happy presence to add "sweets to the sweet," is not enough. I must also take leave to thank you for the felicitous language in which your recommendations are conveyed.

Of the rural rambles of the rural fair, with hearts and minds disposed to receive impressions from the holiness, the beauty, and fragrant of nature, nothing but peace, and health, and joy, and moral goodness, the graces of form, and the language of heaven, as conveyed through the medium of lovely faces, is to be expected. But how different the result of a May-day ramble in this overgrown city! which now, from its extent, no less than by its pernicious customs, imposes and confirms its evil habits on many of the female portion of fashionable inhabitants. The sun and warmth have now some visible effects, even in the streets of London; and the very buttons, buckles, clasps, shop-windows, and coach-pans, toss the light about in darts and broad flashes, and the personal identity of our fair friends, divested of the hideous cloak and cape, is no longer questionable.

Now is the time that ladies begin to lapse into a kind of envious frenzy about shapes and colours; and now, therefore, is the time for those husbands who wish their wives to continue rational, as well as lovely, to take care of them; by no means suffering them to enter haberdashers', silk mercers', or shawl-shops, unattended; and ye, indulgent lovers! beware of going into such places with a mistress who wants something, but who after she has thrown herself with a fretful bounce into the shop-chair, will only say what it is not, and not what it is. Beware of these symptoms; for this annual frenzy is a lusus Nature, sent periodically into this erring world to plague such obtuse and perverse beings as scornfully neglect her beauty and abuse her bounty, and is as amply provided against, by a due number of sharpeners to take advantage of the occasion, as the annual regeneration of flies is, by a corresponding production of spiders, to entrap and devour them. As a man is said to be always infatuated before he is ruined, so our female friends turn fretful and ill-favoured when ripe for being imposed upon in their purchases of cheap and superfluous finery. A wardrobe of unworn finery is the indubitable sign of a puerile and uneasy mind; and whenever you see a lady fretful, you may suppose the seat of her disorder to be a chest of unworn and unwearable shawls: indeed, next to acute bodily pains, family bereavements, and biting penury, there is no source of disquiet equal to a possession which you know the moths and caprices of fashion have conspired to render valueless.

Superfluous purchases might not be so great an evil, in the main, if the poor creatures who manufacture such articles participated in the advantages of the sale; but such is by no means the case. Look in one of those marts of superfluity, and see how even a booby, with a little cash and a great deal of impudence, can flatter, and how he can tyrannize. How he can flatter and fawn upon the fretful simpletons who enter his door, and how he can domineer over his labourious and submissive assistants, who attend behind his counters, the most patient and ill-used of all human beings. In some of these places, a fashionably-dressed man is employed as a "shop-walker," a kind of assistant wheedler, and deputy-blusterer to the establishment; who, through the vacuum between his well-cultivated whiskers, grins his devoirs, or fulminates his commands, as the case may require. He makes known his importance and the gentility of his breeding, by the exclamations: "Hand over them shawls, Sir! Why do not you rise that lamp there!" &c.

I will here give the ladies a few hints fit to go with them in every round of fashionable shopping, and to be laid up in lavender, when at home. In these places, persons of the most unlovely aspects receive the most urgent attentions. The especial business of the "shop-walker" is to watch the entrance of customers, and to fasten his attentions on those ladies whose countenance and general air are most fretful and repulsive; for out of their very fretfulness, he contrives the means of imposing upon them. The business of his day is to effect impossibilities, and the boast and jest of his night, that he has, by sheer impudence, made the ugly purchase things uglier than themselves, and passed off the worst commodities on those who came to look with a supercilious eye upon the best. In short, the gross, palpable, and fawning flatteries, which characterize the principals in all these places, are such as imposters alone can utter, and idlers believe.

I have attended many of my female friends on their shopping excursions, and can truly declare that I never knew one who possessed, at the same time, a fretful temper and a happy choice. And for cheapness—unlovely faces embolden even those most patient and obliging persons who serve behind the counters, to impose upon them, if they can. They will naturally do so, from mere resentment, seeing that their integrity and most obliging attentions have been repelled by discontented looks and unamiable suspicions. On the contrary, happy faces enter unmolested by the shop-walker; they inspire a necessary confidence, and that kind of assiduity to please, in the server, which rarely fail to ensure a happy choice. The very patterns will appear to assume a delicacy of tint from their proximity to a sweet countenance, and those colours must needs be "fast," that are daily to be burnished with new smiles, until the very texture is worn out.

GILPIN'S FOREST SCENERY, with important and extensive additions, by Sir Thomas Dick LAUDER, Bart.; and upwards of thirty beautiful sketches of Forest Trees, and Animals, by Mr. J. B. KIDD, S.A.

"Sir Thomas's part must not be passed over slightly. In bulk, his additions nearly equal the original work of Gilpin, and the excellence of this additional matter, or at least an estimate of its excellence, may be gathered from the declaration, which we make advisedly, and after a very careful perusal of the whole, that, if taken separately, we should find considerable difficulty in deciding which to prefer—the old part or the new."

"In conclusion, we have only to repeat, that few books have afforded us more real pleasure than this valuable and beautiful edition of 'Gilpin's Forest Scenery.' It cannot fail to be extensively known, and we feel satisfied that it requires only to be known in order to be admired."—New Monthly Mag. Feb.

"No dry account can convey any idea of the work. The natural conception and long gestation have given it a completeness and harmony of structure which the highest genius could not have accomplished by other means. The execution is as masterly as might be expected from taste and knowledge combined. The style is admirably adapted to the subject,—elegantly pastoral, with somewhat more of terseness and vigour than belongs to the oaten reed. To country gentlemen of taste—to all improvers of cultivated minds—Gilpin is indispensable. To every one his work is delightful reading. For country reading, which always partakes rather of the otium, it is amongst the most charming of books. Such is the author Sir Thomas Dick LAUDER has undertaken to edit; and he has executed his task in a congenial spirit. The matter of the notes is very curious. Sometimes they confirm or correct, or amplify the original; sometimes they illustrate the particular views, or they comprise catalogues of the different species of trees which Gilpin did not stop to enumerate, or they furnish the reasons for the judgment he pronounced; sometimes they are anecdotal, or gossip; they are sometimes mere interruptions; they are frequently useful and interesting, and occasionally beautiful."—Spectator.

The Third Edition, revised and corrected, of WHITE'S NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE; Observations on Nature; and the Naturalist's Calendar. With Woodcuts by Bonner, and Notes by Captain Thomas BROWN, F.R.S. One volume, foolscap 8vo., 3s. 6d. extra boards.

"White's Selborne is now a general favourite, it has been edited in a variety of forms and by several distinguished persons. It is now taken up by Captain Brown. His notes to this book prove him to be an original inquirer. Many of them are very curious, and whether his own, or collected from other sources, they altogether form the best commentary that has yet been appended to the original. The study of Natural History has made great progress of late, and much of the impetus it has received is to be attributed to the History of Selborne."—Westminster Review.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilisation; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which have attended its acquisition. It was with the desire of relieving science from these encumbrances that Dr. Arnot, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent helpmate men, commenced their labours; and it is as a humble but honest in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "dulce et utile," the subject will be divested of much of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Library of Popular Instruction" be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

LETTER III.

A POPULAR VIEW OF THE HEATHEN MYTHOLOGY.

A Correspondent who writes respecting these letters, expected it seems, that they were to appear in regular weekly succession. But we said, in our first, that we only proposed to give them "from time to time;" want of a particular book, and of leisure to go and consult it at a distance, still prevents us from taking up the subject of Homer, we thought we could not do better than give our readers the following article meanwhile.

THE divinities of the ancient mythology are of a very tangible order. They were personifications of the power of the external world, and of the operations of the intellect, and sometimes merged themselves into the particular providence of an eminent prince or reformer. Mankind wishing to have distinct ideas of the unknown powers of the universe, naturally painted them at first in their own shapes; and not being able to conceive of them otherwise than by the light of their understanding, they as naturally gifted them with their own faculties, moral and intellectual. Hence, the Heathen gods were reflections of the qualities most admired or feared during the times in which they originated; and to the same cause were owing the inconsistencies and the vices, palmed upon them by the stories of different ages and nations, whose gods became lumped together; and hence the trouble that the philosopher had in endeavouring to reconcile the popular superstitions with a theology more becoming.* Plutarch, who was a priest at Delphi, and a regular devout Pagan, but good-hearted and imbued with philosophy, is shocked at the popular stories of the rapes and quarrels of the gods; and Plato, on a similar account, was for banishing Homer from his republic. Plutarch will not allow that it was the real Apollo who fought a serpent and afterwards had to purify himself. He said it must have been a likeness of him, a Dæmon. In other words, the gods of Plutarch were to resemble the highest ideas which Plutarch could form of dignity and power. Hence, the greater philosophers whose ardour in the pursuit of truth, rendered them still more desirous of departing from conventional degradations of it, came to agree that the nature of the deity was inconceivable; and that the most exalted being they could fancy was at an incalculable distance from it,—an emanation, a being deputed, a sort of spiritual incarnation of one of the divine thoughts;—if we may so speak without absurdity, and without blame. Plato for instance, observing the moral imperfections of our planet, and not knowing how to account for them any more than we do (for the first cause of evil is always left in the dark) imagined that this world was created by what he called a Demiurgus, or inferior divine energy; just as an artist less than Raphael might paint a fine picture, though not so good as what might have come from the hands of the greater one. If you asked him how he made out, that the chief creator did not do the work himself, he would have referred you to the fact of the imperfection, and to the existence of different degrees of skill and beauty in which we see all about us; for he thought he had a right to argue from analogy, in default of more certain principles. This right he undoubtedly possessed, and it was natural and reasonable to exert it; but considering the imperfection of the human faculties, and the false reports they make to us even of things cognizable to the senses, it is, in truth, impossible to argue with any certainty from things human to things divine. The only service, to all appearance, which our faculties can do for us in these questions, is to save us from the admission of gratuitous absurdities, and dogmas dishonourable to the idea of a Divine Being, and to encourage us to guess handsomely and to good purpose. For sincerity, at all events, must not be gainsaid; otherwise belief, and probability, and principle, and natural love, and the earth itself slide from under our feet. The mystery of the permission of evil still remained; the mystery of imperfection, and of cause itself, was only thrown back; and, in fact, the invention of the Demiurgus was merely shifting the whole mystery of deity from a first cause to a second. The old dilemma between omnipotence and omnibenevolence perplexed the understanding then, as it does now; and as this world was made the reflection of every other, or rather as evil was supposed to render all the operations of the deity imperfect, except immediately in his own sphere, men seem to have overlooked among other guesses, the probability, that evil may exist only in petty corners or minute portions of the universe, and even then be only the result of an experiment with certain elementary compounds to see whether they cannot be made planets of perfect happiness as well as the rest. For after all, Plato's assumption of the innate and unconscious difficulty which matter presents in the working (or an inability of some sort, whatever it be, to render things perfect at once) is surely the best assumption, among the hundreds that have been taken for granted on this point; seeing that it sets aside malignity, encourages hope, and stimulates us to an active and benign state of endeavour such as we may conceive to enlist us in the divine service. We must never take any thing on trust in order to make a handle of it for dictation, or hypocrisy, or a selfish security, or an indolence which we may dignify with the title of resignation; but as we are compelled to assume or conjecture something or other, unless indeed we are deficient in the imaginative part of our nature, it is best to assume the best candidly, and acknowledge it to be an assumption, in order that we may do the utmost we can. Happy opinions are the wine of the heart. What if this world be an experiment, part of which consists in our own co-operation, that is to say, in trying how far the inhabitants of it can acquire energy enough, and do credit enough to the first cause, to add it finally to the number of blessed stars? and what if more direct communication with us, on the part of the operator, would of necessity put an end to the experiment? The petty human considerations of pride and modesty have nothing to do with the cordial magnitude of such guesses; and the beauty of them consists, we think, not merely in their cheerfulness and real piety, but in their adaptation to all experimental systems of utility, those of the most exclusive utilitarians not excepted. Such, we confess, is our own creed, which we boast at the same time to be emphatically Christian; and the good which our enthusiasm cannot help thinking such an opinion might do, will excuse us with the readers for this digression.*

* The hope of a happier state of things on earth, argues nothing against a life hereafter. The fitness of a human soul for immortality may be a part of the experiment. The divinest Preacher of Eternity that has appeared, expressly anticipated a happier period for mankind in their human state, though many who are called his followers are eager to load both themselves and the world they live in with contumely,—themselves as "innately vicious," and the world as "a vale of tears." Such are the compliments they think to pay their Creator! Yet these are the persons who talk with the greatest devotion of resigning themselves to God's will, and who pique themselves upon having the most exalted ideas of his nature! How much better to

The Gods of Greece, taken in the popular view of them, were, upon the whole, a jovial company, occasionally dispersed about the world, and assembling on Mount Olympus. They dined and supped there, and made love like a party of gallants at a King's table. A pretty girl served, instead of a butler; and the Muse played the part of a band.† When they came down to earth, they behaved like the party going home; made love again, after their fashion; interfered in quarrels, frightened the old and the feeble; and next day joined a campaign, or presided at an orthodox meeting. In short, they did whatever the vulgar thought gallant and heroic, and were particularly famous for having their own way. If a god offended against all humanity, he had his reasons for it, and was a privileged person. He could do no wrong. But if humanity went counter to a god, the offender and all his generation were to suffer for it. A lady who had resisted the violence of his virtue, was not to be believed, whenever she spoke truth; or your brother became an owl or a flint stone; or your son was to become a criminal or a madman, because his grandfather unwittingly married against the god's consent. The vulgar thought how wilful and unjust they would be themselves if they had power; they saw how much Kings were given to those kind of peccadilloes; and therefore, if they could have become gods, how much more they would have been ungodly! It is true, the philosopher refined upon all this; and agreeably to the way in which nature works, there was a sort of cultivation of energy underneath it, and an instinct of something beyond the common theories of right and wrong. Nature's character remained safe, and her good work proceeded. The Divinity within us was superior to the ideas of him which we threw up.

Homer makes the gods of a mighty size. His Neptune goes a hundred miles at a stride. This grandeur is of a questionable sort. Homer's men become little in proportion as the gods become great, and Mars and Minerva lording it over a battle, are like giants "tempesting" among a parcel of mice. The less they were seen, the less the dignity on either side was compromised; for their effect might be as gigantic as possible.

The truest grandeur is moral. When there is a heaven-quake because Jupiter has bent his brows;—when Apollo comes down in his wrath "like night-time" and a plague falls upon the people; when a fated man in a tragedy is described sleeping at the foot of an altar, with three tremendous looking women (the furies) keeping an eye upon him;—when a doomed old man in a grove, is called away by a voice,—after which he is never more seen; or to turn the brighter side of power, when Bacchus leaps out of his chariot in Titian's picture, looking (to our mortal eyes) with the fierce gravity of a wine-god's energy, though he comes to comfort a mourner; or to sum up all that is sweet as well as powerful, when Juno goes to Venus to borrow her girdle in order that she may appear irresistible in the eyes of Jupiter; it is then we feel all the force and think it his will that they should bestir themselves to improve their own natures and the world! How much better to think it consonant with his nature that they should help to drain the "vale of tears" as they call it, just as they would any other valley, beautiful and full of resources! They do not think it necessary to be resigned when they can work for others? Resignation is always good, provided it means only patience in the midst of endeavour, or repose after it; but when it implies a mere folding of the hands, and a despair of making any thing good out of "God's own work," it is surely the lowest and most equivocal aspect under which piety could wish to be drawn.

† See the description in books and prints, the marriage of Cupid and Psyche. Raphael made a picture of it. Augustus is charged with having made an impious entertainment in imitation of these "charming noons and nights divine." Ben Jonson, we suppose in consideration of K. James, who besides being a classical monarch, was devout as well as debauched,—has taken the liberty of misrepresenting the charge in his Poetaster, and making Augustus astonished at the impiety of others!

* Virtue or vice either, if accompanied with power, will do to make a god of in barbarous times, and till mankind learn the perniciousness of that sort of apotheosis. An Eastern writer says that Pharaoh wished to pass for a divinity with his subjects, and had frequent conversation with the devil for that purpose. The devil put him off from time to time, till he told him one day that the hour was arrived, "How is that?" cried Pharaoh,— "why is it time now, and was not before?" "The reason is," replied the Devil, "that you have not hitherto been quite bad enough: at length you have become intolerable, and there is no alternative between a revolt of your subjects, and their belief in your being a god. Once persuade them of that, and there is nothing so extravagant, either in word or deed, which they will not take from you with respect." Dr. Herbelot article Faraon.

beauty of the Greek fables; and an intimacy with their sculpture shews us the eternal youth of this beauty, and renders it a sort of personal acquaintance.

Milton wrote some fine verses on the cessation of Heathen oracles, in which while he thinks he is triumphing over the dissolution of the gods, like a proper Christian, he is evidently regretting and lingering over them, as was natural to a poet. He need not have lamented. A proper sense of universality knows how to reconcile the real beauty of all creeds; and the gods survive in the midst of his own epic, lifted by his own hand above the degradation to which he has thrust them. Vulcan, he says, was called Mammon in heaven, and was a fallen angel. But he has another name for him, better than either. Hear how he rolls the harmony of his vowels.

Par. Lost. Book II.

"Not more than you did," Homer might have said to him in Elysium," when you called my divine architect a sordid archangel, fond of gold, and made him fall from a state of perfect holiness and bliss, which was impossible."

"Brother, brother," Milton might have said, glancing at the Author of the Beggar's Opera, "we were both in the wrong;—except when you were painting Helen and Andromache, or sending your verses forward like a devouring fire."

"Or you," would the heroic ancient rejoin, "when you made us acquainted with the dignity of those two gentle creatures in Paradise, and wrote verses full of tranquil superiority, which make mine appear to me like the talking of Mars compared with that of Jupiter."

No Heathen Paradise, according to Milton, could compare with his; yet in saying so, he lingers so fondly among the illegal shades, that it is doubtful which he prefers.

Not that fair field
Of Enna, where Proserpine, gathering flowers,
(Herself a fairer flow'r) by gloomy Dis
Was gather'd; which cost Ceres all that pain
To seek her through the woods; nor that sweet grove
Of Daphne, by Orontes, and the inspir'd
Castalian spring, might with this Paradise
Of Eden strive; nor that Nyctean Isle
Girt with the river Triton, where old Cham,
Whom gentles Ammon call and Lybian Jove,
Hid Amalthea, and her florid son,
Young Bacchus, from his step-dame Rhea's eye.

Milton had in fact settled this question of the indistinguishability of Paganism in his youth. His college Exercises shewing that "nature could not grow old," showed also that the gods and goddesses must remain with her. The style of Milton's Latin verses is founded on Ovid, but his love of a conscious and sonorous music renders it his own, and perhaps there is nothing more like the elder English Milton than these young exercises of his in a classical language.

Dr. Johnson objects to Milton's Lycidas, (which is an elegy on a lost companion of his studies) that "passion plucks no berries from the myrtle and ivy; nor calls upon Arethusa and Mincius; nor tells of rough Satyrs and Fauns with cloven heel." To which Warton very properly answers, "but poetry does this: and in the hands of Milton does it with a peculiar and irresistible charm. Subordinate poets exercise no invention when they tell how a shepherd has lost a companion, and must feed his flocks alone, without any judge of his skill in piping; but Milton dignifies and adorns these common artificial incidents with unexpected touches of picturesque beauty, with the graces of sentiment and with the novelties of original genius." Warton says further, that "poetry is not always unconnected with passion," and then gives an instance out of the poem where Milton speaks of the body of his lost friend. But he might have added that poetry itself is a passion; that Fleet Street and "the Mitre," though very good things, are not the only ones; that these two young friends lived in the imaginative as well as the every-day world; that the survivor most probably missed the companion of his studies more on the banks of the Arethusa and the Mincius, than he did in the college grounds; in short, that there is a state of poetical belief, in which the images of truth and beauty, which are by their nature lasting, become visible and affecting to the mind in proportion to the truth and beauty of its own tact for universality.

Bacon, though no poet, had it, and adorned his house with Pagan Sculptures; because, being a universal philosopher, he included a knowledge of what was poetical. All the poets have had it as a matter of course, more or less; but the greatest most of all. Shakspeare included it, for the very reason that he left no part of the world unsympathized with; namely, that he was of all poets the most universal.

Hyperion's curls; the front of Jove himself;
An eye like Mars to threaten and command;
A station like the herald Mercury,
New lighted on a heaven-kissing hill.

These Miltonic lines flowed from the same pen that recorded the vagaries of Falstaff and Mrs. Quickly. Dr. Johnson would have made a bad business of the Heathen mythology. He did so when he made a Turk pull his enemy out of the "Pleiad's golden chariot." He was conversant only with what is called real life; wonderfully well indeed, and with great wit and good sense; but there he stopped. He might have as soon undertaken to describe a real piece of old poetical beauty, or passion either, as clap his wig on the head of Apollo. He laughed, with reason, at Prior, for comparing his Chloes to Venus and Diana, and talking of their going out a hunting with ivory quivers graceful at their side. This was the French notion of using the Greek Fables; and with the French indeed the Heathen mythology became the most spurious and the most faded of drugs. They might as well have called a box of millinery the oracle of Delphi. The Germans understood it better, but we do not think it has ever been revived to more beautiful account than in the young poetry and remote haunts of imagination, of the late Mr. Keats. He lamented that he could not do it justice. "Oh, how unlike" he cries, speaking of the style of his fine poem, Hyperion,

To that large utterance of the early gods!

But this was the modesty of a real poet. Milton himself would have been happy to read his Hyperion aloud, and to have welcomed the new spirit among the choir of poets, with its

Elysian beauty, melancholy grace.†

Mr. Shelley beautifully applied to his young friend the distich of Plato upon Agathon, who having been, he says, a morning star among the living, was now an evening star in the shades. Here also was the true taste of the antique. Nay, it is possible that the melancholy of modern genius, to the eyes of which a larger and obscurer world has been thrown open, may have discovered a more imaginative character in the mythology of the ancient poets, than accompanies our usual notion of it. The cheerfulness of all those poets, except the dramatic ones, and the everlasting and visible youth of their sculptures, come before us, and make us think of nothing but Pan and Pomona, of Bacchus, Apollo, and the Graces. Nor is it possible to deny that this is the general and perhaps the just impression, though exaggerated; and that the Pythian organ, with all its grandeur, does not roll such peals

Of pomp and threatening harmony‡

as those of the old Gregorian chapels, and the mingling hierarchies of earth and heaven.¶ Unfortunately the grandest parts of all religions have hitherto appealed to the least respectable of our passions,—our fear. It is the beauty of the truly divine part of Christianity that it appeals to love; and if it then inspires melancholy, it is one of a nobler sort, animating us to endeavour, and promising a state of things, to which the grandeur both of Paganism and Catholicism may become as the dreams of remembered sickness in infancy.

At all events it is certain that some of the great modern poets, in consequence of their remoteness from the age of Pagan belief and its every day effect on the mind, often write in a nobler manner upon the Gods of antiquity than the ancients themselves. He that would run the whole round of the spirit of Heathenism to perfection, must become intimate with the poetry of Milton and Spenser; of Ovid, Homer, Theocritus, and the Greek tragedians; with the novels of Wieland, the sculptures of Phidias and others, and the pictures of Raphael, and the Caraccis, and Nicholas Poussin. But a single page of Spenser or one morning at the Angerstein Gallery, will make him better acquainted with it, than a dozen such folios as Spence's Poly-metis, or all the mythologists and book-poets who have attempted to draw Greek inspiration from a Latin fount.

CLOSE OF MAY AND BEGINNING OF JUNE.

THOMSON'S CASTLE OF INDOLENCE.

As our week, this time, consists of half a week in one month, and half in another, the beautiful idea of the poet becomes singularly applicable to it; for it is literally

"A season between June and May,
Half pranked with spring, with summer half imbrown'd."
Castle of Indolence.

What a proper June word is the word imbrown'd! April and May are green months: with June the year begins to be imbrown'd. It was the great Milton, improver alike in small things as in great, in English words as well as English deeds, who brought us this word from Italy. Fa l'imbrunire, say the Italians on the approach of evening,—it browns. Imbrunir veggio la sera. Petrarch,—"I see evening imbrown." But the word is more striking, as applied to the summer foliage—the colour is more decided. And Thomson, we believe, is the first who applied it in that sense. In Milton, as in Petrarch, it only expresses a shadowing:—

And when the sun begins to fling
His flaming beams, me, Goddess, bring
To arched walks of twilight groves
And shadows brown that Sylvan loves.
Penseroso.

Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, and where the unperc'd shade
Imbrow'd the noon-tide bowers.
Paradise Lost, Book 4.

Those are pleasant June pictures. Let us in justice to June and to Thomson, give the whole delightful picture of his scene in the Castle of Indolence.

In lowly dale, fast by a river's side,
With woody hill o'er hill encompass'd round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is no where found.
He was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground;
And there a season between June and May,
Half pranked with spring, with summer half imbrown'd,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, no cared e'en for play.

Was nought around but images of rest,
Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between,
And flowery beds, that slumbrous influence keet
From poppies breath'd, and beds of pleasant green,
Where never yet was creeping creature seen.
Mean time unnumber'd glittering streamlets played,
And hurried every where their waters shewn,
That, as they bicker'd thro' the sunny glade,
The restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made.

Joined to the prattle of the purling rills,
Were heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud bleating from the distant hills,
And vacant shepherds piping in the dale:
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail,
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale;
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep;
Yet all these sounds yblent inclined all to sleep.

Full in the passage of the vale above,
A sable, silent, solemn, forest stood,
Where nought but shadowy forms was seen to move,
As idles fancy'd in her dreaming mood;
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of blackening pines, ay waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror thro' the blood;
And where this valley windeth out, below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard to flow

A pleasing land of drowsy-head it was,
Of dreams that wave before the half shut eye,
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
For ever flashing round a summer sky;
There eke the soft delights, that witchingly
Instill a wanton sweetness thro' the breast,
And the calm pleasures, always hovered nigh;
But whate'er smacked of joyance or unrest
Was far far off expelled from this delicious nest.

But Indolence was the lord of this "delicious nest," and a frightful place he made of it; as the reader may see on turning to the poem. We, however, to wit, the readers and writers of the "London Journal," are an active race, and have a right to "delicious nests," and summer pictures, even of Indolence's own painting, and, therefore, we will enjoy a few more stanzas of this seasonable poem.

Among the inhabitants of the Castle specified by the poet, who are understood to have been friends of his, and whose names, it is to be regretted, have not been all ascertained, there comes for a short time,

A joyous youth, who took you at first sight, and who, though at first very pleasant, ended in keeping the place in a perfect uproar, and depriving the poor luxurious people of their sleep. The poet illustrates him by the following appropriate image:—

As when in prime of June, a burnished fly,
Spring from the meads o'er which he sweeps along,
Cheer'd by the breathing bloom and vital sky,
Tenses up amid these airy balls his song,
Soothing at first the gay repelling throng;
And oft he sips their bowl; or, nearly drowned,
He, thence recovering, drives their beds among,
And scares their tender sleep, with tramp profound,
Then out again he flies to wing his merry round.

Here follow two other guests of Indolence, coming to bask in wild thyme, or brood over their melancholy in groves. The latter portrait (if our memory is not mistaken) is understood to have been intended for Armstrong. It is a pity the former is unknown. It is not unlike Shenstone; but we are not aware that Shenstone was acquainted with Armstrong.

Of all the gentle tenants of the place,
There was a man of special grace and mark:
A certain tender gloom o'erspread his face,
Fensive, not sad; in thought involved, not dark;
And sooth this man could sing as morning lark;
And teach the noblest morals of the heart;
But these his talents were buried stark;
Of the fine stores he nothing would impart,
Which or boon Nature gave, or nature painting Art.

To noontide shades incontinent he ran,
Where purls the brook with sleep-inviting sound,
Or when Dan Sol to slumber his wheels began,
Amid the broom he basked him on the ground,
Where the wild thyme and camomil are found:
There would he linger till the latest ray
Of light sate trembling on the welkin's bound;
Then homeward thro' the twilight shadows stray,
Sauntering and slow; so had he passed many a day.

Yet not in thoughtless slumber were they past;
For oft the heavenly fire, that lay concealed
Beneath the sleeping embers, mounted fast,
And all its native light anew revealed;
Oft as he traversed the cerulean field,
And mark'd the clouds that drove before the wind,
Ten thousand glorious systems would he build,
Ten thousand great ideas fill'd his mind;
But with the clouds they fled, and left no trace behind.

With him was sometimes joined, in silent walk,
(Profoundly silent, for they never spoke)
One shyer still, who quite detested talk;
Oft stung by spleen, at once away he broke,
To groves of pine and broad o'ershadowing oak;
There inly-thrilled, he wandered all alone,
And on himself his pensive fury broke,
Nor utter'd word, save when alone
The glittering star of eve—"Thank heaven! the day is done."

To the second line of the sixty-eighth stanza of the poem, this note is appended: "The following lines of this stanza were writ by a friend of the Author." The friend is said to be Armstrong, and the portrait is that of Thomson himself. We have thus the curious, the very particular, and very pleasant evidence, that Thomson began the portrait with a stroke of personal candour such as would have had a very different grace from the harl of any body but himself, and then suffered the canvass to be filled up by another:—

A bard here dwell, more fat than bard besoms,
Who void of envy, guile, and lust of gain,
On virtue still, and Nature's pleasing themes,
Pour'd forth his unpremeditated strain.
The world forsaking with a calm disdain,
Here laugh'd he, careless in his easy seat;
Here quaff'd, encircled with the joyous strain,
Oft moralizing sage. His duty sweet
He loathed much to write, as cared to repeat.

Ne is the old English word for nor. The poem is written in a strain of reverential mimicry of Spenser; which gives it, like Shenstone's Schoolmistress, a certain exquisiteness of mixed gravity and familiarity; as in the following instance:—

Here ark'd a wretch who had not crept abroad
For forty years, the face of mortal seen;
In chamber brooding like a loathly toad,
And sure his linen was not very clean.

This fellow used to take his dinner

Through secret loop-holes that had practised been,
Near to his bed—

Which, together with his other habits, so disgusted the gentles of the Castle of Indolence, that they fairly summoned up activity enough to drive him out.

Whence from his filthy nook,
We drove the villain out, for fitter air to look.

The closing line of the following extract makes a reader of Spenser laugh, to see how admirably the poet has caught the uncouth yet ingenious manner in which his great original disposes of a difficult rhyme. In place of a newspaper, the Castle had a magic globe in which they could see all that happened out of doors:—

One great amusement of our household was,
In a huge crystal, magic globe to spy,
Still as you turned it, all things that do pass
Upon this anti-hill earth; where constantly
Of idly busy men the restless fry
Ran bustling to and fro with foolish haste,
In search of pleasures vain that from them fly,
Or, which obtained, the callids dare not taste;
When nothing is enjoyed, can there be greater waste?

Of vanity the mirror this was called;
Here you a muchworm of the town might see
At his dull desk, amid his leggers stalled
Ate up with carking care and penurie;
Most like the carcass perched on gallow tree;
"A penny saved is a penny got,"
Firm to this seconded maxim keepeth he,
No of its rigor will he bate a jot
Till it has quenched his fire and banished his pot.

Strait from the Alt of this low grub, behold!
Comes fluttering forth a gaudy spendthrift heir
All glossy gay, enamelled all with gold,
The silly tenant of the summer air.
In folly lost, of nothing takes he care;
Pimps, lawyers, stewards, barlitz, flatterers vile
And thieving tradesmen him among them share;
His father's ghost from Limbo-lake the white
Sees this, which more damnation doth upon him pile.

Since writing these remarks, we have seen Mr. Pickering's Aldine Edition of Thomson, in which the writer of the poet's life tells us, that the sketch of Thomson's own character is asserted to have been supplied by Lord Lyttleton. The person who made the assertion is, however, not mentioned. The same edition furnishes us some letters of Thomson, one of which shews that among the guests in the castle was Mr. Paterson, the poet's deputy and successor in the office of Surveyor General of the Leeward Islands. The passage is curious, in shewing us what a long time the author took to write his indolent poem; as if every thing about it, even the drawl of its composition, should be of a piece:—

"Now that I am prating of myself, know that, after fourteen or fifteen years, the Castle of Indolence comes abroad in a fortnight. It will certainly travel as far as Barbadoes (where Paterson lived). You have an apartment in it as a night-pensioner; which, you may remember, I fitted up for you during our delightful party at North End."

From the words "night-pensioner," we conclude that Paterson was the "joyous youth" above described, who hindered the idlers from sleeping. In another passage of this letter, Thomson makes an allusion to Armstrong, that corroborates the tradition respecting his portrait:—

"Though the Doctor (Dr Armstrong—says a note) increases in business, he does not decrease in spleen, that is both humane and agreeable, like Jacques in the play. I sometimes, too, have a touch of it."

Thomson in the spleen! It must have been of a very particular and "humane" sort indeed—as good as the cheerfulness of most men. In another letter we have a distinct clue to the famous portrait of the little jovial clergyman, whose mouth watered at the sight of beauty. Plenty of the reverend profession, it seems, were occupants of "the land of Drowsyhead."

Full oft by holy feet our ground was trod;
Of clerks good plenty you might here espay.
A little, round, fat, oily man of God
Was one I chiefly marked among the fry:
He had a roguish twinkle in his eye,
And shone all glittering with engodly dew,
If a tight damsel chanced to trippen by:
Which when observed, he shrunk into his mew,
And straight would recollect his piety anew.

"Petty," says Thomson, in a letter to a friend, "came here two or three days ago: I have not yet seen the round man of God to be. He is to be parsonified a few days hence. How a gown and cassock will become him; and with what a holy leer he will edify the devout females! There is no doubt of his having a call, for he is immediately to enter upon a tolerable living. God grant him more, and as fat as himself. It rejoices me to see one worthy, honest, excellent man, raised, at least, to independence."

"Petty," thus spoken of (says a note) was Dr. Patrick Murdoch, the "oily man of God" of the "Castle of Indolence," and one of Thomson's biographers and editors."

We have gone to greater length on this subject than we intended, having merely thought, in the first instance, to quote a passage or two from Thomson's "June and May" poem, in illustration of the pleasures of our week; otherwise we would have made a first article of it, and analysed the whole poem, one of our designs in this Journal being to go through some popular poem with the reader, occasionally; reading it, as it were, in company with him, and making comments as we go. We have said enough, however, we hope, in the present instance, both to give pleasant recollections of the poem to those who are acquainted with it, and to excite a desire for its perusal in those who are not; nor will our random quotations have been unsuitable to such of our readers as may chance to have perused them, lounging in their chairs or lying on the grass, in their intervals of activity during this hot weather.

And this reminds us, that we may as well close our remarks with the hint furnished to invalids and convalescents by the death of this amiable poet, who in his hurry to enjoy nature again after a fit of sickness, forgot that fine evenings in England are apt to be accompanied by dew-falls and east winds. An effeminate carefulness is the last thing that either he or this Journal would inculcate; but proper caution on proper occasions, is a motto adopted by the hardest adventurers, as may be seen in the gallant history of our voyagers to the North Pole.

"It was Thomson's habit to walk from his residence in Kew-lane, near Richmond, whenever the weather rendered going by water ineligible. In one of these journeys from London, he found himself, on reaching Hammersmith, tired and overheated, and he imprudently took a boat to convey him to Kew. The walk from the landing place to his house did not remove the chill which the air on the water produced, and the next day he found himself in a high fever, a state which his plethoric habit rendered alarming. His disorder yielded however, to care and medicine, and he was soon out of danger; but being tempted by a fine evening to expose himself to the dew before he was perfectly restored, a relapse took place, and he was speedily beyond the powers of human aid."

The places of residence or visiting, to which Thomson may be traced, are Kew-lane, or Kew-foot-lane, in Richmond; Lancaster-court, Strand (where he frequented the Lancaster Coffee-house); Old Slaughter's Coffee-house; East Barnet, beyond Finchley; North-end, Fulham; the Mall, Hammersmith; and Eastbury, in Dorsetshire. He was born at Ednam in Roxburghshire, and was at the Edinburgh University. We give a list of these places for the benefit of those readers who may happen to reside or be otherwise interested in them, and who may be fortunate enough to feel an addition to their enjoyments, in the consciousness that a man of genius and goodness has frequented the same spots.

BIRTH DAYS.

Alberoni (Giulio) Cardinal, and prime minister of Spain under the house of Bourbon, was born at Parma, May 28th, (15th old style) in 1664. He was the son of a gardener, and lived to the age of eighty-seven, sound in his faculties to the last. We speak of him in this place, in order to relate a saying of his, remarkable for its address and fine taste. He was a man of vehement temper, as well as open discourse, and told a boy one day, who said he feared something, that he should "fear nothing, not even God himself;" upon which the company looking shocked and astonished to hear such words from the mouth of a cardinal, Alberoni added, with a meek air and a softened voice, "For we are to feel nothing towards the good God, but love."

Sir William Petty, a celebrated statist and mechanical philosopher, born at Rumsey in Hampshire, May 29th (16th old style), 1623. He was the son of a clothier, and was founder of the wealth, perhaps of the talent, of the Lansdowne family, who bear his name, their ancestor, the Earl of Kerry, having married his daughter. Sir William was a sort of admirable Chrich-ton at money-making, and left a curious account of his accomplishments that way. Ambrey, a gossiping biographer, who knew him, says that he had, at one time been a shop-boy; and that while he was studying physic at Paris, he was driven to such straits for a subsistence, that "he lived a week or two on three pennyworths of walnuts." Sir William was a physician, a surveyor, a member of parliament, a timber-merchant, a political writer, a speculator in iron-works, fisheries, and lead-mines; and he wrote Latin verses, and was an active Fellow of the Royal Society. But for the particulars of his money-getting see his will, which is a curious specimen of a man of his sort, not always such a perfection of human wisdom, as he seems to have supposed, but admirable for ingenuity and perseverance. He also appears to have been a wag and a buffoon! He "will preach extempore incomparably," says Aubrey, "either in the presbyterian way, independent, capuchin friar, or jesuit." The same writer tells the following pleasant story of him:

"I consider there was a great difference between him and Sir Throm Sankey, one of Oliver's Knights about 1660. They printed one against the other. The knight had been a soldier, and challenged Sir William to fight with him. Sir William is extremely short-sighted, and being the challengee, it belonged to him to nominate place and weapon. He nominates for the place a dark cellar, and the weapon to be a great carpenter's axe. This turned the knight's challenge into ridicule, and it came to nought."

CUVIER'S THEORY OF THE EARTH.

ABSTRACTED FROM KERR'S TRANSLATIONS OF THAT WORK.

THE past history of the world we live in has always been a subject of curiosity to our kind; particularly perhaps, that portion which is most difficult of investigation, of those times when mankind had not yet peopled the surface of the globe, ere there was any human eye to see, or mind to tell us what was going on in the early days of human existence. Philosophers in all times have busied themselves to satisfy this curiosity. They have, however, rather indulged their imaginations, than used their reason. They rather busied themselves in fancying the plans upon which they might have proposed to work, than by examining existent things, satisfied themselves how they really originated. Each man preconceived his notion of the mode of creation, and then tried to reconcile created things to his theory. Thus much ingenuity was wasted on absurdity; much logic thrown away upon unlogical premises; castles built without even a foundation of air. Even in the later days, when the sciences were becoming fixed, philosophers indulged in these amusing freaks of fancy.

Thus, in the opinion of Burnet, the whole earth at the first consisted of a uniform light crust, which covered over the abyss of the sea, and which, being broken for the production of the deluge, formed the mountains by its fragments. According to Woodward, the deluge was occasioned by a momentary suspension of cohesion among the particles of mineral bodies; the whole mass of the globe was dissolved, and the soft paste became penetrated by shells. Scheuchzer conceived that God raised up the mountains for the purpose of allowing the waters of the deluge to run off, and accordingly selected those portions which contained the greatest abundance of rocks, without which they could not have supported themselves. Whiston fancied that the earth was created from the atmosphere of one comet, and that it was deluged by the tail of another. The heat which remained from its first origin, in his opinion, excited the whole antediluvian population, men and animals, to sin, for which they were all drowned in the deluge, excepting the fish, whose passions were apparently less violent.

Even the great Leibnitz, as well as Descartes, amused his imagination by conceiving the world to be an extinguished sun, or vitrified globe; upon which the vapours condensing in proportion as it cooled, formed the seas, and afterwards deposited calcareous strata.

By Demaillet, the globe was conceived to have been covered with water for many thousand years. He supposed that this water had gradually retired; that all the terrestrial animals were originally inhabitants of the sea; that man himself began his career as a fish; and he asserts that it is not uncommon, even now, to meet with fishes in the ocean, which are still only half men, but whose descendants will in time become perfect human beings.

The system of Buffon is merely an extension of that before devised by Leibnitz, with the addition only of a comet, which, by a violent blow upon the sun, struck off the mass of our earth in a liquified state, along with the masses of all the other planets of our system at the same instant. From this supposition, he was enabled to assume positive dates or epochs; as, from the actual temperature of the earth, it could be calculated how long time it had taken to cool so far. And, as all the other planets had come from the sun at the same time, it could also be calculated how many ages were still required for cooling the greater ones, and how far the smaller ones were already frozen.

In the present day, men of bolder imaginations than ever, have employed themselves on this great subject. Some writers have revived and greatly extended the ideas of Demaillet. They suppose that every thing was originally fluid; that this universal fluid gave existence to animals, which were at first of the simplest kind, such as the monads and other infusory microscopic animalcules; that, in process of time, and by acquiring different habits, the races of these animals became complicated, and assumed that diversity of nature and character in which they now exist. It is by all those races of animals that the waters of the ocean have been gradually converted into calcareous earth; while the vegetables, concerning the origin and metamorphoses of which these authors give us no account, have converted a part of the same water into clay; and these two earths, after being stript of the peculiar characters they had received respectively from animal and vegetable life, are resolved by a final analysis into silex: hence the more ancient mountains are more silicious than the rest. Thus, according to these authors, all the solid particles of our globe owe their existence to animal or vegetable life, and without this our globe would still have continued entirely liquid.

Other writers have preferred the ideas of Kepler, and, like that great astronomer, have considered the globe itself as possessed of living faculties. According to them, it contains a circulating vital fluid. A process of assimilation goes on in it as well as in animated bodies. Every particle of it is alive. It possesses instinct and volition even to the most elementary of its molecules, which attract and repel each other according to sympathies and antipathies. Each kind of mineral substance is capable of converting immense masses of matter into its own peculiar nature, as we convert our aliment into flesh and blood. The mountains are the respiratory organs of the globe, and the schists its organs of secretion. By the latter it decomposes the waters of the sea, in order to produce volcanic eruptions. The veins in strata are canies, or abscesses of the mineral kingdom, and the metals are products of rottenness and disease, to which it is owing that almost all of them have so bad a smell.

It must, however be noticed, that these are what may be termed extreme examples, and that all geologists have not permitted themselves to be carried away by such bold or extravagant conceptions as those we have just cited. Yet, among those who have proceeded with more caution, and have not searched for geological causes beyond the established limits of physical and chemical science, there still remain much diversity and contradiction.

According to one of these writers, every thing has been successively precipitated and deposited, nearly as it exists at present; but the sea, which covered all, has gradually retired.

Another conceives, that the materials of the mountains are incessantly wasted and floated down by the rivers, and carried to the bottom of the ocean, to be there heated under an enormous pressure, and to form strata which shall be violently lifted up at some future period, by the heat that now consolidates and hardens them.

A third supposes the fluid materials of the globe to have been divided among a multitude of successive lakes, placed like the benches of an amphitheatre; which, after having deposited our shelly strata, have successively broken their dikes, to descend and fill the basin of the ocean.

According to a fourth, tides of seven or eight hundred fathoms have carried off from time to time the bottom of the ocean, throwing it up in mountains and hills on the primitive vallies and plains of the continent.

A fifth conceives the various fragments of which the surface of the earth is composed to have fallen successively from heaven, in the manner of meteoric stones, and alleges that they still retain the remarks of their origin in the unknown species of animals whose exuvie they contain.

By a sixth, the globe is supposed to be hollow, and to contain in its cavity a nucleus of loadstone, which is dragged from one pole of the earth to the other by the attraction of comets, changing the centre of gravity, and consequently hurrying the great body of the ocean along with it, so as alternately to drown the two hemispheres.

It was reserved for Cuvier, who to great acuteness and readiness of intellect, added a solid sense, and a faithful reason, to light upon the seemingly obvious plan of judging the creation by its nature; to judge of the past by the present;—in fact, to begin at the right end. Had Cuvier lived in the time of Galileo, he would, like the Florentine, have been put to the torture, for he insisted upon arguing from facts and natural appearances, and would take no evidence but that of his own eyes.

When the traveller passes through those fertile plains where gently flowing streams nourish in their course an abundant vegetation, and where the soil, inhabited by a numerous population, adorned with flourishing villages, opulent cities, and superb monuments, is never disturbed except by the ravages of war and the oppression of tyrants, he is not led to suspect that nature also has had her intestine wars, and that the surface of the globe has been much convulsed by successive revolutions and various catastrophes. But his ideas change as soon as he digs into that soil which presented such a peaceful aspect, or ascends the hills which border the plain.

The lowest and most level parts of the earth, when penetrated to a very great depth, exhibit nothing but horizontal strata composed of various substances, and containing almost all of them innumerable marine productions. Similar strata, with the same kind of productions, compose the hills even to a great height. Sometimes the shells are so numerous as to constitute the entire body of the stratum. They are almost everywhere in such a perfect state of preservation, that even the smallest of them retain their most delicate parts, their sharpest ridges, and their finest and tenderest processes. They are found in elevations far above the level of every part of the ocean, and in places to which the sea could not be conveyed by any existing cause. They are not only inclosed in loose sand, but are often incrustrated and penetrated on all sides by the hardest stones. Every part of the earth, every hemisphere, every continent, every island of any size, exhibits the same phenomenon. We are therefore forcibly led to believe not only that the sea has at one period or another covered all our plains, but that it must have remained there for a long time, and in a state of tranquillity; which circumstance was necessary for the formation of deposits so extensive, so thick, in part so solid, and containing exuvie so perfectly preserved.

The time is past for ignorance to assert that these remains of organized bodies are mere lusus nature,—productions generated in the womb of the earth by its own creative powers. A nice and scrupulous comparison of their forms, of their contexture, and frequently even of their composition, cannot detect the slightest difference between these shells and the shells which still inhabit the sea. They have therefore once lived in the sea, and been deposited by it: the sea consequently must have rested in the places where the deposition has taken place. Hence it is evident that the basin or reservoir containing the sea has undergone some change at least, either in extent, or in situation, or in both. Such is the result of the very first search, and of the most superficial examination.

The traces of revolutions become still more apparent and decisive when we ascend a little higher, and approach nearer to the foot of the great chains of mountains. There are still found many beds of shells; some of these are even larger and more solid; the shells are quite as numerous and as entirely preserved; but they are not of the same species with those which were found in the less elevated regions. The strata which contain them are not so generally horizontal; they have various degrees of inclination, and are sometimes situated vertically. While in the plains and low hills it was necessary to dig deep in order to detect the succession of the strata, here we perceive them by means of the vallies which time or violence has produced, and which disclose their edges to the eye of the observer. At the bottom of these declivities, huge masses of their debris are collected, and form round hills, the height of which is augmented by the operation of every thaw and of every storm.

These inclined or vertical strata, which form the ridges of the secondary mountains, do not rest on the horizontal strata of the hills which are situated at their base, and serve as their first steps; but, on the contrary, are situated underneath them. The latter are placed upon the declivities of the former. When we dig through the horizontal strata in the neighbourhood of the inclined strata, the inclined strata are invariably found below. Nay, sometimes, when the inclined strata are not too much elevated, their summit is surmounted by horizontal strata. The inclined strata are, therefore, more ancient than the horizontal strata. And as they must necessarily have been formed in a horizontal position, they have been subsequently shifted into their inclined or vertical position, and that too before the horizontal strata were placed above them.

Thus the sea, previous to the formation of the horizontal strata, had formed others, which by some means, have been broken, lifted up, and overturned in a thousand ways. There had therefore been also at least one change in the basin of that sea which preceded ours; it had also experienced at least one revolution; and as several of these inclined strata which it had formed first, are elevated above the level of the horizontal strata which have succeeded and which surround them, this revolution, while it gave them their present inclination, had also caused them to project above the level of the sea, so as to form islands, or at least rocks and inequalities; and this must have happened whether one of their edges was lifted above the water, or the depression of the opposite edge caused the water to subside. This is the second result, not less obvious, nor less clearly demonstrated than the first, to every one who will take the trouble of studying carefully the remains by which it is illustrated and proved.

If we institute a more detailed comparison between the various strata and those remains of animals which they contain, we shall soon discover still more numerous differences among them, indicating a proportional number of changes in their condition. The sea has not always deposited stony substances of the same kind. It has observed a regular succession as to the nature of its deposits; the more ancient the strata are, so much the more uniform and extensive are they; and the more recent they are, the more limited are they, and the more variation is observed in them at small distances. Thus the great catastrophes which have produced revolutions in the basin of the sea, were preceded, accompanied, and followed by changes in the nature of the fluid and of the substances which it held in solution; and when the surface of the seas came to be divided by islands and projecting ridges, different changes took place in every separate basin.

Amidst these changes of the general fluid, it must have been almost impossible for the same kind of animals to continue to live:—nor did they do so in fact. Their species, and even their genera, change with the strata; and although the same species occasionally recur at small distances, it is generally the case that the shells of the ancient strata have forms peculiar to themselves; that they gradually disappear, till they are not to be seen at all in the recent strata, still less in the existing seas, in which, indeed, we never discover their corresponding species, and where several even of their genera are not to be found; that, on the contrary, the shells of the recent strata resemble, as it respects the genus, those which still exist in the sea; and that in the last-formed and loosest of these strata there are some species which the eye of the most expert naturalist cannot distinguish from those which at present inhabit the ocean.

In animal nature, therefore, there has been a succession of changes corresponding to those which have taken place in the chemical nature of the fluid; and when the sea last receded from our continent, its inhabitants were not very different from those which it still continues to support.

Finally, if we examine with greater care these remains of organized bodies, we shall discover, in the midst even of the most ancient secondary strata, other strata that are crowded with animal or vegetable productions, which belong to the land and to fresh water: and amongst the more recent strata, that is, the strata which are nearest the surface, there are some of them in which land animals are buried under heaps of marine productions. Thus the various catastrophes of our planet have not only caused the different parts of our continents to rise by degrees from the basin of the sea, but it has also frequently happened, that lands which had been laid dry have been again covered by the water, in consequence either of these lands sinking down below the level of the sea, or of the sea being raised above the level of the lands. The particular portions of the earth also which the sea has abandoned by its last retreat, had been laid dry once before, and had at that time produced quadrupeds, birds, plants, and all kinds of terrestrial production; it had then been inundated by the sea, which has since retired from it, and left it to be occupied by its own proper inhabitants.

The changes which have taken place in the productions of the shelly strata, have not, therefore, been entirely owing to a gradual and general retreat of the waters, but to successive irruptions and retreats, the final result of which, however, has been an universal depression of the level of the sea.

These repeated irruptions and retreats of the sea have been neither slow nor gradual; most of the catastrophes which have occasioned them have been sudden, and this is easily proved, especially with regard to the last of them, the traces of which are most conspicuous. In the northern nations it has left the carcasses of some large quadrupeds, which the ice had arrested, and which are preserved even to the present day, with their skin, their hair, and their flesh. If they had not been frozen as soon as killed, they must quickly have been decomposed by putrefaction. In one case, a rhinoceros, discovered by Mr. Adams on the banks of Jena, the flesh was so well preserved, that it was eaten by dogs. Numberless living beings have been the victims of these catastrophes; some have been destroyed by inundations; others laid dry by the bottom of the seas being instantaneously elevated. Their races have become extinct, and have left no memorial except some small fragments which the naturalist can scarcely recognize. But what is still more astonishing, and not less certain, there have not been always living creatures on the earth; and it is easy for the observer to discover the period at which the animal productions began to be deposited.

As we ascend to higher points of elevation, and advance towards the lofty summits of the mountains, the remains of marine animals, that multitude of shells we have spoken of, begin very soon to grow rare, and at length disappear altogether. We arrive at strata of a different nature, which contain no vestige at all of living creatures. Nevertheless, their crystallization, and even the nature of their strata, show that they also have been formed in a fluid; their inclined position and their slopes show that they also have been moved and overturned; the oblique manner in which they sink under the shelly strata shows that they have been formed before these; and the height to which their bare and rugged tops are elevated above all the shelly strata, shows that their summits have never again been covered by the sea since they were raised up out of its bosom.

Such are those primitive or primordial mountains which traverse our continents in various directions, rising above the clouds, separating the basins of the rivers from one another, serving, by means of their eternal snows, as reservoirs for feeding the springs, and forming in some measure the skeleton, or, as it were, the rough frame-work of the earth.

Their jagged, disorderly shapes are proofs of the violence with which they have been elevated. Yet, amidst all their confusion, some naturalists have thought that they perceived a certain degree of order prevailing, and that among these immense beds of rock, broken and overturned though they be, a regular succession is observed, which is nearly the same in all the different chains of mountains. According to them, the granite, which surmounts every other rock; and is the most ancient of any that has yet been discovered in the place assigned it by nature. The central ridges of most of the mountain chains are composed of it; slaty rocks, such as clay slates, granular quartz (Grès), and mica slate, rest upon upon its sides and form lateral chains; granular, foliated limestone, or marble, and other calcareous rocks that do not contain shells, rest upon the slate, forming the exterior ranges, and are the last formations by which this ancient uninhabited sea seems to have prepared itself for the production of its beds of shells.

On all occasions, even in districts that lie at a distance from the great mountain chains, where the more recent strata have been digged through, and the external covering of the earth penetrated to a considerable depth, nearly the same order of stratification has been found as that already described. The crystallized marbles never cover the shelly strata; the granite in mass never rests upon the crystallized marble, except in a few places where it seems to have been formed of granites newer epochs. In one word, the foregoing arrangement appears to be general, and must therefore depend upon general causes, which have on all occasions exerted the same influence from one extremity of the earth to the other.

Hence, it is impossible to deny, that the waters of the sea have formerly, and for a long time, covered those masses of matter which now constitute our highest mountains; and farther, that these waters, during a long time, did not support any living bodies. Thus, it has not been only since the commencement of animal life that these numerous changes and revolutions have taken place in the constitution of the external covering of our globe. For the masses formed previous to that event have suffered changes, as well as those which have been formed since; they have also suffered violent changes in their positions, and a part of these assuredly took place while they existed alone, and before they were covered over by the shelly masses. The proof of this lies in the overturnings, the disruptions, and the fissures which are observable in their strata, as well as those of more recent formation, which are there even in greater number and better defined.

But these primitive masses have also suffered other revolutions, posterior to the formation of the secondary strata, and have, perhaps, given rise to, or at least have partaken of, some portion of the revolutions and changes which these latter strata have experienced. There are actually considerable portions of the primitive strata uncovered, although placed in lower situations than many of the secondary strata; and we cannot conceive how it should have so happened, unless the primitive strata, in these places, had forced themselves into view, after the formation of those which are secondary. In some countries, we find numerous and prodigiously large blocks of primitive substances scattered over the surface of the secondary strata, and separated by deep valleys from the peaks or ridges whence these blocks have been derived. It is necessary, therefore, either that these blocks must have been thrown into those situations by means of eruptions, or that the valleys, which otherwise must have stopped their course, did not exist at the time of their being transported to their present sites.

The nature of many agents in these changes it is now impossible to determine. There still exist, however, four causes in full activity, which contribute to make alterations on the surface of our earth. These are rains and thaws, which waste down the steep mountains, and occasion their fragments to collect at their bottoms; streams of water, which sweep away these fragments, and afterwards deposit them in places where their current is abated; the sea, which undermines the foundations of elevated coasts, forming steep cliffs in their places, and which throws up hillocks of sand upon flat coasts; and, finally, volcanoes, which pierce through the most solid strata from below, and either elevate or scatter abroad the vast quantity of matter which they eject.

The rains which fall upon the ridges and summits of the mountains, the vapours which are condensed there, and the snow which is melted, descend by an infinite number of rills along their slopes, carrying off some portions of the materials of which these ridges and summits are composed, and marking their courses by numerous gutters. In their progress downwards, these small rills soon unite in the deeper furrows with which the surface of all mountains is ploughed up, run off through the deep valleys which intersect the bottoms of the mountains, and at length form the streams and rivers which restore to the sea the waters that it had formerly supplied to the atmosphere.

When the snow melts, or when a storm takes place, these mountain torrents become suddenly swelled, and rush down the declivities with a violence and rapidity proportioned to their steepness: they dash against the feet of these taluses of fallen fragments which form the sides of all the elevated valleys, carrying along with them the rounded fragments of which they are composed, which become smoothed and still farther polished by rubbing on each other. But, in proportion as the swollen torrents reach the more level valleys, and the force of their current is diminished, or when they arrive at more expanded basins which allow their waters to spread out, they then throw out on their banks the largest of these stones which they had rolled down: the smaller fragments are deposited still lower; and, in general, nothing reaches the great canal of the river except the minutest fragments, or the impalpable particles, which afterwards subside to form mud. It often happens also, before these streams unite to form great rivers, that they have to pass through large and deep lakes, where they deposit the mud brought down from the mountains, and whence their waters flow out quite limpid.

The rivers in lower levels, and all the streams which take their rise in lower mountains or hills, produce effects on the grounds through which they flow, more or less analogous to those of the torrents from the higher mountains. When swelled by great rains, they undermine the bottoms of the earthy or sandy hills which lie in their way, and carry their fragments to be deposited on the lower grounds which they inundate, and which are somewhat raised in height by each successive inundation. Finally, when these rivers reach the great lakes, or the sea, and when of course that rapid motion by which they are enabled to keep the particles of mud in suspension has wholly ceased, these particles are deposited at each side of their mouths, where they form low grounds, by which the coasts or banks of the river are gradually lengthened out into the sea or lake. And if these new coasts are so situated that the sea also throws up sand to contribute towards their increase, provinces, and even entire kingdoms, are thus as it were created, which usually become the richest and most fertile regions, if their rulers permit human industry to exert itself in peace.

The effects produced by the sea alone, without the aid of rivers, are far less beneficial. When the sea coast is low, and the bottom consists of sand, the waves push this sand towards the shore, where at every reflux of the tide it becomes partially dried; and the winds, which almost always blow from the sea, drift up some portion of it on the beach. By this means, dunes, or ranges of low sand hills, are formed along the coast. These, if not fixed by the growth of suitable plants, either disseminated by nature, or propagated by human industry, would be gradually, but certainly carried towards the interior, covering up the fertile plains with their sterile particles, and rendering them unfit for the habitation of mankind; because the same winds which carried the loose dry sand from the shore to form the dunes, would necessarily continue to drift that which is at the summit farther towards the land.

On the other hand, when the original coast happens to be high, so that the sea is unable to cast up any thing upon it, a gradual, but destructive operation is carried on in a different way. The incessant agitation of the waves wears it away at the bottom, and at length succeeds in undermining it, causing the upper materials to slide and tumble down, and converting the whole elevation into steep sloping buffs or cliffs. In the progress of this change, the more elevated materials which tumble down into the sea, have their softer parts washed out and carried away by the waves; while the harder parts, continually rolled about in the agitated water, form vast collections of rounded stones and pebbles, and of sand of various degrees of fineness, which at length accumulate into sloping banks or flat beaches, and protect the bottoms of the cliffs against further depredations.

The importance of investigating the relations of extraneous fossils with the strata in which they are contained is quite obvious. It is to them alone that we owe the commencement even of a Theory of the Earth, as, but for them, we could never have even suspected that there had existed any successive epochs in the formation of our earth, and a series of different and consecutive operations in reducing it to its present state. By them alone we are enabled to ascertain, with the utmost certainty, that our earth has not always been covered over by the same external crust; because we are thoroughly assured that the organized bodies to which these fossils remain belong must have lived upon the surface, before they came to be buried, as they now are, at a great depth. It is only by means of analogy, that we have been enabled to extend to the primitive formations, the same conclusions which are furnished directly for the secondary formations by the extraneous fossils; and if there had only existed formations or strata in which there were no extraneous fossils, it could never have been asserted that these several formations had not been simultaneous.

It is also owing to these extraneous fossils, slight as is the knowledge we have hitherto acquired respecting them, that we have been enabled to discover the little that we yet know concerning the revolutions of our globe. From them we have learned, that the strata, or at least those which contain their remains, have been quietly deposited in a fluid; that the variations of the several strata must have corresponded with the variations in the nature of the fluid; that they have been left bare by the transportation of this fluid to some other place; and that this fact must have happened more than once. Nothing of all this could have been known with certainty, without the aid of extraneous fossils.

The study of the mineralogical part of geology, though not less necessary, and even a great deal more useful to the practical arts, is yet much less instructive so far as respects the objects of our present enquiry. We remain in utter ignorance respecting the causes which have given rise to the variety in the mineral substances of which the strata are composed. We are ignorant even of the agents which may have held some of these substances in a state of solution; and it is still disputed respecting several of them, whether they have owed their origin to the agency of water or of fire. After all, philosophers are only agreed on one point, which is, that the sea has changed its place; and this could never have been certainly known, but for the existence of extraneous fossils. These fossils, then, which have given rise to the theory of the earth, have at the same time furnished its principal illustrations—the only ones, indeed, that have as yet been generally received and acknowledged.

It is obvious, that among animal remains, the study of land quadrupeds must lead to the most decided conclusions, since their race is so much better known than marine animals; and among land animals, quadrupeds, from their size, are best known of all. To the remains of the larger animals therefore, do we look for the clearest index of time and its changes.

Naturalists certainly have not explored all the continents; nor are the discoveries yet completed of the different species of animals. It therefore may be alleged that the fossil remains may belong to some yet undiscovered remains of still existent animals. A little consideration will, however, show this to be unfounded. Islands of a moderate size, and at a distance from continents, usually have none but a few small quadrupeds.

It is true that the great continents have large quadrupeds, and generally speaking, contain species proper to each. If, therefore, any new continent remained to be discovered, we might expect to find unknown species of animals. A glance at the map will prove that this is not the case, unless it be at the antarctic pole, where eternal ice necessarily forbids the existence of animal life. Doubtless, European travellers cannot easily penetrate through vast extents of countries which are either uninhabited, or peopled only with ferocious tribes; and this is peculiarly the case in regard to Africa. But there is nothing to prevent the animals themselves from roaming in all directions, and penetrating to the coasts. Even although great chains of mountains may intervene between the coasts and the interior deserts, these must certainly be broken in some parts to allow the rivers to come through; and in these burning deserts the animals naturally follow the courses of the rivers. The inhabitants of the coasts must also frequently penetrate inland along the rivers, and will quickly acquire a knowledge of all the remarkable living creatures, even to the very sources of these rivers, either from personal observation, or by intercourse with the inhabitants of the interior. At no period of our history, therefore, could civilized nations frequent the coasts of large countries for any length of time, without gaining some tolerable knowledge of all the animals they contained, or at least of such as were any way remarkable for their size or configuration. This reasoning is supported by well-known facts. Thus, although the ancients seem never to have passed the mountains of Iamus, or to have crossed the Ganges towards the east of Asia, and never penetrated far to the south of Mount Atlas in Africa, yet they were acquainted with all the larger animals of these two grand divisions of the world; and if they have not distinguished all their species, it was because the similarities of these occasioned them to be founded together, and not because they had not seen them, or heard them talked of by others.

The ancients know all the larger quadrupeds. Aristotle's descriptions of the elephant is more exact than Buffon's. They were familiar with the rhinoceros; knew the hippopotamus, both species of camel, and the giraffe, or cameleopard. In short, more or less of all the species with which we are acquainted in the present day in the old world. They describe them too, where the opportunities are equal, precisely as we do. Consequently, there has been no gradual change in animal nature.

After all that has been said, it is quite impossible to conceive that the enormous mastodontes and gigantic megatheria, whose bones have been discovered under ground in North and South America, can still exist alive in that quarter of the world. They could not fail to be observed by the hunting tribes, which continually wander in all directions through the wilds of America. Indeed, they themselves seem to be fully aware that these animals no longer exist in their country, as they have invented a fabulous account of their destruction, alleging that they were all killed by the Great Spirit, to prevent them from extirpating the human race. It is quite obvious, that this fable has been invented subsequently to the discovery of the bones; just as the inhabitants of Siberia have contrived one respecting the mammoth, whose bones have been found in that country, alleging that it still lives underground like the mole; and just as the ancients had their fables about the graves of giants, who were thought to have been buried wherever the bones of elephants happened to be dug up.

From all these considerations it may be safely concluded, as shall be more minutely explained in the sequel,—That if none of the large species of quadrupeds, whose remains are now found imbedded in regular rocky strata, are at all similar to any of the known living species. That this circumstance is by no means the mere effect of chance, or because the species to which these fossil bones have belonged are still concealed in the desert and uninhabited parts of the world, and have hitherto escaped the observation of travellers; but, that this astonishing phenomenon has proceeded from general causes, and that the careful investigation of it affords one of the best means for discovering and explaining the nature of these causes.

Every organized individual forms an entire system of its own, all the parts of which mutually correspond, and concur to produce a certain definite purpose, by reciprocal reaction, or by combining towards the same end. Hence none of these separate parts can change their forms without a corresponding change on the other parts of the same animal, and consequently each of these parts taken separately, indicates all the other parts to which it has belonged. Thus, if the viscera of an animal are so organized as only to be fitted for the digestion of recent flesh, it is also requisite that the jaws should be so constructed as to fit them for devouring prey; the claws must be constructed for seizing and tearing it to pieces; the teeth for cutting and dividing its flesh; the entire system of the limbs, or organs of motion, for pursuing and overtaking it; and the organs of sense, for discovering it at a distance.

In like manner, each minute part of each individual animal must correspond to its nature, wants, and habits; and, as a part, to the whole frame of the animal. So universal is this arrangement, that if one animal resembles another in a part, it also does in the whole, and in its nature and habits. With this in view, Cuvier made diligent studies among existing animals, comparing their forms with their habits, in order to deduce the habits and natures of fossil animals from the forms of those parts which have been preserved.

In this manner we have ascertained and classified the fossil remains of seventy-eight different quadrupeds, in the viviparous and oviparous classes. Of these forty-nine are distinct species hitherto entirely unknown to naturalists. Eleven or twelve others have such entire resemblance to species already known, as to leave no doubts whatever of their identity; and the remaining sixteen or eighteen have considerable traits of resemblance to known species, but the comparison of these has not yet been made with so much precision as to remove all dubiety.]

Of the forty-nine new or hitherto unknown species, twenty-seven are necessarily referable to seven new genera; while the other twenty-two new species belong to sixteen genera, or sub-genera, already known. The whole number of genera and sub-genera to which the fossil remains of quadrupeds hitherto investigated are referable, are thirty-six, including those belonging both to known and unknown species.

The most important consideration, that which has been the chief object in M. Cuvier's researches, and which constitutes their legitimate connection with the theory of the earth, is to ascertain the particular strata in which each of the species was found, and to enquire if any of the general laws could be ascertained, relative either to the zoological subdivisions, or to the greater or less resemblance between these fossil species and those which still exist upon the earth.

The laws already recognised with respect to these relations are very distinct and satisfactory.

It is, in the first place, clearly ascertained, that the oviparous quadrupeds are found considerably earlier, or in more ancient strata, than those of the viviparous class. Thus the crocodiles of Honfleur and of England are found underneath the chalk. The monitors of Thuringia would be still more ancient, if, according to the Wernerian school, the copper-slate in which they are contained, along with a great number of fishes supposed to have belonged to fresh water, is to be placed among the most ancient strata of the secondary formations. The great alligators, or crocodiles, and the tortoises of Maestricht, are found in the chalk formations; but these are both marine animals.

The earliest appearance of fossil bones seems to indicate, that dry lands and fresh waters must have existed before the formation of the chalk strata. Yet neither at that early epoch, nor during the formation of the chalk strata, nor even for a long period afterwards, do we find any fossil remains of mammiferous land-quadrupeds.

We begin to find the bones of mammiferous sea-animals, namely, of the lamantin and of seals, in the coarse shell limestone which immediately covers the chalk strata in the neighbourhood of Paris. But no bones of mammiferous land-quadrupeds are to be found in that formation; and, notwithstanding the most careful investigations, Cuvier was never able to discover the slightest traces of this class, except in the formations which lie over the coarse lime-stone strata; but immediately on reaching these more recent formations, the bones of land-quadrupeds are discovered in great abundance.

As it is reasonable to believe that shells and fish did not exist at the period of the formation of the primitive rocks, we are also led to conclude that the oviparous quadrupeds began to exist along with the fishes, and at the commencement of the period which produced the secondary formations; while the land-quadrupeds did not appear upon the earth till long afterwards, and until the coarse shell limestone has been already deposited, which contains the greater part of our genera of shells, although of quite different species from those that are now found in a natural state.

It is remarkable that those coarse limestone strata, which are chiefly employed at Paris for building, are the last formed strata which indicate a long and quiet continuance of the water of the sea above the surface of our continent. Above them, indeed, there are found formations containing abundance of shells and other productions of the sea; but these consist of alluvial materials, sand, marl, sandstone, or clay, which rather indicate transportations that have taken place with some degree of violence, than strata formed by quiet depositions; and where some regular rocky strata, of considerable extent and thickness, appear above or below these alluvial formations, they generally bear the marks of having been deposited from fresh water.

All the known specimens of the bones of viviparous land-quadrupeds, have either been found in these formations from fresh water, or in the alluvial formations; whence there is every reason to conclude that these animals have only begun to exist, or at least to leave their remains in the strata of our earth, since the last retreat of the sea but one, and during that state of the world which preceded its last irruption.

There is also a derterminate order observable in the disposition of these bones in regard to each other, which indicates a very remarkable succession in the appearance of the different species. All the genera which are now unknown, as the palæotheria, anaplotheria, &c. with the localities of which we are thoroughly acquainted, are found in the most ancient of those formations of which we are now treating, or those which are placed directly over the coarse limestone strata. It is chiefly they which occupy the regular strata that have been deposited from fresh water, or certain alluvial beds of every ancient formation, generally composed of sand and rounded pebbles; which were perhaps the earliest alluvial formations of the ancient world. Along with these there are also found some lost species of known genera, but in small numbers; together with some oviparous quadrupeds and some fish, which appear to have been inhabitants of fresh water. The strata containing these are always more or less covered with alluvial formations, filled with shells and other productions of the sea.

The most celebrated of the unknown species belonging to known genera, or to genera nearly allied to those that are known, as the fossil elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and mastodon, are never found along with the more ancient genera; but are only contained in alluvial formations, sometimes along with sea shells, and sometimes with fresh-water shells, but never in regular rocky strata. Every thing found along with these species is either, like them, unknown, or at least doubtful.

Lastly, the bones of species which are apparently the same with those that still exist alive, are never found except in the very latest alluvial depositions, or those which are either formed on the sides of rivers, or on the bottoms of ancient lakes or marshes now dried up, or in the substance of beds of peat, or in the fissures and caverns of certain rocks, or at small depths below the present surface, in places where they may have been overwhelmed by debris, or even buried by man: And, although these bones are the most recent of all, they are almost always, owing to their superficial situation, the worst preserved.

An objection has been made to which we have before alluded; that the present existing species of Mammalia, may be but modifications of the remains we now find in a fossil state. If the species have changed by degrees as we may assume, we ought to find traces of this gradual modification, some intermediate condition. This, however, is not the case. It may therefore be concluded that both ancient and existing species were permanent and distinct. In addition to this, as we have before stated, as long as animals have been described, they have not varied. When we endeavour to prove that the rocky strata contain the long remains of several genera, and the loose strata those of several species, all of which are not now existing animals on the face of the globe, it is not pretended that a new creation was required for calling our present races of animals into existence. It is only urged that they did not anciently occupy the same places, and that they must have come from some other part of the globe. Let us suppose, for instance, that a prodigious inroad of the sea were now to cover the continent of New Holland with a coat of sand and other earthly materials; this would necessarily bury the carcasses of many animals belonging to the genera of kangaroo, phascogale, dasyurus, peromela, lying-phalangera, echidna, and ornithorhynchus, and would consequently entirely extinguish all the species of all these genera, as not one of them is to be found in any other country. Were the same revolution to lay dry the numerous narrow straits which separate New Holland from New Guinea, the Indian islands, and the continent of Asia, a road would be opened for the elephant, rhinoceroses, buffaloes, horses, camels, tigers, and all the other Asiatic animals, to occupy a land in which they are hitherto unknown. Were some future naturalist, after becoming well acquainted with the living animals of that country in this supposed new condition, to search below the surface on which these animals were nourished, he would then discover the remains of quite different races.

What New Holland would then be, under these hypothetical circumstances, Europe, Siberia, and a large portion of America, actually now are. Perhaps hereafter, when other countries shall be investigated, and New Holland among the rest, they also may be found to have all undergone similar revolutions, and perhaps may have made reciprocal changes of animal productions. If we push the former supposition somewhat farther, and, after the supply of Asiatic animals to New Holland, admit that a subsequent catastrophe might overwhelm Asia, the primitive country of the migrated animals, future geologists and naturalists would perhaps be equally at a loss to discover whence the then living animals of New Holland had come, as we now are to find out the original habitations of our present fossil animals.

It is quite undeniable that no human bones have been hitherto discovered among the extraneous fossil remains, properly so called, and this furnishes a strong proof that the extinct races which are now in a fossil state, were not varieties of the known species, since they never could have been subject to human influence. The bones so often asserted to be human among the true fossil, never stand the test of rigid examination. Petrifications, which have been discovered, have always proved referable to local causes. Yet human bones preserve equally well with those of animals, when placed in the same circumstances. M. Cuvier has picked up from the excavation made in the ancient church of St. Geneveve, human bones that had been interred below the remains of the first race, and which may even have belonged to some princes of the family of Clovis, and which still retain their forms very perfectly. We do not find in ancient fields of battle, that the skeletons of men are more wasted than those of horses, except in so far as they may be influenced by size; and we find among extraneous fossils the bones of animals as small as rats, perfectly well preserved; nor is there any observable difference in this respect in the mummies of Egypt, between the men and the quadrupeds.

Every circumstance, therefore, contributes to establish this position,—That the human race did not exist in the countries in which the fossil bones of animals have been discovered, at the epoch when these bones were covered up; as there cannot be a single reason assigned why men should have entirely escaped from such general catastrophes; or, if they also had been destroyed and covered over at the same time, why their remains should not be now found along with those of the other animals. I do not presume, however, to conclude that man did not exist at all before these epochs. He may have then inhabited some narrow regions, whence he went forth to re-people the earth of the cessation of these terrible revolutions and overwhelmings. Perhaps even the places which he then inhabited may have been sunk into the abyss, and the bones of that destroyed human race may yet remain buried under the bottom of some actual seas; all except a small number of individuals who were destined to continue the species.

However this may have been, the establishment of mankind in those countries in which the fossil bones of land animals have been found, that is to say, in the greatest part of Europe, Asia and America, must necessarily have been posterior not only to the revolutions which covered up these bones, but also to those other revolutions, by which the strata containing the bones have been laid bare. Hence it clearly appears, that no argument for the antiquity of the human race in those countries can be founded either upon these fossil bones, or upon the more or less considerable collections of rocks or earthy materials by which they are covered.

On the contrary, by a careful investigation of what has taken place on the surface of the globe, since it has been laid dry for the last time, and its continents have assumed their present form, at least in such parts as are somewhat elevated above the level of the ocean, it may be clearly seen that this last revolution and consequently the establishment of our existing societies, could not have been very ancient. This result is one of the best established, and least attended to in rational zoology; and it is so much the more valuable, as it connects natural and civil history together in one uninterrupted series.

It is to be remarked, that every where the traditional histories, fix the date of the last revolution about the same period, viz. five or six thousand years back. The early histories of the Chinese, upon which they so much pride themselves, bear evidence of a much later invention than they would allow.

M. Cuvier's deduction from these premises is this:—

That if there is any circumstance thoroughly established in geology, it is, that the crust of our globe has been subjected to a great and sudden revolution, the epoch of which cannot be dated much farther back than five or six thousand years ago; that this revolution had buried all the countries which were before inhabited by men and by the other animals that are now best known; that the same revolution had laid dry the bed of the last ocean, which now forms all the countries at present inhabited; that the small number of individuals of men and other animals that escaped from the effects of that great revolution, have since propagated and spread over the lands then newly laid dry; and consequently, that the human race has only resumed a progressive state of improvement since that epoch, by forming established societies, raising monuments, collecting natural facts, and constructing systems of science and of learning.

Yet farther,—That the countries which are now inhabited, and which were laid dry by this last revolution, had been formerly inhabited at a more remote era, if not by man, at least by land animals; that, consequently, at least one previous revolution had submerged them under the waters and that, judging from the different orders of animals of which we discover the remains in a fossil state, they had probably experienced two or three irruptions of the sea.

PAGANINI.

[To the Editor of the London Journal.]

Sir, these lines on Paganini, If it should be quite convenient, put them in your Magazine.

Paganini, Paganini!

Never was there such a genius before as Paganini.

Though his figure's lank and leany, I'd give something to have been he.

Though he is a little mean, he Still, you know, is Paganini.

Like rich vallies, fresh and greeny,

Nothing's seen of the machinery of art in Paganini.

From the first set off al fine,

Nature's all to Paganini.

MELIBRUS

TURPIN'S RIDE TO HOUGH GREEN.

BY WHICH HE PROVED HIS FAMOUS ALIBI AND SAVED HIS LIFE.

[From the new novel of Rookwood, a work with considerable evidences of power, but exaggerated and diffuse. When the author has learnt "the art to blot," and above all, when he has had a little more care and trouble to break into the smooth outline of his youth and satisfaction, and not render it necessary to have nine horrors at a time, in order to give him a sensation, he will become an excellent writer.]

"You are off, I understand, to Yorkshire to-night, Dick—upon my soul you are a wonderful fellow—an alibi personified!—here and there and every where at one at the same time—no wonder you are called the flying highwayman. To-day in town—to-morrow at York—the day after at Chester. The devil only knows where you will pitch your quarters a week hence—neither beak nor trap can have a chance of guessing. There are rumours of you in all counties at the same moment. This man swears you robbed him at Hounslow—that, on Salisbury Plain—while another swears you monopolize Cheshire and Yorkshire, and that it isn't safe even to hunt without pogs in your pocket. I heard some devilish good stories of you at D'Osyndar's 'other day; the fellow who told them to me little thought I was a brother blade."

"You flatter me," said Dick, smiling complacently, "but it's no merit of mine. Black Bess alone enables me to do it, and hers be the credit. Talking of being everywhere at the same time, you shall hear what she once did for me in Cheshire. Meantime a glass to the best mare in England—you won't refuse that toast, Tom. Ah! if your mistress was only as true to you as my nag to me, you might set at nought the tightest hempen cravat that ever was twisted, and defy your best friend to hurt you.—Black Bess! and God bless her. And now for the song." Saying which, with much emotion, he chaunted the following rhymes:

BLACK BESS.

Let the lover his mistress's beauty rehearse,
And land her attractions in inglishing verse;
Be it mine in rude strains, and in frank to express,
The love that I bear to my bonny Black Bess.

From the west was her dam, from the east was her sire,
From the one came her swiftness, the other her fire;
No peer of the realm better blood can possess,
Than flows in the veins of my bonny Black Bess!

Look! look! how that eyeball grows bright as a brand!
That neck proudly arches, those nostrils expand!
Mark! that wide-flowing mane! of which each silky tress
Might adorn prouder beauties—though none like Black Bess.

Mark! that skin sleek as velvet, and dusky as night,
With its jet undisfigured by one lock of white;
That throat branched with veins, prompt to charge or caress;
Now is she not beautiful—bonny Black Bess.

Over highway and byway, in rough and smooth weather,
Some thousands of miles have we journeyed together;
Our couch the same straw, and our meal the same mess,
No couple more constant than I and Black Bess.

By moonlight, in darkness, by night or by day,
Her headlong career there is nothing can stay.
She cares not for distance—she knows not distress—
Can you show me a charger to match with Black Bess?

"Egad, I should think not," exclaimed King; "you are as sentimental on the subject of your mare, as I am when I think of my darling Susan—but I beg pardon for my interruption—pray proceed."

"Let me first clear my throat" returned Dick, "and now to resume—"

Once it happened in Cheshire, near Durham, I popped
On a horseman alone, whom I speedily stopped;
That I lightened his pockets you'll readily guess—
Quick work makes Dick Turpin when mounted on Bess.

Now it seems the man knew me; "Dick Turpin," said he,
"You shall swing for this job, as you live, d'ye see;"
I laughed at his threats, and his vows of redress,
I was sure of an alibi then with Black Bess.

The road was a hollow, a suken ravine,*
Overshadowed completely by wood like a screen;
I clambered the bank, and I needs must confess
That one touch of the spur grazed the side of Black Bess.

Stepping carelessly forward, I lounged on the green,
Taking excellent care that by all I am seen,
Some remarks on Time's flight, to the squire I address,
But I say not a word of the flight of Black Bess;

I mention the hour—it was 'bout four—
Play a rubber at bowls—think the danger is o'er,
When athwart my next game, like a checkmate at chess,
Comes the horseman in search of the rider of Bess.

What matter details! Off with triumph I came,
He swears to the hour—and the squire swears the same,
I had robbed him at four—while at four they profess
I was quietly bowling—all thanks to Black Bess.

Then one halloo, boys—one loud cheering halloo—
To the swiftest of couriers—the gallant, the true;
For the sportsman unborn shall the memory bless,
Of the horse of the highwayman, bonny Black Bess!

* The exact spot where Turpin committed this well-known robbery, and which has been pointed out to us, lies in what is now a woody hollow, though once the old road from Altringham to Knutsford, skirting the rich and sylvan domains of Durham, and descending the hill which brings you to the bridge crossing the river Bellin. With some little difficulty we penetrated this ravine; it is just the locality for such an adventure. A small brook wells through it, and the steep banks are overhung with every description of timber; and were, the other day, a perfect nest of primroses and wild flowers. Hough (pronounced Hoo) Green lies, we believe, at about three miles distance across the country—the way Turpin rode. The old bowling-green is one of the pleasantest inns in Cheshire.

IZAIAH WALTON, AND ANGLING.

[To the Editor of the London Journal.]

Sir,

I have no other biography of Walton at hand, but that in Mr. Major's edition of the "Complete Angler," and do not know whether the epitaph I am about to copy has appeared in print. Mr. M. has not noticed it, and at all events it may not be too familiar to be interesting to some of your readers. It is an inscription on a tablet in the chancel of Worcester cathedral, and appears to me, with a little quaintness, to be in a style of touching simplicity, worthy of honest Izaak.

M. S.

Here lieth buried so much as could die of

ANNE, THE WIFE OF IZAIAH WALTON,
A woman of remarkable prudence, and of a primitive piety; her great and general knowledge being adorned with such true humility, and chastened with so much Christian meekness, as made her worthy of a more memorable monument.

She died (alas, that she is dead!) the 17th of April, 1662, aged 53.

Study to be like her.

While on this subject, perhaps I may be allowed to add, that on renewing my acquaintance with the fine monument of Bishop Slough in the same place, I felt more strongly than ever that Mr. Alan Cunningham's admiration of the severe beauty of ancient art, had made him somewhat unjust to the genius of Roubiliac. It is said that Canova made a journey to Worcester, on purpose to see this work, (which Mr. C. has not noticed at all in his "Lives,") and recorded his admiration of its merits in very high terms. In poetry, both of design and expression, I do not know where to find many of its equals in modern sculpture.

Yours obediently,

E. M.

An old reader and admirer under all your phases.

We are obliged to our correspondent, and unite with him in his love of good epitaphs and sculpture, by whomsoever produced; but in these days of general search into what is best for all creatures, great and small, we cannot pass over the name of Walton without observing, that with all our regard for some passages of his book, and no wish whatsoever to lay a common amusement to the account of a greater want of feeling in him than is necessary, we cannot call to mind that venerable, but most unscrupulous and conscious employer of worms upon his hook, without having our sense of the extraordinary "benevolence" of anglers and their pastime rendered very extraordinary indeed. We hate "pretences" to feeling, and grant that anglers may have much to which they do not pretend; but why do they pretend to more than other people, and at the same time hazard cruelties (to say the least of it) which other lovers of quiet and the country find much more inconsistent than compatible with their boasted "peace," and "innocence," and contemplative enjoyment? A very clever book, elegantly got up and embellished, has lately been published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, called "Recollections of Fly-fishing." The author undertakes to answer objections to his amusement, but like the rest of his brethren, there are points he is either not aware of, or does not choose to touch. His fish are not so lucky. We should like, in all fairness and good humour, to discuss the question with any angler, in two or three articles of reasonable size, as comprehensive as both parties could make them.

TABLE TALK.

Curious Ancient Boat.—There was a kind of vessel much in use among the ancient Egyptians, named Baris; these vessels had sails of byblus, but required a strong breeze to impel them against the Nile: they, however, descended the river with ease, without sails, their course being hastened by a peculiar contrivance. A sort of wooden gate was constructed, to one end of which a certain weight was attached, and the whole apparatus was fastened by a cord to the head of the baris. When all was ready, the gate was thrown into the water, one end of which sank, whilst the other was kept up by the cord; a large surface was thus exposed to the current, which hurried it rapidly forward, and the baris followed. At the same time, another rope, with a large stone at the end of it, was thrown out from the stern; and this last weight, sinking to the bottom, served to steady the vessel and keep it straight.—Romance of Ancient History.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have been thinking of some plan which might enable us to make due acknowledgements to our correspondents, without taking up more of our time and room than they themselves, as general readers, would approve. It is difficult; for we wish to do justice to all their communications; and we find some such plan necessary, both to the acknowledgement of their kindness, and the satisfaction of our own feelings. We cannot receive so many and such increasing proofs of good-will without an extreme desire to requite them. The course of a week, however, or of two at most, will, we trust, enable us to come to some satisfactory conclusion on the matter; and meantime we hope they will accept this notice as a proof that we have not been so inconsiderate as some of them might reasonably suppose.

LITERARY CRITICISMS.

"These beautiful miniature volumes claim our unqualified praise. Their descriptions and indications are all that we need from such a medium of information; and their innumerable woodcuts, so far as we can discover, are quite as efficient illustrations of what they are drawn from as the most elaborate and costly engravings."—Court Journal.

Of their kind we know of nothing to compare with them; and if the large sum (not less we are assured, than six thousand pounds) which has been expended on them, do not command a corresponding degree of public patronage to the spirited exertions of the proprietor, the public deserves to be its own guide for the future."—Atlas.

NOTICE.

In offering this Library to the British public, the Proprietors beg to remark that they have been induced to enter upon its publication partly in consequence of the extraordinary success which has attended the "Bibliothèque," published by the above celebrated men in France, but principally from the conviction of the necessity of a similar work in England. Knowledge has been called the key-stone of the arch of civilization; up to a late period it has been but too much defaced by technicality, and the difficulties which have attended its acquisition. It was with the desire of relieving science from these encumbrances that Dr. Arnot, Mr. Babbage, and a host of other learned and excellent helpmate men, commenced their labours; and it is as a humble but honest in the same vineyard, that "The Library of Popular Instruction" begins its career.

In the course of their publication, the Proprietors intend to draw largely from the parent stock, the "Bibliothèque Populaire." A literal translation of this work would be inexpedient, because of its purely national character, and because also of the different opinions entertained on particular points by the learned of both countries. On some subjects, as geology, zoology, &c., entirely new treatises will be written. In that of zoology, for instance, the principles of the sciences will be first explained, and then again illustrated by reference to the history and habits of animals, in the hope that, by mixing the "duke et utile," the subject will be divested of much of its dryness, and rendered more inviting and easy of comprehension.

"The Library of Popular Instruction" will be published regularly every Fortnight, at 6d. each Part.

LETTER IV.

ON THE GENII OF THE GREEKS AND ROMANS, AND
THE SPIRIT THAT WAS SAID TO HAVE WAITED ON SOCRATES.

THE angelical or middle beings of the Greeks and Romans are called by the common name of Genii, though the term is not correct; for the Greeks were unacquainted with the word Genius. Their spirit was called a Dæmon; and we suspect that a further distinction is to be drawn between the two words, for a reason which will be seen by and by. The ill sense in which Dæmon is now taken, originated with the fathers of the Church; who assuming that a Pagan Intelligence must be a bad one, caused the word to become synonymous with Devil. But there are few things more remarkable than the abundant use which the Church made of the speculations of the Greek philosophers, and the contempt with which indiscreet members of it have treated them. Take away the subtleties of the platonic theology from certain sects of Christians, and their very orthodoxy would tumble to pieces.

Dæmon, if it be derived, as most of the learned think, from a word signifying to know by inquiry, and the root of which signifies a torch, may be translated the Enlightened; or, simply, a light or intelligence. A blessed spirit, eternally increasing in knowledge or illumination (which some think will be one of its beatitudes) gives an enlarged sense of the word Dæmon.

Plato certainly had no ill opinion of his Dæmon, even when the intelligence was acting in a manner which the vulgar pronounced to be evil, and upon which the philosopher has delivered a sentiment equally profound and humane. The following may be regarded as a summary of his notions about the spiritual world. Taking up the religion of his country, as proclaimed by Hesiod and others, and endeavouring to harmonize it with reason, he conceived, that agreeably to the ranks and gradations which we fancy in nature, there must be intermediate beings between men and gods, the gods themselves being far from the top of spirituality. We have already stated his opinions on that subject. Next to the Gods came the Dæmons, who partook of their divinity mixed with what he called the soul of the world, and ministered round about them as well as on earth: in fact, were the angels of the Christian system but a little more allied to their superiors. "What other philosophers called Dæmons," says the devout platonic Jew Philo, "Moses usually called Angels." Next to Dæmons, but farther apart from them than Dæmons were from the Gods, and yet partaking of the angelical office, were Heroes, or spirits clothed in a light ethereal body and partaking still more of the soul of the world; perhaps the souls of men who had been heroic on earth, or sent down to embody them to that end. And lastly came the souls of men which were the faintest emanation of the Deity, and clogged with earthly clothing in addition to the mundane nature of their spirits.*

The chiefs among these spiritual beings were very like the gods, and often mistaken for them; which is said to have given them great satisfaction! It is upon the strength of this fancy that attempts were made to account for the stories of the gods, and their freaks upon earth; for Dæmons, any more than Angels, were not incapable of a little aberration. The supposed visits, for instance, of Jupiter down to earth, when he came

"Now, like a ram, fair Helle to pervert, Now, like a bull, Europa to withdraw,"

were the work of those spirits about him, who may truly be called the Jovial, and who delighted in bearing his name, as a Scottish clan does that of its chieftain. We have already mentioned the pious indignation of Plutarch at the indiscreet tales of the poets. It is remarkable, that, according to Plato, these satellites encircled their master precisely in the manner of the angelical hierarchies. "But how different," it may be said, "were their natures!" Not, perhaps, quite so much so as may be fancied. We have already hinted a resemblance in one point; and in others, the advantage has not always been kept on the proper side. Milton's angels, when they let down the unascendable, heavenly staircase to embitter the agonies of Satan, did a worse thing than any recorded of the Jupiters and Apollos. We must be cautious how, in attributing one or two virtues to a set of beings, we think we endow them with all the rest.

Dæmons were not, as some thought them, the souls of men. The latter had the honour of assisting Dæmons, but were a separate class. Indeed, according to Plato, the word Soul might as well have been put for Man, in opposition to Spirit; for he held that the human being was properly a soul, using the body only as an instrument. Nor was this soul the guardian angel or dæmon, though sometimes called a dæmon by reason of its superiority, but man himself. It was immortal, pre-existent; and the object of virtue was to restore it to its former state of beatitude in certain regions of light, from which it had fallen. This, among other doctrines of Plato, has been a favourite one with the poets; and would appear to have been seriously entertained by one of the present day.† What difficulty it clears, or what trouble it takes away, we cannot see. Progression is surely a better doctrine than recovery; especially if we look upon evil as partial, fugitive, and convertible, like a hard substance to good. Besides, we should take the whole of our species with us, and not always be looking after our own lost perfections.

The Guardian Dæmons assigned to man, came out of the whole of these orders indiscriminately. Their rank was proportioned to the virtue and intelligence of the individual. Plotinus and others had guardian Dæmons of a very high order. The Dæmon of Socrates is said to have been called a God, because it was of the order that were taken for Gods. It was the business of properly must know as much, or they cannot. Henry Moore and others, who may be emphatically styled our Angelical Doctors, avowedly undertook to unite the Platonic, Pythagorean, and Cabalistic opinion. (See Enfield's Abridgment of Brucker.) It is true they derived them all from the Hebrew; which is about as much as if they had said that the Egyptians were skilled in all the learning of Moses, instead of Moses in all the learning of the Egyptians.

* Dæmons and heroes were the angels and saints of the domestic hierarchy. They had their chapels, altars, feasts, and domestic worship, precisely in the same spirit; and the souls of the departed were from time to time added to the list. (See the Abbé Banier's Mythology and Fables of the Ancients, explained from History, vol. iii. p. 434.) The Heroines were the female saints. We make this remark in no ironical spirit, though the Abbé would not thank us for it.

† "Our life is but a dream and a forgetting."

this spiritual attendant to be a kind of soul in addition. The soul, or real man, governed the animal part of us; and the Dæmon governed the soul. He was a tutor accompanying the pupil. If the pupil did amiss it was not the tutors fault. He lamented, and tried to mend it, perhaps by subjecting it to some misery or even vice. The process in this case is not very clear. Good Dæmons appear sometimes to be distinct from bad ones, sometimes to be confounded with them. The vulgar supposed, with the Jesuit who wrote the "Pantheon," that every person had two Dæmons assigned to him, one a good dæmon who incited him to virtue, the other a bad one who prompted him "to all manner of vice and wickedness." But the benign logic of Plato rejected a useless malignity. Evil when it came, was supposed to be for a good purpose; or rather not being of a nature to be immediately got rid of, it was turned to good account; and man was ultimately the better for it. The dæmon did everything he could to exalt the intellect of his charge, to regulate his passions, and perfect his nature throughout; in short, to teach his soul, as the soul aspired to teach the body; and what is remarkable, though he could not supply fate itself, he is said to have supplied things fortuitous; that is to say, "to give us a chance," as we phrase it, and put us in the way of shaping what we were to suppose was rough hewn. This was reversing the Shakspearian order of Providence, or rather, perhaps, giving it a new meaning; for we, or the untaught part of us, and fate, might be supposed to go blindly to the same end, did not our intelligence keep on the alert.

There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough hew them how we will.*

If all this is not much clearer than attempts to explain such matters are apt to be, and if the parts of Plato's theology (which were derived from the national creed) do little honour sometimes to the general spirit of it, which was his own, there is something at all times extremely elevating in his aspirations after the good and beautiful. St. Augustin complained that the reading of Plato made him proud. We do believe that it is impossible for readers of any enthusiasm to sit long over some of his writings, (the Banquet for instance) and not feel an unusual exaltation of spirit,—a love of the good and beautiful, for their own sakes, and in honour of human nature. But there is no danger, we conceive, provided we correct this poetical state of self-aspiration with a remembrance of the admonitions of Christianity,—the sympathy with our fellow-creatures. The more hope we have of ourselves under that correction, the more we shall have of others.

The great point is to elevate ourselves by elevating humanity at large.

It is difficult to know what to make of the Dæmon of Socrates. It is clear that he laid claim to a special consciousness of this attendant spirit—a sort of revelation, that, we believe, had never before been vouch-

* See the Pantheon attributed to Mr. Tooke. Tooke's Pantheon is a risqué translation of King's Pantheon, which was a translation from a Jesuit of the name of Pomey. It contains "in every page, an elaborate calumny," says Mr. Baldwin "upon the Gods of the Greeks, and that in the coarsest thoughts and words that taverns could furnish. The author seems continually haunted by the fear that his pupil might prefer the religion of Jupiter to the religion of Christ."—Baldwin's Pantheon, preface, p. 6. This philosophical mythologist is of opinion that there was no ground for fear of that sort. We have observed elsewhere how little the young readers of Tooke think of the abuse at all: but if they had any sense of it, undoubtedly it goes in Jupiter's favour. We believe there is one thing which is not lost upon them; and that is, the affected horror and secret delight with which the Jesuit dwells upon certain vagaries of the gayer deities. Besides, he palates sometimes in good, admiring earnest; and then the boys attend to him as gravely. See for instance the beginning of his chapter on Venus; which if we read once at school, we read a thousand times, comparing it with the engraving.

* Οὗς ἄλλοι φιλοσοφοὶ δαίμονες, ἀγέλους Μωσὲς ἰσθῆναι νομίζουσιν.—Philo Judæus Opera Omnia. vol. i. page 263.—There is good reason to believe that Dionysius, the pretended Areopagite, who is the great authority with writers upon the angelical nature was a platonizing Christian of the school of Alexandria. If so, there is no saying how far we are not indebted for our ordinary notions of angels themselves to Plato, nor indeed how far the Christian and Jewish angel, and the Dæmon of the Greeks are not one and the same spirit: for it is impossible to say how much of the Jewish Cabala is not Alexandrian. On the other hand, the Platonists of that city mixed up their dogmas with the Oriental philosophy, so that the angel comes round again to the East, and is traceable to Persia and India. Nothing of all this need shake him: for it is in the heart and hopes of man that his nest is found. Plato's angel, Pythagoras', Philo's, Zoroaster's and Jeremy Taylor's, are all the same spirit under different names; and those who would owe him SPARROW AND CO. STAMP COURT.

safed. The spirit gave him intimations rather what to avoid than to do; for the Platonists tell us, that Socrates was led by his own nature to do what was right; but out of the fervour of his desire to do it, was liable to be mistaken in the season. For instance, he had a tendency to give the benefit of his wisdom to all men indiscriminately; and here the Dæmon would sometimes warn him off, that he might not waste his philosophy upon a fool. This was at least an ingenious and mortifying satire. But the spirit interfered also on occasions that seem very trifling, though accordant with the office assigned to him by Plato of presiding over fortuitous events. Socrates was going one day to see a friend in company with some others, when he made a sudden halt, and told them that his Dæmon had advised him not to go down that street, but to chuse another. Some of them turned back, but others persisting in the path before them "on purpose, as 'twere, to confute Socrates his Dæmon," encountered a herd of muddy swine, and came home with their clothes all over dirt. Charillus, a musician, who had come to Athens to see the philosopher Cebes, got especially muddled, so that now and then, says Plutarch, "he and his friends would think in merriment on Socrates his Dæmon, wondering that it never forsook the man, and that heaven took such particular care of him." It was particular enough in heaven, to be sure, to hinder a philosopher from having his drapery damaged; but we suppose matters would have been worse, had he gone the way of the inferior flesh. He would have made it worth the pigs while to be more tragical.

This Dæmon is the only doubtful thing about the character of Socrates, for as to the common misconceptions of him, they are but the natural conclusions of vulgar minds; and Aristophanes, who became a traitor to the graces he had learned at his table, and condescended to encourage the misconceptions in order to please the instinctive jealousy of the men of wit and pleasure about town, was but a splendid buffoon. But when we reflect that the wisdom inculcated by Socrates was of a nature particularly strait-forward and practical, this supernatural twist in his pretensions appears the more extraordinary. To be sure, it has been well argued, that no men are more likely to be put out of their reckoning by a sudden incursion of fancy or demand upon their belief, than those who are the most mechanical and matter-of-fact on all other points. They are not used to it; and have no grounds to go upon, the moment the hardest and driest ones are taken from under them. Plato has rendered it difficult to believe this of Socrates; but then we have the authority of Socrates for concluding, that Plato put a great deal in his head that he never uttered; and the Socrates of Xenophon, we think, the practical farmer and housekeeper, might not be supposed incapable of yielding to superstitious delusion out of a defect of imagination. Socrates sometimes reminds us of Dr. Johnson. He was a Johnson on a higher scale, healthier, with more self-command; and instead of being intemperate and repenting all his life, had conquered his passions, and turned them into graces becoming his reason. Johnson had a sturdy every-day good sense, and wit and words to impress it; but it was only persuasion in him: in Socrates it was persuasion and practice. Now Johnson had a strong tendency to be moved by superstitious impressions, and perplexities from within. A sudden action of the bile, not well understood, or taken as a moral instead of a physical intimation, would give rise to some painful thoughts; and this (which is a weakness that many temperaments given to reflection and not in perfect health, have found it necessary to guard against), would lead him into some superstitious practice or avoidance. There is a circumstance related of him, very like this one of Socrates; only the sedentary, diseased, dinner-loving Englishman made a gloomy business of it; while the sturdy gymnastic Athenian, mastering the weakness of his stomach, turned the superstition on his side into an elegance and an exaltation. The fact we allude to is, that Johnson would never go down Cranbourne Alley, or some street thereabout. He always turned, and went round about. Had he been gay and confident, not overwhelmed with scrupula, and with the more gloomy parts of his creed, he might have sworn as Socrates did, that it was his Guardian Angel that told him not to go that way. Had it been Jeremy Taylor—Jeremy the amiable and the handsome, the Sir Charles Grandison of Christianity, who, with equal comfort to his security, pronounced a panegyric upon a wedding-ring, or a description of eternal torments (so much can superstition pervert a sweet nature)—he, if he had thought he had an intimation from within, would have infallibly laid it to the account of the prettiest angel of the skies. Was it something of a like vanity in Socrates, (too superior to his fellows, not to fall into some disadvantage of that sort)? or was it an unhealthy movement within him, happily turned? or was it a joke, which was to be taken for serious, by those who liked? or did it arise from one of those perplexities of not knowing what to conclude, to which the greatest minds may be subject when they attain to the end of their experience, and stand between the known world and the unknown? or lastly, was it owing (as we fear is most likely) partly to a superstition retained from his nurse, and partly to a determination to construe an occasional fancy, thus warranted, into a conscious certainty, and so turn his interest with heaven to the account of his effect among men? Such, we fear, is the most reasonable conjecture, and such we take to be the general impression; though with a delicacy, equally singular and creditable to them, mankind (with rare exceptions) seem to have agreed to say as little about the matter as possible, chusing rather to give so great a man the benefit of their ignorance, than lose any part of their reverence for his wisdom. One thing must not be forgotten; that this pretension to an unusual sense of his attendant spirit assisted in getting him into trouble. He was accused of introducing false gods,—a singular charge, which shows how much the opinion of a guardian deity had gone out of use. On the other hand, he argued (with a true look of feeling, and which must afterwards have had great effect,) that it was not his fault if he beheld in omens and intimations the immediate influence of his guardian angel, and not merely the omens themselves. That he did believe in the latter somehow or other, is generally admitted.

It is not a little curious, that this is the only story of a good Dæmon that has come down to us in the records of antiquity. Some philosophers had theirs long afterwards; but these were evident imitations. Stories of Bad Dæmons, according to the vulgar notion, are more numerous. Two are to be found in the life of Apollonius of Tyana. Another is in Pausanias, and a third is the famous one of Brutus. These injurious persons were seldom however bad by nature. They become so from ill-usage, being, in fact, the souls of men who had been ill-treated when alive.

(To be concluded in a future paper.)

FIRST WEEK IN JUNE.

SWARMING OF BEES. INTENSE INTEREST THEY TAKE IN THEIR "QUEEN."

JUNE, for reasons mentioned in the following article, is a favourite period with the bees, especially towards the middle of it. While the reader is perusing this article, he may imagine myriads of them gathering their swarms, and filling the lazy summer air with their burning notes. They are a strange, mysterious people, as singular to us as we should be to them if their faculties enabled them to investigate us. Their attachment to their queen, or rather mother (for she is literally the parent of the nation!) is evinced in a manner deeply interesting, and shows a love for her, or dependence upon her, perhaps both, of a nature, the particular causes of which have yet but imperfectly been discerned. The application to her of the title of queen, and the use of the words princesses, royal family, &c., are founded on a very imperfect analogy. It would be less objectionable to call her queen-mother, and even then the resemblance of the bee queen-mother to the human one would be very partial. To make it complete, it would be necessary that the latter should be the absolute parent as well as mistress of the whole tribe,—that Queen Henriëtte for instance, or Queen Catherine de Medici, should have been literally the mother and producer of all England or France! and produce from 12 to 20,000 children a season!!

However populous (says Dr. Bevan) a stock of bees may be in the autumn, its numbers are greatly reduced during winter, perhaps about six or seven eighths. This loss is more than replaced in the spring, by the amazing fecundity of the queen. Hence arises a disposition to throw off swarms, which, of course, will issue more or less frequently, more or less early and in greater or less force, according to the temperature of the season, the fertility of the queen, the populousness of the stock, and the attention that has been paid to early feeding.

The most advantageous time for a swarm to be thrown off is from the middle of May to the middle of June. This period comprehends the grand harvest-season of the honeyed race. After the scythe has cut down the flowers which adorn our meadows and yield the bees such a plentiful supply of honey and farina, there is a very manifest relaxation in their activity; their excursions are not only much less extensive, but less frequent, although the weather be in all respects propitious. Swarms that issue much earlier than the time I have specified, are apt to be small; and should bad weather succeed, feeding will be necessary, to prevent famine.

The following is the enumeration of the signs of swarming.

1st. Clustering or hanging out, if taken singly, may be regarded as a fallacious symptom, but when conjoined with other indications, it may be considered as a sign of swarming.

2nd. The drones being visible in greater numbers than usual, and in great commotion, especially in the afternoon.

3rd. The inactivity of the working bees, who neither gather honey nor farina, though the morning be sunny and the weather altogether inviting. Reaumur regarded this as the most indubitable sign of preparation for swarming.

4th. A singular humming noise, for two or three nights previous, which has been variously described and accounted for. It cannot always be distinguished, unless the ear be placed near the mouth of the hive; the sounds, which are sharp and clear, seem to proceed from a single bee. Some suppose the noise to be made by the young queen, and to resemble the chip chip, peep peep, or the tool tool, of a child's penny trumpet, but not so loud; Mr. Hunter compares it to the lower a in the treble of the piano forte. It is readily distinguishable by those who have been accustomed to hear it. Dr. EVANS inquires, is it the sound emitted by the perfect queens on emerging from their cells, as described by M. Huber? The noise is sometimes in a shrill, at other times in a deeper key; this difference in the intensity of the tones may arise from the distance whence the sound proceeds, or may be intended to intimate to the bees the respective ripeness of their queens. BUTLER and WOOLDRIDGE ascribe it to a parley between the old and young queens, the latter at the bottom of the hive requesting leave to emigrate, and the former answering in her bass note from the top. WILDMAN supposes it to arise from a contest betwixt the queens, about sallying forth; and endeavours to account for its less frequency before first swarms, from the young chiefs being then in their embryo state. This, however, is mere hypothesis, and not at all consonant with later discoveries, particularly those of Huber, and Dunbar.

5th. Unusual silence in the hive, during which the separatists are supposed to be taking in a cargo of honey before their flight, as a provision against bad weather. Mr. Hunter opened the crops of some bees that remained in the parent hive and the crops of some emigrating bees, when he found the latter quite full, whilst the former contained but a small quantity.

As many persons doubt the queen's importance to the harmonious union of a swarm, I shall give an instance or two, to show how essentially necessary her presence is to produce this effect. Dr. WARDER being desirous of ascertaining the extent of the bees' loyalty to their sovereign, ran the hazard of destroying a swarm for this purpose. Having shaken on the grass all the bees from a hive which they had only tenanted the day before, he searched for the queen, by stirring amongst them with a stick. Having found and placed her, with a few attendants in a box, she was taken into his parlour; where the box being opened, she and her attendants immediately flew to the window, when he clipped off one of her wings, returned her to the box, and confined her there for above an hour. In less than a quarter of an hour, the swarm ascertained the loss of their queen, and instead of clustering together in one social mass, they diffused themselves over a space of several feet, were much agitated, and uttered a piteous sound. An hour afterwards they all took flight, and settled upon the hedge where they had first alighted, after leaving the parent stock; but instead of hanging together like a bunch of grapes, as when the queen was with them, and as swarms usually hang, they extended themselves thirty feet along the edge, in small bunches, of forty, fifty, or more. The queen was now presented to them, when all quickly gathered round her, with a joyful hum, and formed one harmonious cluster. At night the Doctor hived them again, and on the following morning repeated his experiment, to see whether the bees would rise; the queen being in a mutilated state, and unable to accompany them, they surrounded her for several hours, apparently willing to die with her rather than desert her in distress. The queen was a second time removed, when they spread themselves out again, as though searching for her: her repeated restoration to them at different parts of their circle, produced one uniform result, "and these poor loyal and loving creatures, always marched and counter-marched every way as the queen was laid." The Doctor persevered in these experiments, till after five days and nights of fasting, they all died of famine, except the queen, who lived a few hours longer, and then died. The attachment of the queen to the working bees, appeared to be equally as strong as their attachment to her; though offered honey on several occasions, during the period of her separation from them, she constantly refused it, "disdaining a life that was no life to her, without the company of those which she could not have."

* See the story as related by Plutarch, and translated by Creech, in the Morals by several Hands, Vol. II. p. 287. The street preferred by the philosopher was "Trankmaker-street, and the fatal one "Gravers-row" says Creech, "near the Guildhall."

In confirmation of the evidence of the queen's importance to the well-being of the community, I will advert to some experiments of HUBER. He removed a queen from one of his hives; the bees were not immediately aware of it, but continued their labours, watched over the young, and performed the whole of their ordinary occupations. In a few hours afterwards, agitation commenced, and all appeared to be a scene of tumult; a singular humming noise was heard, the bees deserted their young, and rushed over the surface of the combs with delirious impetuosity. On replacing the queen, tranquillity was instantly restored; and from what will be said presently, it appeared that they knew her individual person. Huber varied this experiment with other hives, in different ways; instead of restoring their own queen, he tried to substitute a stranger queen; the manner of her reception depended upon the period at which she was introduced. If twenty-four hours had elapsed after the removal of the queen, the stranger was well received, and at once admitted to the sovereignty of the hive. If not more than eighteen hours had elapsed, she was at first treated as a prisoner, but after a time permitted to reign. If the stranger was introduced within twelve hours, she was immediately surrounded by an impenetrable cluster of bees, and commonly died either from hunger or privation of air. It appeared, therefore, in the course of these experiments, that from twenty-four to thirty hours were required, for a colony to forget its sovereign, and that if, before the lapse of that period, no substitute were presented, they set about constructing royal cells, as stated in page 22; and moreover, that if, during the time they were so occupied, a princess was so brought to them, the fabrication of royal cells was instantly abandoned, and the larvae selected to occupy them were destroyed. On the admission of a welcome stranger queen, more regard is shewn her at first, than to a restored natural queen,—at least there are more conspicuous demonstrations of it: the nearest workers touch her with their antennae, and passing their proboscis over every part of their body, give her honey. In the cases above related, the bees all vibrated their wings at once, as if experiencing some agreeable sensations, and ranged themselves in a circle round her. Others, in succession, broke through this circle, and having repeated the same process, of touching her with their antennae, giving her honey &c., formed themselves into a circle behind the others, vibrating their wings and keeping up a pleasurable hum. These demonstrations were continued for a quarter of an hour, when the queen beginning to move towards one part of the whole circle, an opening was made through which she passed, followed and surrounded by her customary guard.

BIRTH DAYS.

We are sorry to have omitted in our last week's birth-days the name of Edward Jenner, the discoverer of Vaccination, a benefactor to his species. He was the son of a clergyman, and was born at Berkley in Gloucestershire, May 27th, (14th O. S.), 1749. We believe he was an amiable man in private, and a successful cultivator of elegant literature; but we cannot recollect our authorities. Health and beauty are greatly indebted to Jenner. "Sir," said Platoff, the Hetman of the Cossacks to him, when the Allied Foreign were in England, "you have extinguished the most pestilential disorder that ever appeared on the banks of the Don."

But all the world are indebted to him. By the way, beauty itself began what science perfected; for inoculation was introduced into Christendom by Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, who brought it from Turkey.

We also omitted the name of Albert Durer, the father of Art in Germany, who was born at Nuremberg, June 2nd, (20th May, O. S.), 1471, and was the son of a goldsmith. Durer was quaint, and deficient in keeping, yet earnest in detail, picturesque, and not without the inspiration of true genius, as may be seen by his "Melancholy the mother of Invention," where a solemn female is looking out upon the mysteries of the universe. His genius was so truly German, that traces of the imitation of him are to be met with to this day, as in the picturesque quaint beads and adjusted attitudes of Retzsch. Poor Albert had a wife who understood nothing about "Melancholy the Mother of Invention," and thought she could not add enough trouble to the painter's existence. She was a shrew. "The wife of Durer," says Mr. D'Israeli, "compelled that great genius to the hourly drudgery of his profession, merely to gratify her own sordid profession. In despair, Albert run away from his Tisiphone; she wheedled him back; and not long afterwards this great artist fell a victim to her furious disposition." Curiosities of Literature, (new edition), vol. II. p. 122.

To-day (22nd of May, 1688, O. S.), is the birth-day of Pope—the finest miniature-poet of familiar life that Europe has seen, whether for fancy pieces or portraits. Alexander Pope was born in Lombard Street, where his father was a linen-draper. The poet was small, sickly, and crooked; but had an eye and face of great elegance; and was a fine gentleman, as exquisite at a compliment as at a satire.

June 5th, (May 23rd, 1707, O. S.) at Rashult in Sweden, Carl or Charles Von Linné, better known by the Latinized name of Linnæus, the great naturalist and botanist. His father was a clergyman, of a family of peasants. The customs of Sweden were so primitive at that time, that people under the rank of nobility had no surnames; and by a sort of prophetic inclination, the family of Linnæus had designated themselves from a favourite linden or lime-tree, which grew near their abode; so that Carl von Linne meant Charles of the Lime-tree. The lime was not unworthy of being his godfather. The system of botany which he founded, requires more than an abrupt explanation of it to do it justice; but Linnæus was one of those original geniuses who saw nature in a new as well as true light; and like all men of that sort, whose pursuits are gentle, he was equally enthusiastic and good-hearted. He would have left Sweden when young, in consequence of the greater encouragement he received elsewhere, but he says he could not, for he was "in love." His love, however, was more the reflection of his own amiable qualities than resulting from any real merit in the object; for his wife turned out to be a bad, unfeeling woman, and became the torment of him and his family.—His eldest daughter discovered, that the nasturtium had the property of emitting sparks of light in warm summer evenings.

[We have just had a very apropos little manual sent us called "Clavis Botanica—A Key to the Study of Botany on the system arranged by Linnæus," printed and published by Mr. Fry of Houndsditch. It is a delicate pigmy book, printed on straw-coloured paper, and done up in rose-colour,—a flower in itself; and it has the true simplicity, brevity, and easiness of an elementary book, so that a lover of flowers may take it at once in hand, and really learn from it what it professes to teach; which is far from being the case with all books of similar pretensions.]

June 9th, (May 27th, O. S. 1265) at Florence, Dante Alighieri, the greatest poet of Italy. Dante is a Christian name, a contraction of Durante. The Italians have always been fond of calling people by their Christian instead of surnames; and thus it is, that some of their famous countrymen have come down to us, known almost entirely by the former; as Rafael, whose surname was Sanzio; and Michael Angelo, who was a Buonarroti. The genius of Dante is admirable for a rare union of the austere and the tender. He is one of the great primitive poets who go to the heart of a matter by dint of the strongest feelings and the simplest words. He was in some respects however, not inferior to the violent passions of his time; and his poem of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven, is a singular mixture of the noblest and most affecting genius, and the most partial and presumptuous bigotry.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XVII.—LADY ARABELLA STUART.

Lady Arabella Stuart, a singular and affecting instance of the sacrifice of a human being to state-policy, was the great-great-grand-daughter of Henry the Seventh, by the marriage of his daughter Margaret with the Scottish house of the Darnleys, Earl of Lennox. By this descent, she stood next in blood royal and right of inheritance, to her cousin James the First, son of Mary Queen of Scots, wife of Lord Darnley, in case that prince had no issue; and hence arose the misfortunes so interestingly detailed by Mr. D'Israeli in the fourth volume of his newly published Curiosities of Literature. With the latter half of this volume, by the way, commences the Second Series of that work,—a portion with which the public are less acquainted than the First, but which, if our memory does not deceive us, is even more entertaining and curious than the former part. Two volumes are yet to make their appearance. The whole six will make an elegant and agreeable addition to every library that can afford them, being in fact a little world, in themselves, of anecdote and miscellaneous literature.

"The Lady Arabella," for by that name (says Mr. D'Israeli,) she is usually noticed by her contemporaries, rather than by her maiden name of Stuart, or by her married one of Seymour, as she latterly subscribed herself, was, by her affinity with James the First, and our Elizabeth, placed near the throne; too near, it seems, for her happiness and quiet! In their common descent from Margaret, the eldest daughter to Henry the Seventh, she was cousin to the Scottish monarch, but born an Englishwoman, which gave her some advantage in a claim to the throne of England. "Her double relation to royalty," says Mr. Lodge, "was equally obnoxious to the jealousy of Elizabeth and the timidity of James, and they secretly dreaded the supposed danger of her having a legitimate offspring." Yet James himself, then unmarried, proposed for the husband of the Lady Arabella one of her cousins, Lord Esme Stuart, whom he had created Duke of Lenox, and designed for his heir. The first thing we hear of "The Lady Arabella," concerns a marriage: marriages were the incidents of her life, and the fatal event which terminated it was a marriage. Such was the secret spring on which her character and her misfortunes revolved.

This proposed match was desirable to all parties; but there was one greater than them all, who forbade the bans. Elizabeth interfered; she imprisoned the Lady Arabella, and would not deliver her up to the king, of whom she spoke with asperity, and even with contempt.* The greatest infirmity of Elizabeth was her mysterious conduct respecting the succession to the English throne; her jealousy of power, her strange unhappiness in the dread of personal neglect, made her averse to see a successor in her court, or even to hear of a distant one; in a successor she could only view a competitor. Camden tells us that she frequently observed that "most men neglected the setting sun," and this melancholy presentiment of personal neglect, this political coquette not only lived to experience, but even this circumstance of keeping the succession unsettled, miserably disturbed the queen on her death-bed. Her ministers, it appears, harassed her when she was lying speechless; a remarkable circumstance, which has hitherto escaped the knowledge of her numerous historians, and which I shall take the opportunity of disclosing in this work.

Elizabeth leaving a point so important always problematical, raised up the very evil she so greatly dreaded; it multiplied the aspirants, while every party humoured itself by selecting its own claimant, and none more busily than the continental powers. One of the most curious is the project of the Pope, who, intending to put aside James the First, on account of his religion, formed a chimerical scheme of uniting Arabella with a prince of the house of Savoy; the pretext, for without a pretext no politician moves, was their descent from a bastard of our Edward the Fourth; the Duke of Parma was, however, married; but the Pope, in his infallibility, turned his brother, the Cardinal, into the duke's substitute, by secularizing the churchman. In that case the Cardinal would then become King of England in right of this lady! provided he obtained the crown!†

We might conjecture from this circumstance, that Arabella was a Catholic, and so Mr. Butler has recently told us; but I know of no other authority than Dodd, the Catholic historian, who has inscribed her name among his party. Parsons, the wily Jesuit, was so doubtful how the lady, when young, stood disposed to Catholicism, that he describes "her religion to be as tender, green, and flexible, as is her age and sex, and to be wrought hereafter, and to be settled according to future events and times." Yet, in 1611, when she was finally sent into confinement, one well-informed court affairs, writes, "that the Lady Arabella hath not been found inclinable to popery."‡

Even Henry the Fourth of France was not unfriendly to this papistical project of placing an Italian Cardinal on the English throne. It had always been the state interest of the French cabinet to favour any scheme which might preserve the realms of England and Scotland as separate kingdoms. The manuscript correspondence of Charles the Ninth with his ambassador at

* A circumstance which we discover by a Spanish memorial, when our James the First was negotiating with the cabinet of Madrid. He complains of Elizabeth's treatment of him; that the queen refused to give him his father's estates in England nor would deliver up his niece's daughter, Arabella, to be married to the Duke of Lenox, at which time the queen was pale-bras muy asperas y de mucho desprecio contra el dicho Rey de Escocia; she used harsh words, expressing much contempt of the king.—Winwood's Mem. i. 4.

† See a very curious letter, CCXCIX. of Cardinal de Ossat, Vol. V. The Catholic interest expected to facilitate the conquest of England by joining their armies with those of "Arbelle," and the commentator writes that this English lady had a party, consisting of all those English who had been the judges or the avowed enemies of Mary of Scotland, the mother of James the First.

‡ Winwood's Memorials, iii. 221.

the court of London, which I have seen, tends solely to this great purpose, and perhaps it was her French and Spanish allies which finally hastened the political martyrdom of the Scottish Mary.

Thus we have discovered two chimerical husbands of the Lady Arabella. The pretensions of this lady to the throne had evidently become an object with speculating politicians; and perhaps it was to withdraw herself from the embarrassments into which she was thrown, that, according to De Thou, she intended to marry a son of the Earl of Northumberland; but to the jealous terrors of Elizabeth, an English Earl was not an object of less magnitude than a Scotch Duke. This is the third shadowy husband.

When James the First ascended the English throne, there existed an anti-Scottish party. Hardly had the northern monarch entered into the "Land of Promise," when his southern throne was shaken by a foolish plot, which one writer calls "a state riddle;" it involved Rawleigh, and unexpectedly the lady Arabella. The Scottish monarch was to be got rid of, and Arabella was to be crowned. Some of these silly conspirators having written to her, requesting letters to be addressed to the King of Spain, she laughed at the letter she received, and sent it to the King. Thus for a second time was Arabella to have been Queen of England. This occurred in 1603, but was followed by no harsh measures from James the First.

In the following year, 1604, I have discovered that for the third time the lady was offered a crown! "A great ambassador is coming from the King of Poland, whose chief errand is to demand my Lady Arabella in marriage for his master. So may your princess of the blood grow a great queen, and then we shall be safe from the danger of superscribing letters." This last passage seems to allude to something. What is meant of the danger of superscribing letters?

If this royal offer were made, it was certainly forbidden. Can we imagine the refusal to have come from the lady, who, we shall see, seven years afterwards, complained that the king had neglected her, in not providing her with a suitable match? It was this very time that one of those butterflies, who quiver on the fair flowers of a court, writes that "My Lady Arabella spends her time in lecture reading, &c., and she will not hear of marriage. Indirectly there were speeches used in the recommendation of Count Maurice, who pretended to be Duke of Gueldres. I dare not attempt her."† Here we find another princely match proposed. Thus far, to the Lady Arabella, crowns and husbands were like a fairy banquet seen at moonlight, opening on her sight, impalpable and vanishing at the moment of approach.

Arabella, from certain circumstances, was dependant on the king's bounty, which flowed very unequally; often reduced to great personal distress, we find by her letters, "that she prayed for present money, though it should not be annually." I have discovered that James at length granted her a pension. The royal favours, however, were probably limited to her good behaviour.‡

From 1604 to 1608, is a period which forms a blank leaf in the story of Arabella. In this last year this unfortunate lady had again fallen out of favour, and, as usual, the cause was mysterious, and not known even to the writer. Chamberlain, in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, mentions, "The Lady Arabella's business, whatsoever it was, is ended, and she restored to her former places and graces. The king gave her a cupboard of plate, better than 200*l.*, for a new year's gift, and 1000 marks to pay her debts, besides some yearly addition to her maintenance, want being thought the chiefest cause of her discontentment, though she be not altogether free from suspicion of being collapsed."§ Another mysterious expression which would seem to allude either to politics or religion; but the fact appears by another writer to have been a discovery of a new project of marriage without the king's consent. This person of her choice is not named; and it was to divert her mind from the too constant object of her thoughts, that James, after a severe reprimand, had invited her to partake of the festivities of the court, in that season of revelry and reconciliation.

We now approach that event of the Lady Arabella's life, which reads like a romantic fiction, the catastrophe, too, is formed by the Aristotelian canon; for its misery, its pathos, and its terror, even romantic fiction has not exceeded!

It is probable that the king, from some political motive, had decided that the Lady Arabella should lead a single life; but such wise purposes frequently meet with cross ones; and it happened that no woman was ever more solicited to the conjugal state, or seems to have been so little averse to it. Every noble youth, who sighed for distinction, ambitioned the notice of the Lady Arabella; and she was so frequently contriving a marriage for herself, that a courtier of that day writing to another, observes, "these affectations of marriage in her do give some advantage to the world of impairing the reputation of her constant and virtuous disposition."¶

The revels of Christmas had hardly closed, when the lady Arabella forgot that she had been forgiven, and again relapsed into her old infirmity. She renewed a connexion, which had commenced in childhood, with Mr. William Seymour, the second son of Lord Beauchamp, and grandson to the Earl of Hertford. His character has been finely described by Clarendon; he loved his studies and his repose; but when the civil wars broke out, he closed his volumes and drew his sword, and was both an active and a skilful general. Charles the First created him Marquis of Hertford, and governor of the prince; he lived to the Restoration, and Charles the Second restored him to the dukedom of Somerset.

This treaty of marriage was detected in February, 1609, and the parties summoned before the privy council. Seymour was particularly censured for daring to ally himself with the royal blood, although that blood was running in his own veins. In a manuscript letter which I have discovered, Seymour addressed the lords of the privy council. The style is humble; the plea to excuse his intended marriage is, that being but "a younger brother, and sensible of mine own good, unknown to the world, of mean estate, not born to challenge anything by my birthright, and therefore my fortunes to be raised by mine own endeavour, and as she is a lady of great honour and virtue, and, as I thought, of great means, I did plainly and honestly endeavour lawfully to gain her in marriage." There is nothing romantic in this apology, in which Seymour describes himself as a fortune-hunter! which, however, was probably done to cover his undoubted affection for Arabella, whom he had early known. He says, that "he conceived that this noble lady might, without offence, make the choice of any subject within this kingdom; which conceit was begotten in me upon a general report, after her ladyship's last being called before your lordships;†—that it might be." He tells the story of this ancient wooing—"I boldly intruded myself into her ladyship's chamber in the court on Candlemass day last, at what time I imparted my desire unto her, which was entertained, but with this caution on either part, that both of us resolved not to proceed to any final conclusion, without his majesty's most gracious favour first obtained. And this was our first meeting! After that we had a second meeting at Mr. Brigg's house in Fleet-street, and then a third at Mr. Baynton's, at both which we had the like conference and resolution as before." He assures their lordships that both of them had never intended marriage without his majesty's approbation.‡

But love laughs at privy-councils and the grave promises made by two frightened lovers. The parties were secretly married, which was discovered about July in the following year. They were then separately confined, the lady at the house of Sir Thomas Parry, at Lambeth, and Seymour in the Tower, for "his contempt in marrying a lady of the royal family without the king's leave."

This, their first confinement, was not rigorous; the lady walked in her garden, and the lover was prisoner at large in the Tower. The writer in the Biographia Britannica observes, "that some intercourse they had by letters, which, after a time was discovered." In this history of love there might be precious documents, and in the library at Long-leat, these love-epistles, or perhaps this volume, may yet lie unread in a corner.§ Arabella's epistolary talent was not vulgar: Dr. Montford, in a manuscript letter, describes one of those effusions which Arabella addressed to the king. "This letter was penned by her in the best terms, as she can do right well. It was often read without offence, nay it was even commended by his highness, with the applause of prince and council." One of these amatory letters I have recovered. The circumstance is domestic, being nothing more at first than a very pretty letter on Mr. Seymour having taken cold, but, as every love-letter ought, it is not without a pathetic crescendo; the tearing away of hearts so firmly joined, while, in her solitary imprisonment, that he lived and was her own filled her spirit with that consciousness which triumphed even over that sickly frame so nearly subdued to death. The familiar style of James the First's age may bear comparison with our own. I shall give it entire.

"LADY ARABELLA TO MR. WILLIAM SEYMOUR.

"Sir,

"I am exceeding sorry to hear you have not been well. I pray you let me know truly how you do, and what was the cause of it. I am not satisfied with the reason Smith gives for it; but if it be a cold, I will impute it to some sympathy betwixt us, having myself gotten a swollen cheek at the same time with a cold. For God's sake, let not your grief of mind work upon your body. You may see by me what inconveniences it will bring one to; and no fortune, I assure you, daunts me so much as that weakness of body I find in myself; for si nous vivons l'age d'un veau, as Marot says, we may, by God's grace be happier than we look for, in being suffered to enjoy ourself with his majesty's favour. But if we be not able to live to it, I, for my part, shall think myself a pattern of misfortune, in enjoying so great a blessing as you, so little awhile. No separation but that deprives me of the comfort of you. For whosoever you be or in what state soever you are, it sufficeth me you are mine! Rachel wept and would not be comforted, because her children were no more. And that, indeed, is the remediless sorrow, and none else! And, therefore, God bless us from that, and I will hope well of the rest, though I see no apparent hope. But I am sure God's book mentioneth many of his children in as great distress, that have done well after, even in this world! I do assure you nothing the state can do with me can trouble me so much as this news of your being ill doth; and you see when I am troubled, I trouble you with tedious kindness; for so I think you will account so long a letter, yourself not having written to me this good while so much as how you do. But, sweet sir, I speak not this to trouble you with writing but when you please. Be well, and I shall account myself happy in being

† This evidently alludes to the gentleman whose name appears not, which occasioned Arabella to incur the king's displeasure before Christmas; the Lady Arabella, it is quite clear, was resolutely bent on marrying herself.

"Your faithful loving wife,
"ARB. S."*

In examining the manuscripts of this lady, the defect of dates must be supplied by our sagacity. The following "petition," as she calls it, addressed to the king in defence of her secret marriage, must have been written at this time. She remonstrates with the king for what she calls his neglect of her; and while she fears to be violently separated from her husband, she asserts her cause with a firm and noble spirit, which was afterwards too severely tried!

"TO THE KING.

"May it please your most excellent Majesty,

"I do most heartily lament my hard fortune that I should offend your Majesty the least, especially in that whereby I have long desired to merit of your Majesty, as appeared before your Majesty was my sovereign. And though your Majesty's neglect of me, my good liking of this gentleman that is my husband, and my fortune, drew me to a contract before I acquainted your Majesty, I humbly beseech your Majesty to consider how impossible it was for me to imagine it would be offensive to your Majesty, having few days before given me your royal consent to bestow myself on any subject of your Majesty's (which likewise your Majesty had done long since). Besides, never having been prohibited any, or spoken to for any, in this land, by your Majesty, these seven years that I have lived in your Majesty's house, I could not conceive that your Majesty regarded my marriage at all; whereas if your Majesty had vouchsafed to tell me your mind, and accept the freewill offering of my obedience, I would not have offended your Majesty, of whose gracious goodness I presume so much, that if it were now as convenient in a worldly respect, as malice make it seem to separate us, whom God hath joined, your Majesty would not do evil that good might come thereof, nor make me, that have the honour to be so near your Majesty in blood, the first precedent that ever was, though our princes may have left some as little imitable, for so good and gracious a king as your Majesty, as David's dealing with Uriah. But I assure myself, if it please your Majesty in your own wisdom to consider thoroughly of my cause, there will no solid reason appear to debar me of justice and your princely favour, which I will endeavour to deserve whilst I breathe."

It is indorsed, "A copy of my petition to the King's Majesty." In another she implores that "If the necessity of my state and fortune, together with my weakness, have caused me to do somewhat not pleasing to your Majesty, let it all be covered with the shadow of your royal benignity." Again, in another petition, she writes—

"Touching the offence for which I am now punished, I most humbly beseech your Majesty, in your most princely wisdom and judgment, to consider in what a miserable state I had been, if I had taken any other course than I did; for my own conscience witnessing before God that I was then the wife of him that now I am, I could never have matched any other man, but to have lived all the days of my life as a harlot, which your Majesty would have abhorred in any (how otherwise unfortunate soever) to have any drop of your Majesty's blood in them."

I find a letter of Lady Jane Drummond, in reply to this or another petition, which Lady Drummond had given the queen to present to his Majesty. It was to learn the cause of Arabella's confinement. The pithy expression of James the First is characteristic of the monarch; and the solemn forebodings of Lady Drummond, who appears to have been a lady of excellent judgment, showed, by the fate of Arabella, how they were true."

"LADY JANE DRUMMOND TO LADY ARABELLA,

"Answering her prayer, to know the cause of her confinement.

"This day her Majesty hath seen your ladyship's letter. Her Majesty says, that when she gave your Fowler, is dated on the same day as the manuscript letter I have just quoted, and is directed to the same Earl of Shrewsbury; so that the Earl must have received, in one day, accounts of two different projects of marriage for his niece! This shows how much Arabella engaged the designs of foreigners and natives. Will Fowler was a rhyming and fantastical secretary to the queen of James the First.

ladyship's petition to his Majesty, he did take it well enough, but gave no other answer than that ye had eaten of the forbidden trees. This was all her Majesty commanded me to say to your ladyship in this purpose; but withal did remember her kindly to your ladyship, and sent you this little token in witness of the continuance of her Majesty's favour to your ladyship. Now, where your ladyship desires me to deal openly and freely with you, I protest I can say nothing on knowledge, for I never spoke to any of that purpose but to the queen; but the wisdom of this state, with the example how some of your quality in the like case has been used, makes me fear that ye shall not find so easy end to your troubles as ye expect or I wish."

In return, Lady Arabella expresses her grateful thanks—presents her majesty with "this piece of my work, to accept in remembrance of the poor prisoner that wrought them, in hopes her royal hands will vouchsafe to wear them, which till I have the honor to kiss, I shall live in a great deal of sorrow. Her case," she adds, "could be compared to no other she ever heard of, resembling no other." Arabella, like the Queen of Scots, beguiled the hours of imprisonment by works of embroidery; for in sending a present of this kind to Sir Andrew Sinclair to be presented to the Queen, she thanks him for "vouchsafing to descend to those petty offices to take care even of these womanish toys, for her whose serious mind must invent some relaxation."

The secret correspondence of Arabella and Seymour was discovered, and was followed by a sad scene. It must have been now that the king resolved to consign this unhappy lady to the strictest care of the Bishop of Durham. Lady Arabella was so subdued at this distant separation, that she gave way to all the wildness of despair; she fell suddenly ill, and could not travel but in a litter, and with a physician. In her way to Durham, she was so greatly disquieted in the first few miles of her uneasy and troublesome journey, that they could proceed no further than to Highgate. The physician returned to town to report her state, and declared that she was assuredly very weak, her pulse dull and melancholy, and very irregular; her countenance very heavy, pale, and wan; and though free from fever, he declared her in no case fit for travel. The King observed, "It is enough to make any sound man sick to be carried in a bed in that manner she is; much more for her whose impatient and unquiet spirit heapeth upon herself far greater indisposition of body than otherwise she would have." His resolution, however, was, that she should proceed to Durham if he were king! "We answered," replied the doctor, "that we made no doubt of her obedience." "Obedience is that required," replied the king, "which being performed, I will do more for her than she expected."

The king, however, with his usual indulgence, appears to have consented that Lady Arabella should remain for a month at Highgate, in confinement, till she had sufficiently recovered to proceed to Durham, where the bishop posted, unaccompanied by his charge, to await her reception, and to the great relief of the friends of the lady, who hoped she was still within the reach of their cares, or of the royal favour.

A second month's delay was granted, in consequence of that letter which we have before noticed as so impressive and so elegant, that it was commended by the King, and applauded by Prince Henry and his council.

But the day of her departure hastened, and the Lady Arabella betrayed no symptom of her first despair. She openly declared her resignation to her fate, and showed her obedient willingness, by being even over-careful in little preparations to make easy a long journey. Such tender grief had won over the hearts of her keepers, who could not but sympathise with a princess whose love, holy and wedded too, was crossed only by the tyranny of state-men. But Arabella had not within that tranquillity with which she had lulled her keepers. She and Seymour had concerted a flight, as bold in its plot, and as beautifully wild, as any recorded in romantic story. The day preceding her departure, Arabella found it not difficult to persuade a female attendant to consent that she would suffer her to pay a last visit to her husband, and to wait for her return at an appointed hour. More solicitous for the happiness of lovers than for the repose of kings, this attendant, in utter simplicity, or with generous sympathy, assisted the Lady Arabella in dressing her in one of the most elaborate disguisings. "She drew a pair of large French-fashioned hose or trousers over her petticoats; put on a man's doublet or coat; a peruke such as men wore, whose long locks covered her own ringlets; a black hat, a black cloak, russet boots with red tops, and a rapier by her side." Thus accoutred, the Lady Arabella stole out with a gentleman about three o'clock in the afternoon. She had only proceeded a mile and a half, when they stopped at a poor inn, where one of her confederates was waiting with horses, yet she was so sick and faint, that the ostler, who held her stirrup, observed, that "the gentleman could hardly hold out to London." She recruited her spirits by riding; the blood mantled in her face; and at six o'clock our sick lover reached Blackwall, where a boat and servants were waiting. The watermen were at first ordered to Woolwich; there they were desired to push on to Gravesend; then to Tilbury, where, complaining of fatigue, they landed to refresh; but, tempted by their fright, they reached Lee. At the break of morn, they discovered a French vessel riding there to receive the lady; but as Seymour had not yet arrived, Arabella was desirous to lie at anchor for her lord, conscious that he would not fail to his appointment. If he indeed had been prevented in his escape, she herself cared not to preserve the freedom she now possessed; but her attendants, aware of the danger of being overtaken by a king's ship, overruled her wishes, and hoisted sail, which occasioned so fatal a termination to this romantic adventure. Seymour, indeed, had escaped from the Tower; he had left his servant watching at the door, to warn all visitors not to disturb his master, who lay ill of a raging tooth-ache, while Seymour in disguise stole away alone, following a cart which had just brought wood to his apartment. He passed the warders; he reached the wharf, and found his confidential man waiting with a boat; and he arrived at Lee. The time pressed; the waves were rising; Arabella was not there; but in the distance he descried a vessel. Hiring a fisherman to take him on board, to his grief, on hailing it, he discovered that it was not the French vessel charged with his Arabella. In despair and confusion he found another ship from Newcastle, which for a good sum altered its course, and landed him in Flanders. In the meanwhile, the escape of Arabella was first known to government; and the hot alarm which spread may seem ludicrous to us. The political consequences attached to the union, and the flight of these two doves from their cotes, shook with consternation the grey owls of the cabinet, more particularly the Scotch party, who, in their terror, paralleled it with the gunpowder treason; and some political danger must have impended, at least in their imagination, for Prince Henry partook of this cabinet panic.

Confusion and alarm prevailed at court; couriers were despatched swifter than the winds wafted the unhappy Arabella, and all was hurry in the sea-ports. They sent to the Tower to warn the Lieutenant to be doubly vigilant over Seymour, who, to his surprise, discovered that his prisoner had ceased to be so for several hours. James at first was for issuing a proclamation in a style so angry and vindictive, that it required the moderation of Cecil to preserve the dignity while he concealed the terror of his Majesty. By the admiral's detail of his impetuous movements, he seemed in pursuit of an enemy's fleet; for the courier is urged, and the post-masters are roused by a superscription, which warned them of the eventful despatch: "Haste, haste, post haste! Haste for your life! your life!" The family of the Seymours were in a state of distraction; and a letter from Mr. Francis Seymour to his grandfather the Earl of Hertford, residing then at his seat far remote from the capital, to acquaint him of the escape of his brother and the lady, still bears to posterity a remarkable evidence of the trepidations and consternation of the old earl: it arrived in the middle of the night, accompanied by a summons to attend the privy council. In the perusal of a letter written in a small hand, and filling more than two folio pages, such was his agitation, that in holding the taper he must have burnt what he probably had not heard; the letter is scorched, and the flame has perforated it in so critical a part, that the poor old earl journeyed to town in a state of uncertainty and confusion. Nor was his terror so unreasonable as it seems. Treason had been a political calamity with the Seymours. Their progenitor, the Duke of Somerset the protector, had found that "all his honors," as Frankland strangely expresses it, "had helped him too forward to hop headless." Henry, Elizabeth, and James, says the same writer, considered that it was needful, as indeed in all sovereignties, that those who were near the crown "should be narrowly looked into for marriage."

But we have left the Lady Arabella alone and mournful on the seas, not praying for favourable gales to convey her away, but still imploring her attendants to linger for her Seymour; still straining her eyes to the point of the horizon for some speck which might give a hope of the approach of the boat freighted with all her love. Alas! never more was Arabella to cast a single look on her lover and her husband! She was overtaken by a pink in the king's service, in Calais roads; and now she declared that she cared not to be brought back again to her imprisonment, should Seymour escape, whose safety was dearest to her!

The life of the unhappy, the melancholy, and the distracted Arabella Stuart is now to close in an imprisonment, with lasted only four years; for her constitutional delicacy, her rooted sorrow, and the violence of her feelings, sunk beneath the hopelessness of her situation, and a secret resolution in her mind to refuse the aid of her physicians, and to wear away the faster if she could, the feeble remains of life. But who shall paint the emotions of a mind which so much grief, and so much love, and distraction itself, equally possessed?

What passed in that dreadful imprisonment cannot perhaps be recovered for authentic history; but enough is known; that her mind grew impaired, that she finally lost her reason, and if the duration of her imprisonment was short, it was only terminated by her death. Some loose effusions, often began and never ended, written and erased, incoherent and rational, yet remain in the fragments of her papers. In a letter she proposed

* "This emphatic injunction," observed a friend, "would be effective when the messenger could read; but in a letter written by the Earl of Essex about the year 1597, to the Lord High Admiral at Plymouth, I have seen added to the words 'haste, haste, hast for life!' the expressive symbol of a gallows prepared with a halter, which could not be well misunderstood by the most illiterate of Mercuries."

addressing to Viscount Fenton, to implore for her his majesty's favour again, she says, "Good my lord, consider the fault cannot be uncommitted; neither can any more be required of any earthly creature but confession and most humble submission." In a paragraph she had written, but crossed out, it seems that a present of her work had been refused by the king, and that she had no one about her whom she might trust.

"Help will come too late; and be assured that neither physician nor other, but whom I think good, shall come about me while I live, till I have his majesty's favour, without which I desire not to live. And if you remember of old, I dare die, so I be not guilty of my own death, and oppress others with my ruin too, if there be no other way, as God forbid, to whom I commit you; and rest as assuredly as heretofore, if you will be the same to me,

"Your lordship's faithful friend

"A. S."

That she had frequently meditated on suicide appears by another letter—"I could not be so unchristian as to be the cause of my own death. Consider what the world would conceive if I should be violently enforced to do it."

One fragment we may save as an evidence of her utter wretchedness.

"In all humility, the most wretched and unfortunate creature that ever lived, prostrates itself at the feet of the most merciful king that ever was, desiring nothing but mercy and favour, not being more afflicted for anything that for the losse of that which hath binne this long time the only comfort it had in the world, and which, if it were to do again, I would not adventure the losse for any other worldly comfort; mercy it is I desire, and that for God's sake!"

Such is the history of the Lady Arabella, who from some circumstance not sufficiently opened to us, was an important personage, designed by others, at least, to play a high character in the political drama. Thrice selected as a queen; but the consciousness of royalty was only left in her veins while she lived in the poverty of dependence. Many gallant spirits aspired after her hand, but when her heart secretly selected one beloved, it was for ever deprived of domestic happiness! She is said not to have been beautiful, and to have been beautiful; and her very portrait, ambiguous as her life, is neither one nor the other. She is said to have been a poetess, and not a single verse substantiates her claim to the laurel. She is said not to have been remarkable for her intellectual accomplishments, yet I have found a Latin letter of her composition in her manuscripts. The materials of her life are so scanty that it cannot be written, and yet we have sufficient reason to believe that it would be as pathetic as it would be extraordinary, could we narrate its involved incidents, and paint forth her delirious feelings. Acquainted rather with her conduct than with her character, for us the Lady Arabella has no palpable historical existence; and we perceive rather her shadow than herself! A writer of romance might render her one of those interesting personages whose griefs have been deepened by their royalty, and whose adventures touched with the warm hues of love and distraction, closed at the bars of her prison gate; a sad example of a female victim to the state!

"Through one dim lattice, fringed with ivy round,
Successive suns a languid radiance throng,
To paint how fierce her angry guardian frow'd,
To mark how fast her waning beauty flew!"

Seymour, who was afterwards permitted to return, distinguished himself by his loyalty through three successive reigns, and retained his romantic passion for the lady of his first affections; for he called the daughter he had by his second lady, by the ever-beloved name of ARABELLA STUART.

JOHN BUNCLE.

ABSTRACT OF THE "LIFE OF JOHN BUNCLE, ESQ. CONTAINING VARIOUS OBSERVATIONS AND REFLECTIONS MADE IN SEVERAL PARTS OF THE WORLD, AND MANY EXTRAORDINARY RELATIONS."

THOMAS AMORY, the son of a barrister and man of property, and author of this curious production, was an eccentric and singular man in his own person. He resided, about the year 1757, in Orchard-street, Westminster, at which time it was ascertained that he had a wife; but very little else of him is known, except that his appearance, as well as character, though both those of a gentleman, were extraordinary; and that after a recluse literary life, he died in 1789, at the great age of 97. In Buncle he is supposed to have drawn a portrait of himself; and an idealism more robust with materialities does not exist. Buncle is a most strange mixture of vehement unitarianism in faith, liberality in ordinary judgment, and jovial selfishness in practice. He is a liberal, bigoted, whimsical lawful sensualist. Animal pleasure is his dearest object; the law his warrant for it; grief a business that must be attended to. A wife is the crowning desire of his conscience; but as his fancy is to settle matters with conscience, a series of good fortunes of a very peculiar description (that is to say, the loss of seven wives in succession!!) enables him to be a kind of innocent Henry the Eighth. He argues a lady into the sacred condition of marriage, spends a delightful season with her, she dies in the very nick of time, and he studies as hard as he can to grieve for a while, in order that he may justify himself all the sooner in taking another. This is the regular process for the whole seven ! With amazing animal spirits, iron strength, little imagination, and a relishing gusto, he is an amusing and lively narrator, without interesting our sympathy in the least, except in the relish with which he eats, drinks, and makes matrimony. The work is in many volumes, crowded with all kinds of extraneous matter; but the perusal of which will amply repay all who have not time or patience for the larger work, of which our abstract is a still smaller specimen.

* These particulars I derive from the manuscript letters among the papers of Arabella Stuart. Har. MSS. 7003.

At College, John Bunce, according to his plan of making the most of his time in every thing, devoted his entire energies to academical studies. The first book that fell into his hands was Locke on the Understanding, upon the principles of which he made a rigid scrutiny of his own powers.

"After this I began to study the first principles of things. . . . I was satisfied that whatever the order of the world produces, is in the main, both just and good; and consequently that we ought in the best manner to support whatever hardships are to be endured for virtue's sake: that acquiescence, and complacency, without respect to accident and injuries, ought to be our duty under a perfect administration; and with benignity and constancy we must ever act, from a settled persuasion, that all things are framed and governed by a universal mind."

He became deeply versed in cosmography; mathematics, history, ethics,—and studied with earnest attention the writings of the old philosophers; appropriating every Sunday to the study of revealed religion. Fortified by a happy temper, a robust constitution, a determined reliance on the wisdom of Providence, and a dogma from the old writers for every mischance, our optimist sits himself down with a hearty relish to the feast of life. "On the glorious first of August," Mr. Bunce sets out with his gun and dog to "wander over the pleasant country." The weather is charming, the game plentiful. In the course of his wandering, he lights upon a beautiful garden in a valley. "Finding one of the garden doors left open, I entered immediately, and to screen myself from the scorching beams of the sun, got into an embowered alley, that led me to a large fountain in a ring or circular opening, and from thence, by a gradual, easy, shady ascent, to a semi-circular amphitheatre of evergreens that was charming to behold. In this were several seats for ease, repast, or retirement, and at each end of it a rotunda, or temple, of the Ionic order. One of them was converted into a grotto, or shell house, in which a politeness of fancy had produced and blended the greatest beauties of nature and decoration. The other was a library filled with the finest books, and a great variety of mathematical instruments. Here I saw Miss Noel sitting, and so intent on writing, that she did not take any notice of me, as I stood at the window, in astonishment looking at the things before me, and especially at the amazing beauty of her face, and the splendour of her eyes, as she raised them now and then from the paper she wrote on, to look in a book that lay open upon a small desk before her. The whole scene was so very uncommon and so amazing, that I thought myself, for a while, on some spot of magic ground, and almost doubted the reality of what my eyes beheld; till Miss Noel, by accident, looked full at me, and then came forward to the open window, to know whom I wanted. Before I could answer, I found a venerable old gentleman standing by my side." Bunce explains that curiosity and hunger led him to the house.

"If this be the case," says the good old man, "you are welcome, sir, to Eden-park, and you shall soon have the best breakfast our house affords." Upon this Mr. Noel brought me into his house, and the lovely Harriet made tea for me, and had such plenty of fine cream, and extraordinary bread and butter set before me, that I breakfasted with uncommon pleasure. The honour and happiness of her company rendered the repast quite delightful. There was a civility so very great in her manner, and a social goodness so charming in her talk and temper, that it was unspeakable delight to sit at table with her."

Miss Noel he finds so wonderful an assemblage of beauty, accomplishments, and learning, that he is rapturously amazed; and in the arts and sweets of erudition and theological controversy they pass their time till the period fixed for their marriage.

"This world is a series of visionary scenes, and contains so little solid, lasting felicity, as I have found it, that I cannot call life more than a deception; and as Swift says, he is the happiest man, who is best deceived. When I thought myself within a fortnight of being married to Miss Noel, and of being thereby made as completely happy in every respect as it was possible for a mortal man to be, the small pox stepped in, and in seven days time reduced the finest human frame in the universe to the most hideous and offensive block. The most amiable of human creatures mortified all over, and became a spectacle the most hideous and unbearable. This broke her father's heart in a month's time, and the paradise I had in view sunk into everlasting night."

Having suffered this disappointment, Mr. Bunce returns to Dublin to see his father. He finds him married to his maid-servant, and his indulgence for her, and a nephew she had brought into the house, is unbounded. "Money, clothes, servants, horses, dogs, and all things he could fancy, were given him in abundance; and to please the basest of women, and the most cruel step-mother that ever ill-luck inspired to make the son of another woman miserable, I was denied almost everything. The fine allowance I had at the university was taken from me. . . .

"Nor was this all the hard measures I received; I was ordered by my father to become the young man's preceptor; to spend my precious time in teaching this youngster, and in labouring to make the little despicable dunce a scholar. All this was more than I could bear. My life became insupportable, and I resolved to range even the wilds of Africa, if nothing better offered, rather than live a miserable slave under the cruel tyranny of those unrelenting oppressors. Indeed, it was impossible for me to stay at home, for my father took no notice of me, and my mother-in-law and the boy did all they could invent to render my life miserable."

He proceeds to England. On the passage he is lucky enough to render assistance to a very charming young lady (a fellow-passenger). On landing they cannot speedily determine to separate.

"Miss Melmoth and I continued at the Talbot for three weeks; and during that time, breakfasted, dined, and supped together. Except the hours of sleep we were scarcely from each other. We walked out together every day for hours, conversed, sometimes went to cards, and often she sung while I played my flute. With the greatest civility, and the most exact good manners, we were as intimate as if we had been acquainted for ages, and we found a satisfaction in each other's company, as great as lovers generally experience; yet not so much as one syllable of the passion was mentioned; not the least hint of love on either side was given, while we stayed at Whitehaven, and I believe neither of us had a thought of it. It was a friendship the most pure and exalted, that commenced at my saving her life in the manner I have related, and by some strange kind of magic, our notions and inclinations, tempers and sentiments, had acquired such a sameness in a few days, that we seemed as two spiritual Socias, or duplicates of each other's mind. Body was quite out of the case, though this lady had an extravagance of beauty. My sole delight was that fine perception which shed a lustre on her outward charms. How long this state of things would have lasted, had we continued more time together, and had the image of the late Miss Noel been more effaced, or worn out of the sensorium of my head, I cannot say; but while it did last, there could be nothing more strange than to see two young people of different sexes, in the highest spirits and most confirmed health, live together for twenty-one days, perfectly pleased with each other, entirely at their own disposal, and as to fortune, having abundantly enough between them both, for comfortable life, and yet never utter one word, nor give a look, that could be construed into a declaration of the passion, or a tendency towards a more intimate union; to complete that connexion which nature and Providence require of beings circumstanced as we were. This was very strange. Till the clock struck twelve every night we sat up, and talked of a variety of things, from the Bibles down to the clouds of Aristophanes, and from the comedies and tragedies of Greece and Rome to the Minerva of Sanctius and Hickee's Northern Thesaurus. Instead of Venus or any of her court, our conversations would often be on the morals of Cicero, his academies, and De Finibus; on the English or the Roman History, Shakespeare's scenes of nature, or maps of life; whether the Edipus or the Electra of Sophocles was the best tragedy; and the scenes in which Plautus and Terence most excelled. Like two critics, or two grammarians, antiquaries, historians, or philosophers, would we pass the evening with the greatest cheerfulness and delight."

He does not part from Miss Melmoth without a promise to meet her again. He sets out for Yorkshire to seek the friendship and assistance of Charles Turner. "Having thus lost my charming companion, I travelled into a vast valley, enclosed by mountains whose tops were above the clouds, and soon came into a country that is wilder than the Campagna of Rome, or the uncultivated vales of the Alps or Appennines. Warm with a classical enthusiasm, I journeyed on, and with fancy's eye beheld the rural divinities, in those sacred woods and groves which shade the sides of many of the vast surrounding fells, and the shores and promontories of many lovely lakes and bright running streams. For several hours I travelled over mountains tremendous to behold, and through vales the finest in the world. Not a man nor a house could I see in eight hours time; but towards five in the afternoon, there appeared at the foot of a hill a delightfully-situated cottage that was half covered with trees, and stood by the side of a large falling stream; a vale extended from the south to the door, that was terminated with rocks and precipices on precipices, in an amazing point of view, and through the flowery ground the water was beautifully seen as it wound to a deeper flood at the bottom of the vale. Half-a-dozen cows were grazing in view; and a few flocks of feeding sheep added to the beauties of the scene."

In Farmer Price, the owner of the place, he discovers a schoolfellow; a fellow of most admirable spirit, charming wife, and plentiful table. Leaving Price, he wanders for a time among the Stainmore Hills. In his wanderings he comes upon a delightful grotto, which, with some neighbouring cottages, forms the habitation of a little female co-operating society, the two principal ladies of which are most "excellent in reason, philosophy, and mathematics," and out-talk and out-reason Mr. Bunce in algebra and theology;

they cultivate their intellect, garden, and live stock; and, accordingly, reason, laugh, and feed entirely to Bunce's admiration.

He next discovers a pretty hermitage in an open plain like a ring, and, going up to it, finds the skeleton of a man. "He lay on a couch in an inward room without any covering, and the bones were as clean and white as if they had come from the surgeon's hands. The ants to be sure, had eaten off the flesh. Who the man was, a paper lying on the table in a strong box, informed me." It is the skeleton of John Orton, a most desperate sinner, who, at the age of forty, repenting of his wicked life, gave up all his property to the poor, except what was sufficient to provide him with this retreat. Of Orton Lodge Bunce takes possession, and makes it in future his home. After a variety of adventures, leaping, riding, and tumbling about, among the hills of Stainmore he discovers his friend's house; but his friend is abroad. A few more adventures and again he meets Miss Melmoth, to whom he is married.

"Two years, almost, this fine scene lasted, and during that period the business and diversions of our lovely retreat, appeared so various and pleasing that it was not possible to think a hundred years so spent, in the least degree, dull and tedious. Exclusive of books and gardening, and the improvement of the farms, we had, during the fine season, a thousand charming amusements on the mountains, and in the glens and valleys of that sweet silent place. Whole days we would spend in fishing, and in some cool grot by the water-side, or under an aged tree, on the margin of some beautiful stream."

"Another of our amusements, during the summer's bright day, was the pointer and gun, for the black cock, the moor cock, and the cock of the wood, which are in great plenty on those vast hills. Charlotte was fond of this sport, and would walk with me for hours, to see me knock down the game; till, late in the evening, we would wander over the fells, and then return to our clean peaceful little house, to sup as elegantly on our birds as the great could do, and with a harmony and unmixed joy they are for ever strangers to. After supper, over some little nectared bowl we sweetly chatted, till it was bedtime; or I played on my flute, and Charlotte divinely sung." At the expiration of two years death deprived him of his Charlotte. He is for a while absorbed in grief, but speedily shakes off useless sorrow, locks up his house, and, with his boy O'Fin, mounts his horse.—"The sun was rising when we mounted our horses, and I again went out to try my fortune in the world; not like the Chevalier of La Mancha, in hopes of conquering a kingdom, or marrying some great princess; but to see if I could find another country girl for a wife, and get a little more money, as they were the only two things united that could secure me from melancholy, and confer real happiness."

He soon meets with another skeleton sitting in a library in the middle of the garden. It is the remains of a philosopher who thus constituted himself a memento mori for his friends and relations. With the daughter of this skeleton, the illustrious Statia, Mr. Bunce is united in holy wedlock. In two years time she is laid by the side of Charlotte. "Thus did I become again a mourner. I sat with my eyes shut for three days; but at last called for my horse, to try what air, exercise, and a variety of objects could do."

A Miss Crammer next adorns Orton's Lodge, but in a little more than two years, "I laid my Antonia by my Charlotte and my Statia, and then rode off"—to Harrowgate.

We must slip over the fine description of six gentlemen he meets with at Harrowgate, (a description of the most lively gusto) of O'Regan, Lawyer Cock, and the beauties he secures from his clutches. Want of room curtails our wishes.

Maria Spence, admirable in the Arithmetic of fluxions, is the fourth Mrs. Bunce. She dies in six months of a complication of physicians. "Having lost my Maria I went up to London." On his way, at a village inn, he was shown into a room where two gentlemen were sitting each with a porringer of mutton broth before him. "One of them seemed a little consumptive creature about four feet six inches high, uncommonly thin, or rather exsiccated to a cuticle. His broth and bread, however, he supped up with some relish. He seemed to be above three score. The other was a young man, once very handsome, tall, and strong; but so consumed and weak that he could hardly speak or stir. He attempted to get down his broth, but not above a spoonful or two could he swallow. He appeared to be a dying man. While I beheld these things with astonishment, the servant brought in dinner, a pound of rump steaks, and a quart of green peas, two cuts of bread, a tankard of strong beer, and a pint of port wine. With a fine appetite, I soon dispatched my mess; and over my wine, to help digestion, began to sing the following lines.—"

Miss Turner is his fifth, and consequently soon in the church-yard.

He is introduced to a seventh lady, by Curll, the bookseller, but, like his first-love, she is buried before the marriage takes place.

A Miss Fitzgibbon supplies her place for a while, but soon takes her turn in the church-yard. Miss Dunk, however, is not ultimately disappointed. The resurrection men and Dr. Stanville restore her to life. The Doctor makes a wife of his anatomical subject, and conveniently dies that Bunce may fulfil his original intentions towards her. The lovely Agnes is the last of Mr. Bunce's matrimonial speculations. He wanders about the world for nine years, and at last, having done with hopes and fears for ever, he quietly settles himself at Orton Lodge, to moralize and prepare for death.

FEMALE CONVICTS.

FROM DR. LANG'S "HISTORICAL AND STATISTICAL ACCOUNT OF NEW SOUTH WALES," (just published) the fullest and best account we have yet seen, the work of a zealous and conscientious man.

When a female convict-ship arrives in the harbour, the circumstance is duly announced in the Government Gazette, and families requiring female servants are invited to make application according to a prescribed form. The applications are generally more numerous than the government can meet, and the females are assigned only to reputable families, according to the best judgment of the board appointed for the purpose. Many of them make good servants, and in due time get well married—chiefly to emancipated convicts, living either as agriculturalists in the country or in one or other of the various capacities in which the lower classes are employed in towns; the colonial government being always willing to grant permission for the marriage of a female convict, provided she is either a spinster or a widow, and provided the intended husband is a freeman and able to maintain a family.

It sometimes unfortunately happens, however, that the female-convict, who has an opportunity of forming an eligible connexion in this way, and thereby acquiring her immediate liberty, has a husband alive in England, or has been imprudent enough to declare herself married on her arrival in the colony, under the idea that she will be more respected, forsooth, (for that is the usual account of the matter,) as a married woman. In such cases, it becomes a matter of importance to prove either the death or the non-existence of the English husband, and the expedients that are resorted to with this view are often highly ingenious. About seven years ago, I solemnized a marriage between a reputable young man, a native of the colony, and a female-convict who had been transported from Paisley, in the west of Scotland, for some mal-practices in a manufacturing establishment in which she had been employed. The young man was a carpenter, and it seemed his Scotch wife turned out so much to his satisfaction, that his brother was induced to think seriously of espousing another Scotch female-convict who had arrived by the same vessel from the same part of Scotland. The brother's intended was the assigned servant of a respectable Scotch family residing near Sydney, and was naturally enough desirous of being on her own hands, as the wife of a free mechanic who could earn from thirty shillings to two pounds sterling a-week; but she had a husband in Paisley, and how to get him disposed of was the difficulty, for she had duly informed the government of her being a married woman on her arrival in the colony. The difficulty, however, was not too great to be surmounted—at least the parties thought so—and a letter was accordingly written, purporting to have come from some relative of the female's in Paisley, and communicating the distressing intelligence of the Scotch husband's death. The letter was brought me for my perusal by the two brothers, with a view to my soliciting permission from government (which must uniformly be obtained in the first instance by some clergyman of the territory, in the case of either party being a convict, for the publication of banns) I observed to the young men, before reading the letter, that it had no post-mark; but they readily explained that circumstance, by informing me that it had been brought out by the Scotch carpenter of a convict-ship lately arrived, who knew the parties; and, indeed, the exterior of it bore the appearance of its having been for months in a carpenter's tool-chest, or in some situation in which it would have been equally soiled. The letter was dated sufficiently far back for the accomplishment of a voyage to New South Wales in the interval, and was written with great ingenuity. It communicated a variety of particulars relative to persons and events in the town of Paisley, which in any ordinary case would have given it the indisputable character of a genuine letter. There were even a few incidental notices respecting one of the ministers of Paisley, which were exceedingly well conceived for the purpose of practising on clerical gullibility. Unfortunately, however, in lamenting, towards the close of the letter, that the female-convict to whom it was addressed was destined to spend the remainder of her days in so distant a part of the earth, the letter-writer had written the word earth in the cockney style—hearth. It immediately struck me that this peculiar English species of bad-spelling could not have occurred so far north as the town of Paisley, where the vowel-sound commencing a word is never aspirated; and I, therefore, returned the letter to the young men, telling them that I was persuaded that it had been written in the colony, and that no such marriage as they contemplated would be allowed by the government. A few weeks thereafter, the woman absconded from her master's service, and was married to the currency-lad, by an episcopal clergyman in the interior, as a free-woman. As her flight, however, was immediately reported to the authorities, she was traced, apprehended, and sent to the third class in the factory—the place of punishment for female-convicts—the marriage being null and void.

Many of the female convicts conduct themselves in an unexceptionable manner, and rear large families of interesting and promising children, when reputedly married in the colony; for it is not an unusual case for a woman, who has been exceedingly depraved and absolutely unmanageable in a single state, to conduct herself with propriety when advantageously married. Others, however, are indifferent enough in either condition, and when assigned as servants to respectable families are got rid of and returned to Government with all convenient speed. But the fault is by no means uniformly on the side of the convict. A remark—which I recollect having heard the eccentric, but truly apostolic, Rowland Hill, make at a public meeting of the friends of a Female Penitentiary Society in London many years ago—is unfortunately too well suited to the meridian of New South Wales: "Mistresses are always complaining," said the venerable old man, "or their having bad servants; but I will tell you what, ladies, there are a great many bad mistresses too."

There are instances of persons of the industrious classes of society, who have arrived free in the colony, marrying female convicts, and having no reason subsequently to regret the step they have taken. The experiment, however, is a dangerous one, and is sometimes attended with a different result. About seven years ago, a reputable Scotch mechanic, who was able shortly after his arrival in the colony to take jobs on his own account, was infatuated enough to marry a female convict of prepossessing appearance, but unfortunately of little else to recommend her. Previous to his marriage, he had been regular in his attendance on the ordinances of religion; but his wife had various other more eligible modes of spending the Sabbath than going to church, and he had accordingly to accompany her on Sunday-excursions of pleasure to the country. Unfortunately, however, his wife very soon got into trouble, as it is technically termed in the colony; i.e. into the commission of some crime or misdemeanour, which issues in the individual's flagellation, or imprisonment, or transportation, or death by law—for the phrase is sufficiently extensive in its signification. She had been concerned in a riot, which two free persons lodging in her husband's cottage had raised during his absence, and was immediately carried by the constables before the police magistrate of Sydney, who decides in a summary manner in all cases in which convicts, whether married or not, are concerned. The offender was in this instance sentenced to three months confinement, in the third or lowest class in the factory at Paramatta. One of the rules of that institution is, that no female shall be admitted into the third class without having previously undergone the operation of shaving the head; and the poor husband was in this instance so much distressed at the very appearance which he thought his wife would exhibit, when divested of her hair, that he actually called at my house to request that I would forward a petition which he had prepared to the authorities, that the operation might for once be dispensed with in his wife's favour. During the conversation that took place on the occasion, I took an opportunity to remind the Scotchman of his recent neglect of the ordinances of religion, and I saw him in church for a few Sabbaths thereafter. His wife, however, returned to him again at the expiration of her sentence, and I saw him no more.

When female convicts are returned to Government by the families to which they have been assigned, or are sentenced to punishment by the magistrates for petty misdemeanours, they are forwarded in a covered wagon to a sort of Bridewell at Paramatta, called the Female Factory, in which there are generally from two to five hundred female convicts, under the charge of a respectable matron and the superintendence of a committee of management. They are divided into three classes. The First Class consists of those who from particular circumstances have not been assigned as maid-servants to private families on their arrival in the colony, or of those who have been returned to Government by their masters without having any crime charged against them, or of those whose good conduct has merited their elevation from the inferior classes. All the females of this class are assigned as maid-servants, on being applied for by reputable persons, in the same way as on the arrival of a female convict-ship, the state of the Factory being announced weekly for the information of the public in the Government Gazette. The Third Class consists of incorrigible females, or of those who have been sentenced to a certain period of penal confinement in the Factory on account of some misdemeanour; and the Second Class consists of those who have served out their period of sentence in the Third, and who are undergoing probation ere they are again advanced to the First. The inmates of the Factory are employed variously, according to their characters and stations in the establishment, but chiefly in the processes connected with the manufacture of coarse woollen cloth, called Paramatta cloth, of which blankets and slop-clothing are made for the convict-servants of settlers throughout the territory.

With a view to disperse the female convicts more widely over the territory, and to enable respectable families in the interior to procure female servants with greater facility, the present Governor has established subordinate factories at Bathurst and Hunter's River, to which a proportion of the female convicts from each ship are forwarded on their arrival, and in which those that have been returned to Government by their masters are kept for re-assignment in the district; and I am happy to add that the measure is likely to be attended with great benefit. Indeed, the system of management pursued for a long time previous, in regard to that portion of the prison-population of the colony, was obviously and outrageously preposterous. For instead of adopting every possible means to effect the dispersion of the female convicts, that they might at least have some chance of getting reputedly settled, and even winking at pettier peccadilloes for the accomplishment of so important an object, they were generally immured, to the number of five or six hundred, within stone-walls and iron-gates. The impolicy of such a system will appear from the following consideration, in addition to various others that will naturally suggest themselves to the reader, viz., that there are frequent instances in the colony, as I have already had occasion to observe, of females who had been perfectly unmanageable when imprisoned in the Factory, subsequently becoming remarkably quiet and well-behaved wives and mothers of children.

There are comparatively few instances of female convicts committing capital offences in New South Wales. An instance of the kind, however, happened to fall under my own observation several years ago, in the following rather singular way. I was proceeding alone in a gig one Monday morning to solemnize a marriage at a considerable distance in the interior, when a young man, decently attired in the garb of a sailor or ship carpenter, who was walking towards Sydney, requested to know whether I was some other person whom he named. There was a feeling of distress evidently portrayed in the young man's countenance, that induced me to ask him some question that immediately elicited his affecting story. He had arrived in the colony a few months before, as the carpenter of a convict ship, and finding that he could obtain eligible employment in Sydney, had obtained his discharge from the vessel, and remained on shore. On the Saturday evening previous, he was sitting in his lodging after having finished his week's labour, when some person, entering the house, incidentally mentioned that he had just been at the Supreme-Court, and had heard sentence of death pronounced on a man and woman for robbing their master, a respectable settler residing about forty miles from Sydney. The name of the woman, which the stranger also mentioned at the time, coinciding with that of a sister of his own, who had suddenly disappeared from her father's house in London about two or three years before, and never afterwards been heard of by her relatives, it immediately struck him that the woman might possibly be his lost sister. He accordingly went forth with to the jail, and having obtained admittance, found to his inexpressible grief, that the woman under sentence of death was actually his own sister. His parents, he told me, were poor, but honest people, who had reared a large family of eight or nine children, and she was the only one of the number who had gone astray. On consulting some person as to what was proper for him to do in such circumstances, he was told to get a memorial to the governor, drawn up on his sister's behalf, and to have it recommended, if possible, by her master. He, therefore, went forthwith to a person in Sydney who wrote memorials for hire, and got a document of the kind drawn up. The writer was an emancipated convict, and the memorial was written in the usual style of such writers—taking for granted, as a matter of course, and strongly protesting the innocence of the criminal, and insinuating that her present situation is the result of misfortune rather than of misconduct. It was eleven o'clock at night before the precious document, which cost, if I recollect aright, two dollars, was finished; but, as soon as it was completed, the young man, who had never been a mile out of Sydney before, instantly set off alone and on foot through the gloomy forest to the residence of his sister's late master, to request him to recommend the memorial. He had reached his destination, and had got about half way to Sydney on his return, when I met him on the following Monday morning. On reading the memorial, I was apprehensive it would rather do harm than good, and therefore desired the young man to accompany me to a house a little way on, where we could obtain materials for writing, and where I should write something, which I had reason to hope would be of more service to him. The young man gladly accepted of my offer; and I accordingly wrote a short account of the manner in which he had discovered, and the anxiety he had manifested on her behalf, soliciting that if the ends of justice could possibly be attained by a milder punishment, the feelings of the community might not be outraged by the execution of a female, who had probably been herself the unhappy victim of some unprincipled seducer. The young man was extremely grateful for the little service done him, and I was happy to learn afterwards that his unfortunate sister's sentence of death was commuted into a milder punishment.

TABLE TALK.

Egyptian Doctors. In Egypt each physician studied one, and only one part of the body, a circumstance which multiplied them to a vast extent, as Herodotus particularly remarks in his Euterpe. Romance of Ancient History. It must have been curious to have been obliged to send for three different doctors, in case you had pains in the arms, head, and chest. The "members of the profession" might have called their trade the "profession of the members."

himself all the sooner in taking another. This is the regular process for the whole seven ! With amazing animal spirits, iron strength, little imagination, and a relishing gusto, he is an amusing and lively narrator, without interesting our sympathy in the least, except in the relish with which he eats, drinks, and makes matrimony. The work is in many volumes, crowded with all kinds of extraneous matter; but the perusal of which will amply repay all who have not time or patience for the larger work, of which our abstract is a still smaller specimen.

At College, John Bunicle, according to his plan of making the most of his time in every thing, devoted his entire energies to academical studies. The first book that fell into his hands was Locke on the Understanding, upon the principles of which he made a rigid scrutiny of his own powers.

"After this I began to study the first principles of things . . . I was satisfied that whatever the order of the world produces, is in the main, both just and good; and consequently that we ought in the best manner to support whatever hardships are to be endured for virtue's sake: that acquiescence, and complacency, without respect to accident and injuries, ought to be our duty under a perfect administration; and with benignity and constancy we must ever act, from a settled persuasion, that all things are framed and governed by a universal mind."

He became deeply versed in cosmography; mathematics, history, ethics,—and studied with earnest attention the writings of the old philosophers; appropriating every Sunday to the study of revealed religion. Fortified by a happy temper, a robust constitution, a determined reliance on the wisdom of Providence, and a dogma from the old writers for every mischance, our optimist sits himself down with a hearty relish to the feast of life. "On the glorious first of August," Mr. Bunicle sets out with his gun and dog to "wander over the pleasant country." The weather is charming, the game plentiful. In the course of his wandering, he lights upon a beautiful garden in a valley. "Finding one of the garden doors left open, I entered immediately, and to screen myself from the scorching beams of the sun, got into an embowered alley, that led me to a large fountain in a ring or circular opening, and from thence, by a gradual, easy, shady ascent, to a semi-circular amphitheatre of evergreens that was charming to behold. In this were several seats for ease, repast, or retirement, and at each end of it a rotunda, or temple, of the Ionic order. One of them was converted into a grotto, or shell house, in which a politeness of fancy had reduced and blended the greatest beauties of nature and decoration. The other was a library filled with the finest books, and a great variety of mathematical instruments. Here I saw Miss Noel sitting, and so intent on writing, that she did not take any notice of me, as I stood at the window, in astonishment looking at the things before me, and especially at the amazing beauty of her face, and the splendour of her eyes, as she raised them now and then from the paper she wrote on, to look in a book that lay open upon a small desk before her. The whole scene was so very uncommon and so amazing, that I thought myself, for a while, on some spot of magic ground, and almost doubted the reality of what my eyes beheld; till Miss Noel, by accident, looked full at me, and then came forward to the open window, to know whom I wanted. Before I could answer, I found a venerable old gentleman standing by my side." Bunicle explains that curiosity and hunger led him to the house.

"If this be the case," says the good old man, "you are welcome, sir, to Eden-park, and you shall soon have the best breakfast our house affords." Upon this Mr. Noel brought me into his house, and the lovely Harriet made tea for me, and had such plenty of fine cream, and extraordinary bread and butter set before me, that I breakfasted with uncommon pleasure. The honour and happiness of her company rendered the repast quite delightful. There was a civility so very great in her manner, and a social goodness so charming in her talk and temper, that it was unspeakable delight to sit at table with her."

Miss Noel he finds so wonderful an assemblage of beauty, accomplishments, and learning, that he is rapturously amazed; and in the arts and sweets of erudition and theological controversy they pass their time till the period fixed for their marriage.

"This world is a series of visionary scenes, and contains so little solid, lasting felicity, as I have found it, that I cannot call life more than a deception; and as Swift says, he is the happiest man, who is best deceived. When I thought myself within a fortnight of being married to Miss Noel, and of being thereby made as completely happy in every respect as it was possible for a mortal man to be, the small pox stepped in, and in seven days time reduced the finest human frame in the universe to the most hideous and offensive block. The most amiable of human creatures mortified all over, and became a spectacle the most hideous and unbearable. This broke her father's heart in a month's time, and the paradise I had in view sunk into everlasting night."

Having suffered this disappointment, Mr. Bunicle returns to Dublin to see his father. He finds him married to his maid-servant, and his indulgence for her, and a nephew she had brought into the house, is unbounded. "Money, clothes, servants, horses, dogs, and all things he could fancy, were given him in abundance; and to please the basest of women, and the most cruel step-mother that ever ill-luck inspired to make the son of another woman miserable, I was denied almost everything. The fine allowance I had at the university was taken from me. . . .

"Nor was this all the hard measures I received; I was ordered by my father to become the young man's preceptor; to spend my precious time in teaching this youngster, and in labouring to make the little despicable dunce a scholar. All this was more than I could bear. My life became insupportable, and I resolved to range even the wilds of Africa, if nothing better offered, rather than live a miserable slave under the cruel tyranny of those unrelenting oppressors. Indeed, it was impossible for me to stay at home, for my father took no notice of me, and my mother-in-law and the boy did all they could invent to render my life miserable."

He proceeds to England. On the passage he is lucky enough to render assistance to a very charming young lady (a fellow-passenger). On landing they cannot speedily determine to separate.

"Miss Melmoth and I continued at the Talbot for three weeks; and during that time, breakfasted, dined, and supped together. Except the hours of sleep we were scarcely from each other. We walked out together every day for hours, conversed, sometimes went to cards, and often she sung while I played my flute. With the greatest civility, and the most exact good manners, we were as intimate as if we had been acquainted for ages, and we found a satisfaction in each other's company, as great as lovers generally experience; yet not so much as one syllable of the passion was mentioned; not the least hint of love on either side was given, while we stayed at Whitehaven, and I believe neither of us had a thought of it. It was a friendship the most pure and exalted, that commenced at my saving her life in the manner I have related, and by some strange kind of magic, our notions and inclinations, tempers and sentiments, had acquired such a sameness in a few days, that we seemed as two spiritual Socias, or duplicates of each other's mind. Body was quite out of the case, though this lady had an extravagance of beauty. My sole delight was that fine perception which shed a lustre on her outward charms. How long this state of things would have lasted, had we continued more time together, and had the image of the late Miss Noel been more effaced, or worn out of the sensorium of my head, I cannot say; but while it did last, there could be nothing more strange than to see two young people of different sexes, in the highest spirits and most confirmed health, live together for twenty-one days, perfectly pleased with each other, entirely at their own disposal, and as to fortune, having abundantly enough between them both, for comfortable life, and yet never utter one word, nor give a look, that could be construed into a declaration of the passion, or a tendency towards a more intimate union; to complete that connexion which nature and Providence require of beings circumstanced as we were. This was very strange. Till the clock struck twelve every night we sat up, and talked of a variety of things, from the Bibles down to the clouds of Aristophanes, and from the comedies and tragedies of Greece and Rome to the Minerva of Sanctius and Hickee's Northern Thesaurus. Instead of Venus or any of her court, our conversations would often be on the morals of Cicero, his academies, and De Finibus; on the English or the Roman History, Shakespeare's scenes of nature, or maps of life; whether the Cædipus or the Electra of Sophocles was the best tragedy; and the scenes in which Plautus and Terence most excelled. Like two critics, or two grammarians, antiquaries, historians, or philosophers, would we pass the evening with the greatest cheerfulness and delight."

He does not part from Miss Melmoth without a promise to meet her again. He sets out for Yorkshire to seek the friendship and assistance of Charles Turner. "Having thus lost my charming companion, I travelled into a vast valley, enclosed by mountains whose tops were above the clouds, and soon came into a country that is wilder than the Campagna of Rome, or the uncultivated vales of the Alps or Appennines. Warm with a classical enthusiasm, I journeyed on, and with fancy's eye beheld the rural divinities, in those sacred woods and groves which shade the sides of many of the vast surrounding fells, and the shores and promontories of many lovely lakes and bright running streams. For several hours I travelled over mountains tremendous to behold, and through vales the finest in the world. Not a man nor a house could I see in eight hours time; but towards five in the afternoon, there appeared at the foot of a hill a delightfully-situated cottage that was half covered with trees, and stood by the side of a large falling stream; a vale extended from the south to the door, that was terminated with rocks and precipices on precipices, in an amazing point of view, and through the flowery ground the water was beautifully seen as it wound to a deeper flood at the bottom of the vale. Half-a-dozen cows were grazing in view; and a few flocks of feeding sheep added to the beauties of the scene."

In Farmer Price, the owner of the place, he discovers a schoolfellow; a fellow of most admirable spirit, charming wife, and plentiful table. Leaving Price, he wanders for a time among the Stainmore Hills. In his wanderings he comes upon a delightful grotto, which, with some neighbouring cottages, forms the habitation of a little female co-operating society, the two principal ladies of which are most "excellent in reason, philosophy, and mathematics," and out-talk and out-reason Mr. Bunicle in algebra and theology;

they cultivate their intellect, garden, and live stock; and, accordingly, reason, laugh, and feed entirely to Bunicle's admiration.

He next discovers a pretty hermitage in an open plain like a ring, and, going up to it, finds the skeleton of a man. "He lay on a couch in an inward room without any covering, and the bones were as clean and white as if they had come from the surgeon's hands. The ants to be sure, had eaten off the flesh. Who the man was, a paper lying on the table in a strong box, informed me." It is the skeleton of John Orton, a most desperate sinner, who, at the age of forty, repenting of his wicked life, gave up all his property to the poor, except what was sufficient to provide him with this retreat. Of Orton Lodge Bunicle takes possession, and makes it in future his home. After a variety of adventures, leaping, riding, and tumbling about, among the hills of Stainmore he discovers his friend's house; but his friend is abroad. A few more adventures and again he meets Miss Melmoth, to whom he is married.

"Two years, almost, this fine scene lasted, and during that period the business and diversions of our lovely retreat, appeared so various and pleasing that it was not possible to think a hundred years so spent, in the least degree, dull and tedious. Exclusive of books and gardening, and the improvement of the farms, we had, during the fine season, a thousand charming amusements on the mountains, and in the glens and valleys of that sweet silent place. Whole days we would spend in fishing, and in some cool grot by the water-side, or under an aged tree, on the margin of some beautiful stream."

"Another of our amusements, during the summer's bright day, was the pointer and gun, for the black cock, the moor cock, and the cock of the wood, which are in great plenty on those vast hills. Charlotte was fond of this sport, and would walk with me for hours, to see me knock down the game; till, late in the evening, we would wander over the fells, and then return to our clean peaceful little house, to sup as elegantly on our birds as the great could do, and with a harmony and unmixed joy they are for ever strangers to. After supper, over some little nectared bowl we sweetly chatted, till it was bedtime; or I played on my flute, and Charlotte divinely sung." At the expiration of two years death deprived him of his Charlotte. He is for a while absorbed in grief, but speedily shakes off useless sorrow, locks up his house, and, with his boy O'Fin, mounts his horse.—"The sun was rising when we mounted our horses, and I again went out to try my fortune in the world; not like the Chevalier of La Mancha, in hopes of conquering a kingdom, or marrying some great princess; but to see if I could find another country girl for a wife, and get a little more money, as they were the only two things united that could secure me from melancholy, and confer real happiness."

He soon meets with another skeleton sitting in a library in the middle of the garden. It is the remains of a philosopher who thus constituted himself a memento mori for his friends and relations. With the daughter of this skeleton, the illustrious Statia, Mr. Bunicle is united in holy wedlock. In two years time she is laid by the side of Charlotte. "Thus did I become again a mourner. I sat with my eyes shut for three days; but at last called for my horse, to try what air, exercise, and a variety of objects could do."

A Miss Cranmer next adorns Orton's Lodge, but in a little more than two years, "I laid my Antonia by my Charlotte and my Statia, and then rode off"—to Harrowgate.

We must slip over the fine description of six gentlemen he meets with at Harrowgate, (a description of the most lively gusto) of O'Regan, Lawyer Cock, and the beauties he secures from his clutches. Want of room curtails our wishes.

Maria Spence, admirable in the Arithmetic of fluxions, is the fourth Mrs. Bunicle. She dies in six months of a complication of physicians. "Having lost my Maria I went up to London." On his way, at a village inn, he was shown into a room where two gentlemen were sitting each with a porringer of mutton broth before him. "One of them seemed a little consumptive creature about four feet six inches high, uncommonly thin, or rather exsiccated to a cuticle. His broth and bread, however, he supped up with some relish. He seemed to be above three score. The other was a young man, once very handsome, tall, and strong; but so consumed and weak that he could hardly speak or stir. He attempted to get down his broth, but not above a spoonful or two could he swallow. He appeared to be a dying man. While I beheld these things with astonishment, the servant brought in dinner, a pound of rump steaks, and a quart of green peas, two cuts of bread, a tankard of strong beer, and a pint of port wine. With a fine appetite, I soon dispatched my mess; and over my wine, to help digestion, began to sing the following lines.—"

Miss Turner is his fifth, and consequently soon in the church-yard.

He is introduced to a seventh lady, by Curll, the bookseller, but, like his first-love, she is buried before the marriage takes place.

A Miss Fitzgibbon supplies her place for a while, but soon takes her turn in the church-yard. Miss Dunk, however, is not ultimately disappointed. The resurrection men and Dr. Stanville restore her to life. The Doctor makes a wife of his anatomical subject, and conveniently dies that Bunce may fulfil his original intentions towards her. The lovely Agnes is the last of Mr. Bunce's matrimonial speculations. He wanders about the world for nine years, and at last, having done with hopes and fears for ever, he quietly settles himself at Orton Lodge, to moralize and prepare for death.

FEMALE CONVICTS.

FROM DR. LANG'S "HISTORICAL AND STATISTICAL ACCOUNT OF NEW SOUTH WALES," (just published) the fullest and best account we have yet seen, the work of a zealous and conscientious man.

WHEN a female convict-ship arrives in the harbour, the circumstance is duly announced in the Government Gazette, and families requiring female servants are invited to make application according to a prescribed form. The applications are generally more numerous than the government can meet, and the females are assigned only to reputable families, according to the best judgment of the board appointed for the purpose. Many of them make good servants, and in due time get well married—chiefly to emancipated convicts, living either as agriculturalists in the country or in one or other of the various capacities in which the lower classes are employed in towns; the colonial government being always willing to grant permission for the marriage of a female convict, provided she is either a spinster or a widow, and provided the intended husband is a freeman and able to maintain a family.

It sometimes unfortunately happens, however, that the female-convict, who has an opportunity of forming an eligible connexion in this way, and thereby acquiring her immediate liberty, has a husband alive in England, or has been imprudent enough to declare herself married on her arrival in the colony, under the idea that she will be more respected, forsooth, (for that is the usual account of the matter,) as a married woman. In such cases, it becomes a matter of importance to prove either the death or the non-existence of the English husband, and the expedients that are resorted to with this view are often highly ingenious. About seven years ago, I solemnized a marriage between a reputable young man, a native of the colony, and a female-convict who had been transported from Paisley, in the west of Scotland, for some mal-practices in a manufacturing establishment in which she had been employed. The young man was a carpenter, and it seemed his Scotch wife turned out so much to his satisfaction, that his brother was induced to think seriously of espousing another Scotch female-convict who had arrived by the same vessel from the same part of Scotland. The brother's intended was the assigned servant of a respectable Scotch family residing near Sydney, and was naturally enough desirous of being on her own hands, as the wife of a free mechanic who could earn from thirty shillings to two pounds sterling a-week; but she had a husband in Paisley, and how to get him disposed of was the difficulty, for she had duly informed the government of her being a married woman on her arrival in the colony. The difficulty, however, was not too great to be surmounted—at least the parties thought so—and a letter was accordingly written, purporting to have come from some relative of the female's in Paisley, and communicating the distressing intelligence of the Scotch husband's death. The letter was brought me for my perusal by the two brothers, with a view to my soliciting permission from government (which must uniformly be obtained in the first instance by some clergyman of the territory, in the case of either party being a convict, for the publication of banns). I observed to the young men, before reading the letter, that it had no post-mark; but they readily explained that circumstance, by informing me that it had been brought out by the Scotch carpenter of a convict-ship lately arrived, who knew the parties; and, indeed, the exterior of it bore the appearance of its having been for months in a carpenter's tool-chest, or in some situation in which it would have been equally soiled. The letter was dated sufficiently far back for the accomplishment of a voyage to New South Wales in the interval, and was written with great ingenuity. It communicated a variety of particulars relative to persons and events in the town of Paisley, which in any ordinary case would have given it the indisputable character of a genuine letter. There were even a few incidental notices respecting one of the ministers of Paisley, which were exceedingly well conceived for the purpose of practising on clerical gullibility. Unfortunately, however, in lamenting, towards the close of the letter, that the female-convict to whom it was addressed was destined to spend the remainder of her days in so distant a part of the earth, the letter-writer had written the word earth in the cockney style—hearth. It immediately struck me that this peculiarly English species of bad-spelling could not have occurred so far north as the town of Paisley, where the vowel-sound commencing a word is never aspirated; and I, therefore, returned the letter to the young men, telling them that I was persuaded that it had been written in the colony, and that no such marriage as they contemplated would be allowed by the government. A few weeks thereafter, the woman absconded from her master's service, and was married to the currency-lad, by an episcopal clergyman in the interior, as a free-woman. As her flight, however, was immediately reported to the authorities, she was traced, apprehended, and sent to the third class in the factory—the place of punishment for female-convicts—the marriage being null and void.

Many of the female convicts conduct themselves in an unexceptionable manner, and rear large families of interesting and promising children, when reputably married in the colony; for it is not an unusual case for a woman, who has been exceedingly depraved and absolutely unmanageable in a single state, to conduct herself with propriety when advantageously married. Others, however, are indifferent enough in either condition, and when assigned as servants to respectable families are got rid of and returned to Government with all convenient speed. But the fault is by no means uniformly on the side of the convict. A remark—which I recollect having heard the eccentric, but truly apostolic, Rowland Hill, make at a public meeting of the friends of a Female Penitentiary Society in London many years ago—is unfortunately too well suited to the meridian of New South Wales: "Mistresses are always complaining," said the venerable old man, "or their having bad servants; but I will tell you what, ladies, there are a great many bad mistresses too."

There are instances of persons of the industrious classes of society, who have arrived free in the colony, marrying female convicts, and having no reason subsequently to regret the step they have taken. The experiment, however, is a dangerous one, and is sometimes attended with a different result. About seven years ago, a reputable Scotch mechanic, who was able shortly after his arrival in the colony to take jobs on his own account, was infatuated enough to marry a female convict of prepossessing appearance, but unfortunately of little else to recommend her. Previous to his marriage, he had been regular in his attendance on the ordinances of religion; but his wife had various other more eligible modes of spending the Sabbath than going to church, and he had accordingly to accompany her on Sunday-excursions of pleasure to the country. Unfortunately, however, his wife very soon got into trouble, as it is technically termed in the colony; i.e. into the commission of some crime or misdemeanour, which issues in the individual's flagellation, or imprisonment, or transportation, or death by law—for the phrase is sufficiently extensive in its signification. She had been concerned in a riot, which two free persons lodging in her husband's cottage had raised during his absence, and was immediately carried by the constables before the police magistrate of Sydney, who decides in a summary manner in all cases in which convicts, whether married or not, are concerned. The offender was in this instance sentenced to three months confinement in the third or lowest class in the factory at Paramatta. One of the rules of that institution is, that no female shall be admitted into the third class without having previously undergone the operation of shaving the head; and the poor husband was in this instance so much distressed at the very appearance which he thought his wife would exhibit, when divested of her hair, that he actually called at my house to request that I would forward a petition which he had prepared to the authorities, that the operation might for once be dispensed with in his wife's favour. During the conversation that took place on the occasion, I took an opportunity to remind the Scotchman of his recent neglect of the ordinances of religion, and I saw him in church for a few Sabbaths thereafter. His wife, however, returned to him again at the expiration of her sentence, and I saw him no more.

When female convicts are returned to Government by the families to which they have been assigned, or are sentenced to punishment by the magistrates for petty misdemeanours, they are forwarded in a covered wagon to a sort of Bridewell at Paramatta, called the Female Factory, in which there are generally from two to five hundred female convicts, under the charge of a respectable matron and the superintendence of a committee of management. They are divided into three classes. The First Class consists of those who from particular circumstances have not been assigned as maid-servants to private families on their arrival in the colony, or of those who have been returned to Government by their masters without having any crime charged against them, or of those whose good conduct has merited their elevation from the inferior classes. All the females of this class are assigned as maid-servants, on being applied for by reputable persons, in the same way as on the arrival of a female convict-ship, the state of the Factory being announced weekly for the information of the public in the Government Gazette. The Third Class consists of incorrigible females, or of those who have been sentenced to a certain period of penal confinement in the Factory on account of some misdemeanour; and the Second Class consists of those who have served out their period of sentence in the Third, and who are undergoing probation ere they are again advanced to the First. The inmates of the Factory are employed variously, according to their characters and stations in the establishment, but chiefly in the processes connected with the manufacture of coarse woollen cloth, called Paramatta cloth, of which blankets and slop-clothing are made for the convict-servants of settlers throughout the territory.

With a view to disperse the female convicts more widely over the territory, and to enable respectable families in the interior to procure female servants with greater facility, the present Governor has established subordinate factories at Bathurst and Hunter's River, to which a proportion of the female convicts from each ship are forwarded on their arrival, and in which those that have been returned to Government by their masters are kept for re-assignment in the district; and I am happy to add that the measure is likely to be attended with great benefit. Indeed, the system of management pursued for a long time previous, in regard to that portion of the prison-population of the colony, was obviously and outrageously preposterous. For instead of adopting every possible means to effect the dispersion of the female convicts, that they might at least have some chance of getting reputably settled, and even winking at pettier peccadilloes for the accomplishment of so important an object, they were generally immured, to the number of five or six hundred, within stone-walls and iron-gates. The impolicy of such a system will appear from the following consideration, in addition to various others that will naturally suggest themselves to the reader, viz., that there are frequent instances in the colony, as I have already had occasion to observe, of females who had been perfectly unmanageable when imprisoned in the Factory, subsequently becoming remarkably quiet and well-behaved wives and mothers of children.

There are comparatively few instances of female convicts committing capital offences in New South Wales. An instance of the kind, however, happened to fall under my own observation several years ago, in the following rather singular way. I was proceeding alone in a gig one Monday morning to solemnize a marriage at a considerable distance in the interior, when a young man, decently attired in the garb of a sailor or ship carpenter, who was walking towards Sydney, requested to know whether I was some other person whom he named. There was a feeling of distress evidently portrayed in the young man's countenance, that induced me to ask him some question that immediately elicited his affecting story. He had arrived in the colony a few months before, as the carpenter of a convict ship, and finding that he could obtain eligible employment in Sydney, had obtained his discharge from the vessel, and remained on shore. On the Saturday evening previous, he was sitting in his lodging after having finished his week's labour, when some person, entering the house, incidentally mentioned that he had just been at the Supreme-Court, and had heard sentence of death pronounced on a man and woman for robbing their master, a respectable settler residing about forty miles from Sydney. The name of the woman, which the stranger also mentioned at the time, coinciding with that of a sister of his own, who had suddenly disappeared from her father's house in London about two or three years before, and never afterwards been heard of by her relatives, it immediately struck him that the woman might possibly be his lost sister. He accordingly went forth with to the jail, and having obtained admittance, found to his inexpressible grief, that the woman under sentence of death was actually his own sister. His parents, he told me, were poor, but honest people, who had reared a large family of eight or nine children, and she was the only one of the number who had gone astray. On consulting some person as to what was proper for him to do in such circumstances, he was told to get a memorial to the governor, drawn up on his sister's behalf, and to have it recommended, if possible, by her master. He, therefore, went forthwith to a person in Sydney who wrote memorials for hire, and got a document of the kind drawn up. The writer was an emancipated convict, and the memorial was written in the usual style of such writers—taking for granted, as a matter of course, and strongly protesting the innocence of the criminal, and insinuating that her present situation is the result of misfortune rather than of misconduct. It was eleven o'clock at night before the precious document, which cost, if I recollect aright, two dollars, was finished; but, as soon as it was completed, the young man, who had never been a mile out of Sydney before, instantly set off alone and on foot through the gloomy forest to the residence of his sister's late master, to request him to recommend the memorial. He had reached his destination, and had got about half way to Sydney on his return, when I met him on the following Monday morning. On reading the memorial, I was apprehensive it would rather do harm than good, and therefore desired the young man to accompany me to a house a little way on, where we could obtain materials for writing, and where I should write something, which I had reason to hope would be of more service to him. The young man gladly accepted of my offer; and I accordingly wrote a short account of the manner in which he had discovered, and the anxiety he had manifested on her behalf, soliciting that if the ends of justice could possibly be attained by a milder punishment, the feelings of the community might not be outraged by the execution of a female, who had probably been herself the unhappy victim of some unprincipled seducer. The young man was extremely grateful for the little service done him, and I was happy to learn afterwards that his unfortunate sister's sentence of death was commuted into a milder punishment.

TABLE TALK.

Egyptian Doctors. In Egypt each physician studied one, and only one part of the body, a circumstance which multiplied them to a vast extent, as Herodotus particularly remarks in his Euterpe. Romance of Ancient History. It must have been curious to have been obliged to send for three different doctors, in case you had pains in the arms, head, and chest. The "members of the profession" might have called their trade the "profession of the members."

LETTER V.

ON THE GENII OF ANTIQUITY AND THE POETS.

(Conclusion of last week's Subject.)

THE bad Dæmon was thought to be of formidable shape, black, frowning, and brutal. A man, according to Pausanias, fought with one, and drove him into the sea. As we have told the story before (in the Indicator) and it is little to tell, we shall proceed to give the noblest passage ever written about Dæmons, in the scene out of Shakspeare. The spirit that appeared to Brutus has been variously represented. Some made it of the common order of malignant appearances; others have described it as resembling Cæsar. This was the light in which it was beheld by our great poet.

With what exquisite art, that is to say, with what exquisite nature has he not introduced this scene, and made us love and admire the illustrious patriot, who having done what he could upon earth, and prepared for his last effort, is about to encounter the menaces of fate. How admirably, by the help of the little boy and the lute, has he painted him, who was only a dictator and a warrior because he was a great humanist,—the Platonic philosopher in action,—the ideal yet not passionless man,—such a one as Shakspeare loved, not because he loved only select human nature, but because he loved all that human nature contained.

We must confess, that in our opinion the address to the Ghost is not so good as in simple old Plutarch. There is too much astonishment and agitation in it; if not for nature, at least for the superinduced and philosophic nature, that we are led to suppose was in Brutus: and the same objection might be made to what follows. The household are called up in too much alarm. It is Brutus's care for his servants, his bidding them take their rest, and what he says to the little lute-player, overcome with sleep, that render the scene so charming. The divine scene also between him and Cassius, where he tells him that "Portia is dead," has just preceded it.

Brutus. Lucius, my gown. [Exit Lucius.] Farewell, good Messala;
Good night, Titinius:—noble, noble Cassius,
Good night, and good repose.
Cassius. O, my dear brother!
This was an ill beginning of the night:
Never come such division 'tween our souls!
Let it not, Brutus.

Brutus. Every thing is well.
Cassius. Good night, my lord.
Brutus. Good night, good brother.
Tit. & Mes. Good night, Lord Brutus.
Brutus. Farewell, every one.
[Exeunt Cas. Tit. and Mes.]

Re-enter LUCIUS with the gown.

Give me the gown. Where is thy instrument?
Luc. Here in the tent.
Brus. What, thou speak'st drowsily?
Poor knave, I blame thee not; thou art o'er-watched.
Call Claudius, and some other of my men;
I'll have them sleep on cushions in my tent.
Luc. Varro and Claudius!

Enter VARRO and CLAUDIUS.

Var. Calls my lord?
Brus. I pray you, sirs, lie in my tent and sleep;
It may be, I shall raise you by and by
On business to my brother Cassius.
Var. So please you, we will stand, and watch your pleasure.
Brus. I will not have it so: lie down, good sirs;
It may be, I shall otherwise think me.
Look, Lucius, here's the book I sought for so;
I put it in the pocket of my gown. [Servants lie down.]
Luc. I was sure, your lordship did not give it me.

SPARROW AND CO. CRANE COURT.

Brus. Bear with me, good boy, I am much forgetful.
Canst thou hold up thy heavy eyes awhile,
And touch thy instrument a strain or two?

Luc. Ay, my lord, an it please you.
Brus. It does, my boy.
I trouble thee too much, but thou art willing.
Luc. It is my duty, sir.
Brus. I should not urge thy duty past thy might;
I know young bloods look for a time of rest.
Luc. I have slept, my lord, already.
Brus. It is well done; and thou shalt sleep again;
I will not hold thee long: if I do live,
I will be good to thee. [Music and a song.]
This is a sleepy tune:—O, murderous slumber!
Lay'st thou thy leaden mace upon my boy,
That plays thee music?—Gentle knave, good night;
I will not do thee so much wrong to wake thee.
If thou dost nod, thou break'st thy instrument;
I'll take it from thee; and good boy, good night.
Let me see, let me see; is not the leaf turn'd down,
Where I left reading? Here it is, I think.

[He sits down.]

Enter the GHOST OF CÆSAR.

How ill this taper burns! Ha! who comes here?
I think it is the weakness of mine eyes,
That shapes this monstrous apparition.
It comes upon me:—art thou any thing?
Art thou some god, some angel, or some devil,
That mak'st my blood cold, and my hair to stare?
Speak to me, what thou art.

Ghost. Thy evil spirit Brutus.
Brus. Why com'st thou?
Ghost. To tell thee, thou shalt see me at Philippi.
Brus. Well;
Then I shall see thee again?

Ghost. Ay, at Philippi. [Ghost vanishes.]
Brus. Why, I will see thee at Philippi then.—
Now I have taken heart, thou vanishest:
Ill spirit, I would hold more talk with thee.—
Boy! Lucius! Varro! Claudius! sirs awake!—
Claudius!

Luc. The strings, my lord, are false.
Brus. He thinks, he is still at his instrument.—
Lucius, awake.
Luc. My lord?
Brus. Didst thou dream that thou so cry'dst out?
Luc. My Lord, I do not know that I did cry.
Brus. Yes, that thou didst: didst thou see anything?
Luc. Nothing, my lord.
Brus. Sleep again Lucius.—Sirrah, Claudius!
Fellow thou! awake.

Var. My lord.
Clau. My lord.
Brus. Why did you so cry out, sirs, in your sleep?
Var. & Clau. Did we, my lord?
Brus. Ay: saw you anything?
Var. No, my lord, I saw nothing.
Clau. Nor I, my lord.
Brus. Go, and commend me to my brother Cassius;
Bid him set on his powers betimes before;
And we will follow.

Var & Clau. It shall be done, my lord. [Exeunt.]

The Roman genius appears to have been a very material sort of personage compared with the Greek Dæmon, and altogether addicted to earth. We know not where it is found that he was first called Gerulus, or a carrier on of affairs; perhaps in Varro; but whether as Gerulus, or as Genius (the spirit of things generated), the Romans made him after their own likeness, and gave him as little to do with the stars as possible. The Romans had not the fancy of the Greeks, and cared little for their ethereal pleasures. Accordingly, their attendant spirit was either fighting and conquering (on which occasion he took the wings of Victory, as you may see in the imperial sculptures), or he was dining and enjoying himself; sitting under his plane-tree, and drinking with his mistress. To gratify their appetites, was called "indulging the Genius;" not to gratify them, was "defrauding" him. They seem to have forgotten that he had anything to do with restraint. Ovid, the most poetical of their poets, in all his uses of the words Genius or Genial, never hints at the possibility of their having any meaning beyond something local and comfortable. There is the Genius of the city, and the Genius of one's father. The Sabine women were "a genial prey." Crowns of flowers are genial;—a certain kind of musical instrument is particularly genial, and agrees dulcibus joci;* that is to say with double meanings:—Bacchus is the planter of the genial vine (Genial indeed was a name of Bacchus); a popular holiday, pleasantly described in the Fasti, where every one is eating and drinking by the side of his lass, is a genial feast.†

Hence the acceptance of the word among ourselves; though we are fain to give it more grace and sentiment. The "Genial bed" of Milton is not exactly Ovidian; though by the way, the good-natured libertine was the favourite Latin poet of our great puritan.

We hear little of the bad Genius among the Romans. They seem to have agreed to treat him as bad geniuses ought to be; and drop his acquaintance. But he was black, like his brother in Greece. Voltaire has a pleasant story of the Black and White Genius. Valerius Maximus, a servile writer, who had the luck to survive his betters and become a classic, tells a story, (probably to please the men in power whom he deified) which appears to have been confounded with that of Brutus. "We are told by Valerius Maximus," says Mr. Tooke, "that when Cassius fled to Athens, after Antony was beaten at Actium, there appeared to him a man of long stature, of a black swarthy complexion, with large hair, and a nasty beard. Cassius asked him who he was; and the apparition answered, "I am your Evil Genius."‡

Spenser has placed an Evil Genius at the gate of his false Bower of Bliss, and Old Genius, or the fatherly principle of life and care, at the door of the great nursery-gardens of the universe.

Old Genius the porter of them was;
Old Genius, the which a double nature has.

He letteth in, he letteth out to wend,
All that to come into this world desire;
A thousand thousand naked babes attend
About him day and night, which do require
That he with fleshly weeds would them attire.

What follows and precedes this passage is a true piece of Platonical colouring, founded upon the old Greek allegories. These nursery grounds, sprouting with infants and with the germs of all things, would make a very happy place if it were not for Time, who with his "flaggy wings," goes playing the devil among the beds, to the great regret of Venus. It is an old story, and a true; and the worst of it is, that Venus herself (though the poet does not here say so) joins with her enemies to assist him.

— Were it not that Time their troubler is,
All that in this delightful garden grows
Should happy be, and have immortal bliss:
For here all plenty and all pleasure flows;
And sweet Love gentle fits among them throws,
Without fell rancour or fond jealousy;
Frankly each paramour his leman knows;
Each bird his mate; ne any does envy
Their goodly meriment and gay felicity.

There is continual spring, and harvest there
Continual, both meeting at one time:
For both the boughs doe laughing blossoms beare,
And with fresh colours decke the wanton pryme,
And eke attonce the heavy trees they clyme,

* Artis Amatoria. lib. iii. v. 327.

† Pastorum. lib. iii. v. 525. It is the description of a dæm Florentine holiday in the Casaca.

‡ Tooke's Pantheon. Part 4. chap. iii. sect. 4. The speaks Greek; which was better bred of him, than havi a beard. "Interrogatus quidquam esset, respondit Κακοδαίμων."

Which seeme to labour under their fruites lode :
The whyles the joyous birdes make their pastyme
Emongst the shady leaves, their sweet abode,
And their trew loves without suspicion till abroad.

We are then presented with one of his arbours ; of which he was the cunningest builder in all Fairy-Land. The present one belongs to Venus and Adonis.

Right in the midst of that Paradise
There stood a stately mount, on whose round top
A gloomy grove of mirtle trees did rise,
Whose shady boughes sharp Steele did never lop,
Nor wicked beastes their tender buds did crop,
But like a girlond compassed the height,
And from their fruitfull sydes sweet gum did drop,
That all the ground, with pretious dew bedight,
Threw forth most dainty odours and most sweet delight.

And in the thickest covert of that shade
There was a pleasant arbor, not by art
But of the trees own inclination made,
Which knitting their rancke branches part to part,
With wanton yvie-twine entrayled athwart,
And egplantine and caprifole emong,
Fashion'd above within their inmost part,
That neither Phœbus beams could through them throng,
Nor Aeolus sharp blast could worke them any wrong.

Fairy Queene. Book III. Canto vi.

Here Venus was wont to enjoy the company of Adonis; Adonis, says Upton, being matter and Venus form. Ovid would have said, he did not know how that might be; but that the allegory "was genial."

The poets are a kind of Eclectic Philosophers, who pick out of theories whatever is suitable to the truth of natural feeling and the candour of experience; and thus, with due allowances for what is taught them, may be looked upon as among the truest as well as most universal of philosophers. The most opinionate of them, Milton for one, are continually surrendering the notions induced upon them by their age or country to the cause of their greater mother country, the universe; like beings deeply sympathizing with man, but impatient of wearing the clothes and customs of a particular generation. It is doubtful, considering the whole context of Milton's life, and taking away the excitements of personal feelings, whether he was a jot more in earnest when playing the polemic, than in giving himself up to the dreams of Plato: whether he felt more, or so much, in common with Raphael and Michael, as with the Genius of the groves of Harefield, listening at night-time to the music of the spheres. In one of his prose works (we quote from memory) he complains of being forced into public brawls and "hoarse seas of dispute;" and asks what but a sense of duty could have enabled him thus to have been "put off from beholding the bright countenance of Truth in the quiet and still air of delightful studies." This truth was truth universal; this air, the same that haunted the room of Plato, and came breathing from Elysium. No man had a greater taste than he for the "religio loci,"—the genius of a particular spot. The Genius of a Wood in particular was a special friend of his, as indeed he has been of all poets. The following passage has been often quoted; but we must not on that account pass it by. New beauties may be found in it every time. A passage in a wood has been often trod, but we tread it again. The pleasure is ever young, though the path is old. So—

—When the sun begins to fling
His flaming beams, me, Goddess, bring
To arched walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown, that Sylvan loves,
Of pine or monumental oak,
Where the rude axe with heaved stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallow'd haunt.
There in close covert by some brook,
Where no profaner eye may look,
Hide me from day's garish eye,
While the bee with honied thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring,
With such consort as they keep,
Entice the dewy-feather'd sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream
Wave at his wings in airy stream
Of lively portraiture display'd,
Softly on my eye-lids laid.
And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or the unseen genius of the wood.

Penseroso.

In the Arcades, a Marquee performed at Harefield before the Countess of Derby, one of these Genii makes his appearance.—Two noble shepherds coming forward are met by "the Genius of the Wood." We will close our article with him as a proper harmonious personage, who unites the spirit of the Greek and Roman Dæmonology. He need not have troubled himself, perhaps, with "curling" the groves; and his "tassel'd" horn is a little fine and particular; not remote enough or audible. But the young poet was writing to please young patricians. The "tassel" was for their nobility; the rest is for his own.

Stay, gentle swains; for though in this disguise,
I see bright honour sparkle through your eyes;
Of famous Arcady ye are, and sprung
Of that renowned flood, so often sung,
Divine Alphæus, who by secret sluice
Stole under seas to meet his Arethuse;
And ye, the breathing roses of the wood,
Fair silver-buskin'd nymphs, as great and good;
I know, this quest of yours, and free intent,
Was all in honour and devotion meant
To the great mistress of yon princely shrine,
Whom with low reverence I adore as mine;
And, with all helpful service, will comply
To further this night's glad solemnity;
And lead ye, where ye may more near behold
What shallow-searching fame hath left untold;
Which I full oft, amidst these shades alone,
Have sat to wonder at, and gaze upon;
For know, by lot from Jove, I am the power
Of this fair wood, and live in oaken bower,
To nurse the saplings tall, and curl the grove
With ringlets quaint, and wanton windings wove.
And all my plants I save from nightly ill
Of noisome winds, and blasting vapours chill;
And from the boughs brush off the evil dew,
And heal the harms of thwarting thunder blue,
Or what the cross dire-looking planet smites,
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites.
When evening gray doth rise, I fetch my round
Over the mount and all this hallow'd ground;
And early, ere the odoriferous breath of morn
Awakes the slumbering leaves, or tassel'd horn
Shakes the high thicket, haste I all about,
Number my ranks, and visit every sprout
With puissant words, and murmurs made to bless.
But else in deep of night, when drowsiness
Hath lock'd up mortal sense, then listen I
To the celestial Syrens' harmony,
That sit upon the nine infolded spheres,
And sing to those that hold the vital shears,
And turn the adamantine spindle round,
On which the fate of gods and men is wound.
Such sweet compulsion doth in musick lie,
To lull the daughters of Necessity.

This is a passage to read at twilight; or before putting out the candles, in some old country house.

There is yet one more passage which we must quote from Milton about a Genius. It concerns also a very dæmoniacal circumstance, the cessation of the Heathen Oracles. See with what regret the poet breaks up the haunt of his winged beauties, and sends them floating away into dissolution with their white bodies out of the woods.

The oracles are dumb,
No voice or hideous hum.
Runs through the arched roof in words deceiving.
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shriek the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance, or breathed spell,
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament;
From haunted spring and dale,
Edg'd with poplar pale,
The parting Genius is with sighing sent:
With flower-inwoven tresses torn
The Nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn.
In consecrated earth,
And on the holy heath,
The Lays, and Lemures, moan with midnight plaint:
In urns, and altars round,
A drear and dying sound
Affrights the Flamens at their service quaint;
And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar Power foregoes his wonted seat.

He proceeds to dismiss the idols of Palestine, and the brute gods of Egypt

Trampling the unshowered grass with lowings loud.

We do not feel for those, nor does he; but the little household gods of Rome, trembling like kittens on the hearth, and the nymphs of Greece mourning their flowery shades, he loses with an air of tenderness. He forgets, that he and the other poets had gathered them into their own Elysium.

SECOND AND THIRD WEEK IN JUNE.

GENERAL BEAUTIES OF THE MONTH.—SHEEP-SHEARING.

THERE are some things in the following extract which ought to have been quoted earlier in the month; but amidst the exuberance of the creation one may be allowed sometimes to forget one's-self; and there are so many beautiful things belonging to every part and parcel of a season, that to dwell upon any one of them sometimes excludes twenty others which ought to be noticed in the same paper. It is not our fault; it is Nature's, for being so rich and lovely.

But let us hear Mr. Howitt, talking in the thick of the grass. We have never had the pleasure of seeing this gentleman; but, assuredly, we are here in his company, listening to his voice as he reclines upon some shady slope not far from Sherwood Forest; and as he pauses, a bee occasionally comes humming among us, as though to express its fervid approbation. His talk of gardens, of fields, and of trees, is all admirable: we object only to his angling, against which we have been moved into an expostulation or two in a note.

The general character of June, in the happiest seasons, is fine, clear, and glowing, without reaching the intense heats of July. Its commencement is the only period of the year in which we could possibly forget that we are in a world of perpetual change and decay. The earth is covered with flowers, and the air is saturated with their odours. It is true that many have vanished from our path, but they have slid away so quietly, and their places have been occupied by so many fragrant and beautiful successors, that we have scarcely been sensible of their departure. Everything is full of life, greenness, and vigour. Families of young birds are abroad, and giving their parents a busy life of it, till they can peck for themselves. Rooks have deserted their rookery, and are feeding their vociferous young in every pasture and under every green tree. The swallow and swift are careering in the clear skies, and

Ten thousand insects in the air abound
Flitting on glancing wings that yield a summer-sound.
W. W. W.

The flower-garden is in the height of its splendour. Roses of almost innumerable species,—I have counted no less than fourteen in a cottage garden,—lilies, jasmims, speedwells, rockets, stocks, lupines, geraniums, pinks, poppies, valerians red and blue, mignonette, &c., and the glowing rhododendron abound.

It is the very carnival of Nature, and she is prodigal of her luxuries. It is luxury to walk abroad, indulging every sense with sweetness, loveliness, and harmony. It is luxury to stand beneath the forest-side, when all is still and basking at noon; and to see the landscape suddenly dark; the black and tumultuous clouds to assemble as at a signal; to hear the awful thunder crash upon the listening ear; and then, to mark the glorious bow rise on the lurid rear of the tempest, the sun laugh jocosely, and

Every bathed leaf and blossom fair
Pour out its soul to the delicious air.

It is luxury to haunt the gardens of old-fashioned houses in the morning, when the bees are fitting forth with a rejoicing hum; or at eve, when the honey-suckle and the sweet-briar mingle their spirit with the breeze. It is luxury to plunge into the cool river; and, if ever we are tempted to turn angler, it must be now.* To steal away into a quiet valley by a winding stream, buried, completely buried, in fresh grass; the foam-like flowers of the meadow-sweet, the crimson loose-strife, and the large blue geranium nodding beside us; the dragon-fly, the ephemera, and the kingfisher glancing to and fro; the trees above casting their flickering shadows on the stream; and one of our ten thousand volumes of our delightful literature in our pockets,—then indeed might one be a most patient angler though not taking a single fish.† What luxurious images would there float through the mind! Gray could form no idea of heaven superior to lying on a sofa and reading novels; but it is in the flowery lap of June that we can best climb

Up to the sunshine of encumbered ease.

How delicious too are the evenings become. The frosts and damps of spring are past; the earth is dry; the night air is balmy and refreshing; the glow-worm

* Don't. Where's the necessity of bringing pain into so sweet a time?—Editor.

† The less the better. Why angle at all? Is not all this beauty enough? Mr. Howitt does not do himself justice, when he recommends, or seems to recommend, angling. His own poetical mind is such, that he is in no need of looking about for a sensation in the midst of all this richness; why should he not assist the richness towards satisfying others, instead of striking it with the poverty of want and such a want? If certain contempt of pain be desirable to keep us clear from effeminacy, and too much self-indulgence, it is not pain of this sort, which the most effeminate may indulge in, and which keeps ourselves all the while safe and happily in clover! There are hundreds of noble pains which may be undergone both for ourselves and our fellow-creatures. Let us choose out of those, if we have not enough, and not hazard (to say the least of it) unnecessary anguish, even to the moment of the creation. —We do not write this note, of course, to fishermen who must live, but to anglers who need not fish.—Ed.

has lit her lamp; the bat is circling about; the fragrant breath of flowers steals into our houses; and the moth flutters against the darkening pane. Go forth when the business of the day is over, thou who art pent in city toils, and stray through the newly-shot corn along the grassy and hay-scented fields; linger beside the solitary woodland; the gale of heaven is stirring its mighty and umbrageous branches; the wild rose, with its flowers of most delicate odour, and of every tint, from the deepest red to the purest pearl; the wreathed and luscious honeysuckle, and the verdurous, snowy-flowered elder embellish every way-side, or light up the most shadowy region of the wood. Field peas and beans in full flower, add their spicy aroma; the red clover is at once splendid, and profuse of its honied breath. The young corn is bursting into ear; the awned heads of rye, wheat and barley, and the nodding panicles of oats shoot from their green and glaucous stems, in broad, level, and waving expanses of present beauty and future promise. The very waters are strewn with flowers; the buck-bean, the water-violet, the elegant flowering-rush, and the queen of the waters, the pure and the splendid white lily invest, every stream and lonely moor with grace. The mavis and the merle, those worthy favourites of the olden bards, and the woodlark, fill the solitude with their elegant evening songs.

Over its own sweet voice the stock-dove broods; and the cuckoo pours its mellowest note from some region of twilight shadow. The sunsets of this month are transcendently glorious, the mighty luminary goes down pavilioned amidst clouds of every hue; the splendour of burnished gold, the deepest mazarine blue fading away into the deepest heavens to the palest azure, and an ocean of purple is flung over the twilight woods, or the far stretching and lonely horizon. The heart of the spectator is touched; it is melted and wrapt into dreams of past and present, pure, elevated, and tinged with a poetic tenderness.

SHEEP-SHEARING, began last month, is generally completed this. It is one of the most picturesque operations of rural life, and from the most ancient times, it has been regarded as a scene of gladness and joy.

Like most of our old festivities, however, this has, of late years, declined; yet two instances in which it has been attempted to keep it alive, on a noble scale, worthy of a country so renowned for its flocks and its fleeces, will occur to the reader,—those of Holkham and Woburn; and in the wilds of Scotland, and the more rural parts of England, the ancient glory of sheep-shearing has not entirely departed. And, indeed, its picturesqueness can never depart, however its jollity may. The sheep washing, however, which precedes the shearing, has more of rural beauty about it. As we stroll over some sunny heath, or descend into some sylvan valley in this sweet month, we are apt to come upon such scenes. We hear afar off the bleating of flocks; as we approach some clear stream, we behold the sheep penned on its banks; in mid stream stand sturdy hinds ready to receive them as they are plunged in, one by one, and after squeezing their saturated fleeces well between their hands, and giving them one good submersion, they guide them to the opposite bank. The clear running waters, the quiet fields, the whispering fresh boughs that thicken around, and the poor dripping creatures themselves, that, after giving themselves a staggering shake, go off gladly to their pasture, form to the eye an animated and splendid tout ensemble.

BIRTH DAYS.

June 13th (1st O. S.) 1594, at Andely in Normandy, Nicholas Poussin, the landscape and historical painter. His family were reduced gentry. The addition of the earnest and grave character of the Normans to the general French vivacity, rendered him one of the great names in art, fit to be mentioned with those of Italy. He had learning, luxuriousness, and sentiment, and gave himself up to each, as his subject inclined him, though never perhaps without a strong consciousness of the art as well as nature of what he had to do. His historical performances are his driest; his poetical subjects full of gusto; his landscapes remote, meditative, and often with a fine darkness in them, as if his trees were older than any other painter's. Shade is upon them, as light is upon Claude's. Poussin was a genuine enthusiast, to whom his art was his wealth, whether it made him rich or not. He got as much money as he wanted, and would not hurry and degrade his genius to get more. A pleasant anecdote is related of him, at a time when he must have been in very moderate circumstances. He spent the greatest part of his life at Rome, and Bishop (afterward Cardinal) Mancini being attended by him one evening to the door, for want of a servant, the Bishop said, "I pity you, Monsieur Poussin, for having no servant." "And I pity your lordship," said the painter, "for having so many."

June 17th (5th O. S.) 1723, at Kirkcaldy in Scotland, Adam Smith, author of the "Theory of Moral Sentiments," and the "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations."

His father was comptroller of the customs of that place. He had the integrity of all men who are earnestly devoted to philosophical speculations; but was absent, and perhaps uncouth in his manners. Sir Walter Scott has given somewhere an anecdote of an encounter between him and Johnson, in which the two moral philosophers cut a very unphilosophical figure in point of civility: but we do not recollect it well enough to repeat it.

THE DEAN OF SANTIAGO AND DON ILLAN OF TOLEDO.

[From "Lays and Legends of Spain," (just published.)]

The version of the present excellent story is from the easy and vigorous pen of the Rev. Blanco White. Readers need hardly be told now-a-days that the germ of it is to be found in the story of the Sultan and the Bucket of Water, in the Arabian Nights.

It was but a short hour before noon when the Dean of St. Jago alighted at the door of Don Illan, the celebrated magician of Toledo. The house, according to old tradition, stood on the bank of the perpendicular rock, which now crowned with Alcazar rises to a frightful height over the Tagus. A maid of Moorish blood led the Dean to a retired apartment, where Don Illan was reading. The natural politeness of a Castilian had rather been improved than impaired by the studies of the Toledan sage, who exhibited nothing in his dress or person that might induce even a suspicion of his dealing with the mysterious powers of darkness. "I heartily greet your reverence," said Don Illan to the Dean, "and feel highly honoured by this visit. Whatever be the object of it, let me beg you will defer stating it till I have made you quite at home in this house. I hear my housekeeper making ready the noonday meal. That maid, Sir, will shew you the room, which has been prepared for you. And when you have brushed off the dust of your journey, you shall find a canonical capon hot upon the board."

The dinner, which soon followed, was just what a pampered Spanish canon would wish it—abundant, nutritive, and delicate. "No, no," said Don Illan, when the soup, and a bumper of tinto had recruited the Dean's spirits, and he saw him making an attempt to break the object of his visit; "no business, please your reverence, while at dinner. Let us enjoy our meal at present, and when we have discussed the olla, the capon, and a bottle of Yepes, it will be time enough to turn to the cares of life."

The ecclesiastic's full face had never beamed with more glee at the collection on Christmas Eve, when, by the indulgence of the church, the fast is broken at sunset, instead of continuing through the night, than it did now, under the influence of Don Illan's good humour and heart-cheering wine. Still it was evident that some vehement and ungovernable wish had taken possession of his mind, breaking out now and then in some hurried motion, some gulping up of a full glass of wine without stopping to relish the flavour, and fifty other symptoms of absence and impatience, which at such a distance from the cathedral could not be attributed to the afternoon bell. The time came at length of rising from table, and in spite of Don Illan's pressing request to have another bottle, the Dean, with a certain dignity of manner, led his good-natured host to the recess of an oriel window, looking upon the river.

"Allow me, dear Don Illan," he said, "to open my heart to you; for even your hospitality must fail to make me completely happy till I have obtained the boon which I came to ask. I know that no man ever possessed greater power than you over the invisible agents of the universe. I die to become an adept in that wonderful science, and if you will receive me as your pupil, there is nothing I should think of sufficient worth to repay your friendship."

"Good sir," replied Don Illan, "I should be extremely loth to offend you, but permit me to say, that in spite of the knowledge of causes and effects which I have acquired, all that my experience teaches me of the hearts of men is not only vague and indistinct, but for the most part unfavourable. I only guess; I cannot read their thoughts, nor pry into the recesses of their minds. As for yourself, I am sure you are a rising man, and likely to obtain the first dignities of the church. But whether, when you find yourself in places of high honour and patronage, you will remember the humble personage of whom you now ask hazardous and important services, it is impossible for me to ascertain."

"Nay, nay," exclaimed the Dean, "but I know myself, if you do not, Don Illan. Generosity and friendship (since you force me to speak in my own praise) have been the delight of my soul even from childhood. Doubt not, my dear friend, (for by that name I wish you would allow me to call you) doubt not, from this moment, to command my services. Whatever interest I may possess, it will be my highest gratification to see it redound in favour of you and yours."

"My hearty thanks for all, worthy sir," said Don Illan; "but let us now proceed to business, the sun is set, and if you please, we will retire to my private study."

Lights being called for, Don Illan led the way to the lower part of the house; and dismissing the Moorish maid near a small door, of which he held the key in his hand, desiring her to get two partridges for supper, but not to dress them till he should order it: then unlocking the door, he began to descend by a winding staircase. The Dean followed, with a certain degree of trepidation, which the length of the stairs greatly tended to increase: for, to all appearance, they reached below the bed of the Tagus. At this depth, a comfortable neat room was found, the walls completely covered with shelves, where Don Illan kept his works on magic: globes, planispheres, and strange drawings, occupied the top of the book-cases. Fresh air was admitted, though it would be difficult to guess by what means, since the sound of gliding water, such as is heard at the lower part of a ship when sailing with a gentle breeze, intimated but a thin partition between the subterranean cabinet and the river. "Here then," said Don Illan, offering a chair to the Dean, and drawing another for himself towards a small round table, "we have only to choose among the elementary works of the science for which you long. Suppose we begin to read this small volume."

The volume was laid on the table, and opened at the first page, containing circles, concentric and excentric, triangles with unintelligible characters, and the well-known signs of the planets. "This," said Don Illan, "is the alphabet of the whole science. Hermes, called Trismegistus—the sound of a small bell within the chamber made the Dean almost leap out of his chair. "Be not alarmed," said Don Illan; "it is the bell, by which my servants let me know they want to speak to me." Saying thus, he pulled a thick string, and soon after a servant appeared with a packet of letters. It was addressed to the Dean. A courier had closely followed him on the road, and was at that moment arrived at Toledo. "Good Heavens!" exclaimed the Dean, having read the contents of the letters; "my great uncle, the archbishop of Santiago is dangerously ill. This is, however, what the secretary says, from his lordship's dictation. But here is another from the archbishop of the diocese, who assures me that the old man was not expected to live. I can hardly repeat what he adds. Poor dear uncle, may heaven lengthen his days! The chapter seem to have turned their eyes towards me—and,—pugh—it cannot be—but the electors, according to the archdeacon, are quite decided in my favour. "Well," said Don Illan, "all I regret is the interruption of our studies; but I doubt not you will soon wear the mitre. In the meantime, I would advise you to pretend that illness does not allow you to return directly. A few days will give a decided turn to the whole affair; and at all events, your absence, in the case of an election, will be construed into modesty. Write, therefore, your despatches, my dear sir, and we will prosecute our studies at another time."

Two days had elapsed since the arrival of the messenger, when the verger of the church of Santiago, attended by servants in splendid liveries, alighted at Don Illan's door, with letters for the Dean. The old prelate was dead, and his nephew had been elected to the see, by the unanimous vote of the chapter. The elected dignitary seemed overcome by contending feelings; but, having wiped away some decent tears, he assumed an air of gravity, which almost touched on superciliousness. Don Illan addressed his congratulations, and was the first to kiss the new archbishop's hand; "I hope," he added, "I may also congratulate my son, the young man who is now at the university of Paris, for I flatter myself, your lordship will give him the deanery, which is now vacant by your promotion." "My worthy friend, Don Illan," replied the archbishop elect, "My obligation to you I can never repay. You have heard my character; I hold a friend as another self. But why would you take the lad away from his studies? An archbishop of St. Jago cannot want preferment at any time. Follow me to my diocese; I will not, for all the mitres in Christendom, forego the benefit of your instruction; the Deanery, to tell the truth, must be given to my uncle, my father's own brother, who has had but a small living for many years; he is much liked at Santiago, and I should lose my character if, to place such a young man as your son at the head of the chapter, I neglected an exemplary priest so nearly related to me." "Just as you please, my lord," said Don Illan, and began to prepare for the journey.

The acclamations which greeted the new archbishop on his arrival at the capital of Galicia, were, not long after, succeeded by an universal regret, at his translation to the see of the recently conquered town of Seville.

"I will not leave you behind," said the Archbishop to Don Illan, who with more timidity than he shewed at Toledo, approached to kiss the sacred ring in the Archbishop's right hand, and to offer his humble congratulations; "but do not fret about your son; he is too young. I have my mother's relations to provide for, but Seville is a rich see; the blessed King Ferdinand who rescued it from the Moors, endowed its church so as to make it rival the first cathedrals in Christendom. Do but follow me, and all will be well in the end. Don Illan bowed with a suppressed sigh, and was soon after on the banks of the Guadalquivir, in the suite of the new Archbishop.

Scarcely had Don Illan's pupil been at Seville one year, when his far extended fame moved the Pope to send him a Cardinal's hat, desiring his presence at the Court of Rome. The crowd of visitors that came to congratulate the prelate, kept Don Illan away for many days. He at length obtained a private audience, and, with tears in his eyes, entreated his eminence not to oblige him to quit Spain. "I am growing old, my lord," he said: "I quitted my house at Toledo only for your sake, and in hopes of raising my son to some place of honour and emolument in the church; I even gave up my favourite studies, except as far as they were of service to your eminence. My son—" "No more of that, if you please, Don Illan," interrupted the Cardinal. "Follow me you must, who can tell what may happen in Rome? The Pope is old, you know. But do not tease me about preferment. A public man has duties of a description which those in the lower ranks of life cannot either weigh or comprehend. I confess I am under obligations to you, and feel quite disposed to reward your services; yet I must not have my creditors knocking every day at my door; you understand, Don Illan. In a week we set out for Rome."

With such a strong tide of good fortune as had hitherto buoyed up Don Illan's pupil, the reader cannot be surprised to find him, in a short time, wearing the papal crown. He was now arrived at the highest place of honour on earth; but in the bustle of the election and subsequent coronation, the man to whose wonderful science he owed this rapid ascent, had completely slipped off his memory. Fatigued with the exhibition of himself through the streets of Rome, which he had been obliged to make in a solemn procession, the new Pope sat alone in one of the chambers of the Vatican. It was early in the night. By the light of two wax tapers, which scarcely illuminated the further end of the saloon, his holiness was enjoying that reverie of mixed pain and pleasure which follows the complete attainment of ardent wishes, when Don Illan advanced in visible perturbation, conscious of the intrusion on which he ventured. "Holy father!" exclaimed the old man, and cast himself at his pupil's feet. "Holy father, in pity to these grey hairs, do not consign an old servant—might I not say an old friend, to utter neglect and forgetfulness. My son—" "By St. Peter!" ejaculated his holiness, rising from the chair, "your insolence shall be checked—You my friend: a magician the friend of Heaven's viceregent!—Away, wretched man! When I pretended to learn of thee it was only to sound the abyss of crime into which thou hadst plunged; I did it with a view of bringing thee to condign punishment. Yet, in compassion to thy age, I will not make an example of thee, provided thou avoidest mine eyes. Hide thy crime and shame where thou canst. This moment thou must quit the palace, or the next closes the gates of the inquisition upon thee."

Trembling, and his wrinkled face bedewed with tears, Don Illan begged to be allowed but one word more. "I am very poor, Holy Father," said he: "trusting in your patronage I relinquished my all, and have not left wherewith to pay my journey." "Away I say, answered the Pope; "if my excessive bounty has made you neglect your patrimony, I will no further encourage your waste and imprudence. Poverty is but a slight punishment for your crimes." "But, father," rejoined Don Illan, "my wants are instant: I am hungry; give me but a trifle to procure supper to-night. To-morrow I shall beg my way out of Rome." "Heaven forbid that I should be guilty of feeding the ally of the prince of darkness!" said the Pope. "Away, away from my presence, or I instantly call for the guard." "Well then," replied Don Illan, rising from the ground, and looking on the Pope with a boldness which began to throw his Holiness into a paroxysm of rage, "if I am to starve at Rome, I had better return to the supper which I ordered at Toledo." Thus saying, he rang a gold bell, which stood on a table next the Pope.

The door opened without delay, and the Moorish servant came in. The Pope looked round, and found himself in the subterranean study under the Tagus. "Desire the cook," said Don Illan to the maid, "to put but one partridge to roast; for I will not throw away the other on the Dean of St. Jago."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XVIII.—ORATOR HENLEY.

EVERY generation has had its "most impudent man alive,"—a designation invented, we believe, in favour of Bishop Warburton, whose genius, however, was perhaps nearly on a par with his pretensions. Very different was the case with the clever but shameless, and therefore foolish though clever man, who is the subject of the following account, and who became the quack he was for want of heart,—the secret of most apparent inconsistencies between cleverness and folly in the same individual.

John Henley was a native of Melton Mowbray, in the county of Leicester, where he officiated several years as curate, and conducted a grammar school; but feeling, or fancying that a genius like his ought not to be cramped in so obscure a situation, "having been long convinced that many gross errors and impostures prevailed in the various institutions and establishments of mankind, and being ambitious of restoring ancient eloquence;" but, as his enemies assert, to avoid the scandal and embarrassments of an amour, he repaired to the metropolis, and for a short time performed clerical functions in the neighbourhood of Bloomsbury-square, with a prospect of succeeding to the lectureship of the parish, which soon became vacant.

Several candidates offering for the situation, a warm contest ensued; and after Mr. Henley's probation sermon, which he thought would ensure him an easy victory, we may judge of the disappointment of this disciple of Demosthenes and Cicero, when he was told by a person, deputed from the congregation, that they had nothing to object against his language or his doctrine, but that he threw himself about too much in the pulpit, and that another person was chosen."

Losing his temper as well as his election, he rushed into an adjoining room, where the principal parishioners were assembled, and thus addressed them, in all the vehemence of outrageous passion:—"Blockheads, are you qualified to decide on the degree of action necessary for a preacher of God's word? Were you able to read, or had you sufficient sense, you sorry knaves, to understand the most renowned orator of antiquity, he would tell you that the great, almost the only requisite, for a public speaker, was action, action, action; but I despise and defy you; provocho ad populum, the public shall decide between us." With these words he quitted the place for ever, but in order "to shame the fools," printed his discourse.

Thus disappointed in his hopes of preferment, in the regular routine of his profession, he became, "if the expression is allowable," (says our authority) a quack divine, a character for which he was eminently qualified, possessing a strong voice, fluent language, an imposing, magisterial air, theatric gesture, and a countenance which no violation of propriety, reproach, or self-correction, was ever known to embarrass or discompose.

He immediately advertised, that he should hold forth publicly two days in the week, and hired for this purpose a large room, in or near Newport-market, which he called the Oratory; but previous to the commencement of his "Academical Discourses," he chose to write a letter to Whiston, the celebrated mathematician and dissenter, in which he desired to know, whether he should incur any legal penalties by officiating as a Separatist from the Church of England.

Whiston did not encourage Henley's project, and a correspondence took place, which, ending in virulence and ill-language, occasioned the latter, a few years after, to send the following laconic note to his adversary:—

"TO MR. WILLIAM WHISTON:

"Take notice, that I give you warning not to enter my room at Newport-market, at your peril.

JOHN HENLEY."

As tickets of admission for those who subscribed to his lectures, medals were issued with the rising sun for a device; and a motto expressive of the man, as well as of the motives by which he was impelled: "Inveniam viam aut faciam;" (I will find a way, or make one). He also published what may be termed a syllabus of his lectures, containing a long list of the various subjects he meant to handle, religious and political, in which it was easy to see, that he had selected whatever he thought likely to excite public curiosity.

By these and other means, particularly by his singular advertisements, which were generally accompanied by some sarcastic stanza on public men and measures, he generally filled his room. Sometimes one of his old Bloomsbury friends caught the speaker's eye; on which occasions, Henley could not suppress the ebullitions of vanity and resentment; he would suddenly arrest his discourse, and address the unfortunate interloper in words to the following effect: "You see, sir, all the world is not exactly of your opinion; there are, you perceive, a few sensible people who think me not wholly unqualified for the office I have undertaken."

His abashed and confounded adversaries, thus attacked (in a public company, a most awkward species of address), were glad to retire, and in some instances were pushed out of the room.

On the Sabbath day he generally read part of the liturgy of the Church of England, and sometimes used extempore prayer.

That the efforts of the oratory might be assisted by its handmaid, the press, Mr. Henley soon commenced author; the subject he chose, proved that he entertained no mean opinion of his own abilities. To render some of his pamphlets more impressive, or more attractive, he published them in a black letter type. The following were the title of a few of his publications:—"The Origin of Evil;" "The Means of Forming a Correct Taste;" "A Comparative View of Ancient and Modern Languages;" "Thoughts on the Scriptural Narrative of a Confusion of Tongues;" "A Defence of Christianity."

He was also supposed to contribute to the "Hypodocor," a periodical paper, published at that time; and is said to have received from Sir Robert Walpole, a present of a hundred pounds, as a reward for his services in that paper. Sir Robert was never reckoned any great judge of literary merit. Henley was also author of a pamphlet occasioned by his outbraving himself into a religious controversy on baptism, entitled, "Samuel sleeping in the Wilderness."

As his popularity increased, the place where he amused or instructed his friends, was found not sufficiently capacious, and he procured a larger and more commodious receptacle, near a Catholic chapel in Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

In a fit of humorous caprice, or in the hope of enticing some of the frequenters of that place of worship to visit him, he called his new room, in some of his advertisements, the little Catholic chapel. If any Catholics happened to look in after mass, he was studious of paying them particular attention and respect, and would, in some way or other, introduce a recommendation of universal philanthropy and religious toleration. On one of these occasions, he uttered the following apostrophe: "After all this outcry about the devil, the Pope, and the Pretender, who and what is this bugbear, this monster, this Pope, whom we so much dread? He is only a man like ourselves, the ecclesiastical sovereign of Rome, the father and head of the Catholic Church." When the lecture concluded, he was seen to advance towards a leading man among the Catholics, and shaking him heartily by the hand, welcomed him in the following words, "God bless you, I love you all; we are all Christians alike, from the same stock, divided only by a few non-essentials."

Whether this mode of proceeding was dictated by the liberal spirit of philosophical indifference, by Christian charity, by any latent Papistical propensity, or for the mere purpose of inviting customers of all persuasions to his shop, may be easily determined by considering the character of Henley. Having acquired, or assumed, the name of Orator Henley, it became the fashion in certain circles to hear his lectures; he attracted the notice and excited the resentment of Pope, who lashed him severely in his Dunciad. Much of the poet's satire is well applied; except where he describes him as a zany, and a talker of nonsense. This, certainly, is not a character or just description of Henley, who was impudent, insolent, and conceited, a vain-glorious boaster, determined at all events, and at all risks, to excite the attention of the public; but he exhibited at times a quaint shrewdness, a farcical humour, and occasionally a depth of reflection, far beyond the reach of a fool. He was rather what the Methodists once called their great episcopal assailant, (Bishop Lavington) "a theological and political buffoon."

A complete series of his singular advertisements, mottos, medals, and pamphlets, with a panegyric on him, in the form of a life, by Welstead, was at one time collected, and in the possession of an antiquary.

By coarse irony, vulgar railery, and a certain humorous quaintness of expression, he often raised the laugh against opponents, superior to him in learning and argument. Henley once incurred the hostility of the government, and was several days in the custody of a king's messenger. On this occasion, Lord Chesterfield, the Secretary of State, amused himself and his associates in office, by sporting with the hopes and fears of our restorer of ancient eloquence. During his examination before the Privy Council, Henley asked leave to be seated, on account of a real or pretended rheumatism, and occasioning considerable merriment by his eccentric answers himself joining heartily and loudly in the laughs he excited. The noble lord having expostulated with him on the impropriety of ridiculing the exertions of the country, at the moment a rebellion raged in the heart of the kingdom, he replied, "I thought there was no harm in cracking a joke on a red-herring;" alluding to Archbishop Herring, who had proposed or actually commenced arming the clergy!

A number of disrespectful and unwarrantable expressions he had applied to persons high in office, and to their conduct, being repeated to him, his only reply was, "My lords, I must live." "I see no reason for that, Mr. Henley," replied Lord Chesterfield. The council seemed pleased at the retort, but Henley immediately answered; "That is a good thing, but unfortunately it has been said before."

After being reprimanded for his improper conduct, he was in a few days dismissed as an impudent but entertaining fellow.

The following was circulated by Henley as an advertisement, or by way of handbill, in Oct. 1726:—

"Having been threatened by various letters, that if I do not drop the oratory, a minute account of my life and character shall be published, I take this method of informing those who propose undertaking it, that they must be speedy, or their market will be spoiled, as I am writing it myself.

"JOHN HENLEY."

SONGS OF TRADES, OR SONGS FOR THE PEOPLE.

THE following article, which will be interesting to the awakened intelligence of the working classes, is taken from the very amusing third volume, (lately published,) of Mr. D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature. When will the trades of all England have their songs? When they are all well fed and happy. This is the process with the birds, and it must be so with men. The time will come; knowledge, and self-knowledge, and growing benevolence, are all preparing it, songless and even discordant as much of the interval may be. But come it will, as sure as wisdom brings justice.

Men of genius have devoted some of their hours, and even governments have occasionally assisted, to render the people happier by song and dance. The Grecians had songs appropriated to the various trades. Songs of this nature would shorten the manufacturer's tedious task-work, and solace the artisan at his solitary occupation. A beam of gay fancy kindling his mind, a playful change of measures delighting his ear, even a moralizing verse to cherish his better feelings—these ingeniously adapted to each profession, and some to the display of patriotic characters and national events, would contribute something to public happiness. Such themes are worthy of a patriotic bard, of the Southey for their hearts, and the Moores for their verse.

Fletcher of Saltown said, "If a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make all the laws of a nation." The character of a people is preserved in their national songs. "God save the king," and "Rule Britannia," were long our English national airs.

"The story of Amphion building Thebes with his lyre was not a fable," says Dr. Clarke. "At Thebes in the harmonious adjustment of those masses which remain belonging to the ancient walls, we saw enough to convince us that this story was no fable; for it was a very ancient custom to carry on immense labour by an accompaniment of music and singing. The custom still exists both in Egypt and Greece. It might, therefore, be said, that the walls of Thebes were built at the sound of the only musical instrument then in use; because, according to the custom of the country, the lyre was necessary for the accomplishment of the works." The same custom appears to exist in Africa. Lander notices at Yaoorie, that the labourers in their plantations were attended by a drummer, that they might be excited by the sound of his instrument to work well and briskly.

Athenaeus has preserved the Greek names of different songs as sung by various trades, but unfortunately none of the songs themselves. There was a song for the corn grinders; another for the workers in wool; another for the weavers. The reapers had their carol; the herdsmen had a song which an ox-driver of Sicily had composed; the kneaders, and the bathers, and the galley rowers, were not without their chant. We have ourselves a song of the weavers, which Ritson has preserved in his "Ancient Songs;" and it may be found in the popular chap-book of "The Life of Jack of Newbury;" and the songs of anglers, of old Isaac Walton, and Charles Cotton, still retain their freshness.

Among the Greeks, observed Bishop Heber, the hymn which placed Harmodius in the green and flowery island of the Blessed, was chanted by the potter to his wheel; and enlivened the labours of the Piræan mariner.

Dr. Johnson is the only writer I recollect who has noticed something of this nature which he observed in the Highlands. "The strokes of the sickle were timed by the modulation of the harvest song, in which all their voices were united. They accompany every action which can be done in equal time with an appropriate strain, which has, they say, not much meaning, but its effects are regularity and cheerfulness. There is an old song used by the Hebrideans."

But if these chants "have not much meaning," they will not produce the desired effect of touching the heart, as well as giving vigour to the arm of the labourer. The gondoliers of Venice while away their long midnight hours on the water with the stanzas of Tasso. Fragments of Homer are sung by the Greek sailors of the Archipelago; the severe labour of the trackers, in China, is accompanied with a song which encourages their exertions, and renders these simultaneous. Mr. Ellis mentions, that the sight of the lofty pagoda of Tong-chow served as a great topic of incitement in the song of the trackers, toiling against the stream to their place of rest. The canoe-men, on the Gold Coast, in a very dangerous passage, "on the back of a high curling wave, paddling with all their might, singing, or rather shouting their wild-song, follow it up," says M'Leod, who was a lively witness of this happy combination of song, of labour, and of peril, which he acknowledged was a "very terrific process." Our sailors at Newcastle, in heaving their anchors, have their "Heave and ho! rum-below!" but the Sicilian mariners must be more deeply affected by their beautiful hymn to the Virgin. A society, instituted in Holland for general good, do not consider among their least useful projects that of having printed, at a low price, a collection of songs for sailors.

It is extremely pleasing, as it is true, to notice the honest exultation of an excellent ballad-writer, C. Dibdin, in his Professional Life. "I have learnt my songs have been considered an object of national consequence; that they have been the solace of sailors and long voyagers, in storms, in battle; and that they have been quoted in mutinies, to the restoration of order and discipline." The Portuguese soldiery in Ceylon, at the siege of Colombo, when pressed with misery, and the pangs of hunger, during their marches, derived not only consolation, but also encouragement, by rehearsing the stanzas of the Lusiad.

We ourselves have been a great ballad nation, and once abounded with songs of the people; not, however, of this particular species, but rather of narrative poems. They are described by Puttenham, a critic in the reign of Elizabeth, as "small and popular songs, sung by those Cantabrigii, upon benches and barrels' heads, where they have no other audience than boys, or country fellows that pass by them in the streets; or else by blind harpers, or such like tavern-minstrels, that give a fit of mirth for a groat." Such were these "Reliques of ancient English Poetry," which Selden collected, Pegys preserved, and Percy published. Ritson, our great poetical antiquary in this sort of things, says that few are older than the reign of James

I. The more ancient songs of the people perished by having been printed in single sheets, and by their humble purchasers having no other library to preserve them than the walls on which they pasted them. Those we have consist of a succeeding race of ballads, chiefly revived or written by Richard Johnson, the author of the well-known romance of the Seven Champions, and Delony, the writer of Jack of Newbury's Life and the "Gentle Craft," who lived in the time of James and Charles. One Martin Parker was a most notorious ballad-scribbler in the reign of Charles the First and the Protector.

These writers, in their old age, collected their songs into little penny books, called "Garlands," some of which have been republished by Ritson, and a recent editor has well described them as "humble and amusing village strains, founded upon the squabbles of a wake, tales of untrue love, superstitious rumours, or miraculous traditions of the hamlet." They enter into the picture of our manners, as much as folio chronicles.

These songs abounded in the good old times of Elizabeth and James; for Hall in his Satires, notices them as "Sung to the wheel, and sung unto the payle;"

That is, sung by maidens spinning, or milking; and indeed Shakspeare had described them as "old and plain," chanted by

"The splinters, and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their threads with bones."
Twelfth Night.

They were the favourites of the Poet of Nature, who takes every opportunity to introduce them into the mouths of his clown, his fool, and his itinerant Autolycus. When the musical Dr. Burney, who had probably not the slightest conception of their nature, and perhaps as little taste for their rude and wild simplicity, ventures to call the songs of Autolycus, "two nonsensical songs," the musician called down on himself one of the bitterest notes from Stevens, that ever commentator penned against a profane scoffer.

Whatever these songs were, it is evident they formed a source of recreation to the solitary task-worker. But as the more masculine trades had their own songs, whose titles only appear to have reached us, such as "The Carman's Whistle," "Watkin's Ale," "Chopping Knives," they were probably appropriated to the respective trades they indicate. The tune of the "Carman's Whistle," was composed by Bird, and the favourite tune of "Queen Elizabeth," may be found in the collection called "Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book." One who has lately heard it played, says, that "it has more air than the other execrable compositions in her Majesty's book, something resembling a French quadrille."

The feeling our present researches would excite would naturally be most strongly felt in small communities, where the interest of the governors is to contribute to the individual happiness of the laborious classes. The Helvetic society requested Lavater to compose the Schweizerlieder, or Swiss songs, which are now sung by the youth of many of the cantons; and various Swiss poets have successfully composed on national subjects, associated with their best feelings. In such paternal governments as was that of Florence under the Medici, we find that songs and dances for the people engaged the muse of Lorenzo, who condescended to delight them with pleasant songs composed in popular language; the example of such a character was followed by the men of genius of the age. These ancient songs, often adapted to the different trades, opened a vein of invention in the new characters, and allusions, the humorous equivokes, and sometimes by the licentiousness of popular fancy. They were collected in 1559, under the title of "Canti Carnascialeschi," and there is a modern edition, in 1590, in two volumes quarto. It is said they sing to this day a popular one by Lorenzo, beginning

"Ben venga maggio,
E'l gonfalon selvaggio."

(Welcome, welcome, may-time,
And the boughs they bring at day-time).

which has all the florid brilliancy of an Italian spring.

The most delightful songs of this nature would naturally be found among a people whose climate and whose labours alike inspire a general hilarity; and the vineyards of France have produced a class of songs, of excessive gaiety and freedom, called "Chansons de Vendanges." "Le Grand d'Assoucy describes them in his Histoire de la Vie privée des Français." "The men and women, each with a basket on their arm, assemble at the foot of a hill; there stopping, they arrange themselves in a circle. The chief of this band tunes up a joyous song, whose burthen is chorused; then they descend, and dispersed in the vineyard, they work without interruption their tasks, while new couplets often resound from some of the vine-dressers; sometimes intermixed with a sudden jest at a traveller. In the evening, their supper scarcely over, their joy recommences, they dance in a circle, and sing some of those songs of free gaiety, which the moment excuses, known by the name of vineyard songs. The gaiety becomes general; masters, guests, friends, servants, all dance together; and in this manner a day of labour terminates, which one might mistake for a day of diversion. It is what I have witnessed in Champagne, in a land of vines, far different from the country where the labours of the harvest from a painful contrast.

The extinction of those songs which formerly kept alive the gaiety of the domestic circle, whose burthens were always chorused, is lamented by the French antiquary. "Our fathers had a custom to amuse themselves at the dessert of a feast by a joyous song of this nature. Each in his turn sung—all chorused." This ancient gaiety was sometimes gross and noisy; but he prefers it to the tame decency of our times—these smiling, not laughing days of Lord Chesterfield.

"On ne rit plus, on sourit aujourd'hui,
Et nos plaisirs sont voisins de l'ennui."
(We do not laugh now-a-days; we smile; sage wit
Our very pleasures border on ennui.)

These are old French Vandevilles, formerly sung at meals by the company. Count de Granmont is mentioned by Hamilton as being

Agreeable et vif en propos,
Célebre diseur de bon mots,
Recueil vivant d'antiques Vandevilles

(Agreeable and apropos,
A famous sayer of bon mots,
A living storehouse of old Vandevilles.)

These vaudevilles were originally invented by a fuller of Vau de Vire, or the Valley of the River Vire, and were sung by his men as they spread their cloths on the banks of the river. They were songs composed on some incident or adventure of the day. At first, these gay playful effusions were called the songs of Vau de Vire, till they become known as Vaudevilles. Boileau has well described them:

La liberté Française en ses vers se déploie;
Cet enfant de plaisirs veut naître dans la joie.
(French freedom vents itself in song; the birth
Of Pleasure's child must needs be known by mirth.)

It is well-known how the attempt ended, of James I. and his unfortunate son, by the publication of their "Book of Sports," to preserve the national character from the gloom of fanatical puritanism; among its unhappy effects there was, however, one not a little ludicrous. The puritans, offended by the gentlest forms of mirth, and every day becoming more sullen, were so shocked at the simple merriment of the people, that they contrived to parody these songs into spiritual ones; and Shakspeare speaks of the puitan of his day "singing psalms to hornpipes." As Puritans are the same in all times, the Methodists in our own repeated the foolery, and set their hymns to popular tunes and jigs, which one of them said "were too good for the devil." They have sung hymns to the air of "The beds of sweet roses," &c. Wesley once, in the pulpit, described himself, in his old age, in the well-known ode of Anacreon, by merely substituting his own name! There have been Puritans among other people as well as our own: the same occurrence took place both in Italy and France. In Italy, the Carnival songs were turned into pious hymns; the hymn Jeau fammi morire is sung to the music of Vaga bella e gentile;—Crucifisso a capo chino to that of Una donna d'amor faio, one of the most indecent pieces in the Cantoni a ballo; and the hymn beginning,

"Ecco l'Imma E la Madre Maria,"

was sung to the gay tune of Lorenzo de Medici,

"Ben venga Maggio,
E'l gonfalon selvaggio."]

Athenaeus notices what we call slang or flash songs. He tells us that there were poets who composed songs in the dialect of the mob; and who succeeded in this kind of poetry, adapted to their various characters. The French call such songs Chansons à la Vade;* the style of the poissardes (fishwomen) is ludicrously applied to the gravest matters of state, and convey the popular feelings in the language of the populace. This sort of satirical song is happily defined,

"Il est l'esprit de ceux, qui n'en ont pas."
(The wit of those who have none.)

Athenaeus has also preserved songs sung by petitioners who went about on holidays to collect alms. A friend of mine, with taste and learning, has discovered in his researches "The Crow Song" and "The Swallow Song," and has transfused their spirit in a happy version. I preserve a few striking ideas.

The collectors for "The Crow" sung:

"My good worthy masters, a pittance bestow,
Some oatmeal, or barley, or wheat for the crow.
A loaf, or a penny, or e'en what you will;
From the poor man, a grain of his salt may suffice,
For your crow swallows all, and is not over-nice.
And the man who can now give his grain, and no more,
May another day give from a plentiful store.
Come my lad to the door, Plutus nods to our wish,
And our sweet little mistress comes out with a dish;
She gives us her figs, and she gives us a smile—
Heaven send her a husband!
And a boy to be danced on his grandfather's knee,
And a girl like herself, all the joy of her mother,
Who may one day present her with just such another.
Thus we carry our crow-song to door after door,
Alternately chaffing we ramble along,
And we treat all who give, or give not, with a song."

Swallow-singing, or chelidonising, as the Greek term is, was another method of collecting eleemosynary gifts, which took place in the month Boedromion, or August.

"The swallow, the swallow is here,
With his back so black, and his belly so white,
He brings on the pride of the year,
With the gay mouths of love, and the days of delight."

* Songs in the style of Vade,—from a farce writer of the name, who made it popular.

Come bring out your good humming staff,
Of the nice tit bits let the swallow partake;
And a slice of the right Boedromion cake.
So give, and give quickly,—
Or we'll pull down the door from its hinges:
Or we'll steal young madam away!
But see! we're a merry boy's party,
And the swallow, the swallow, is here!"

These songs resemble those of our ancient mummings, who to this day, in honour of Bishop Blaise, the saint of wool-combers, go about chanting on the eves of their holidays. A custom long existed in this country to elect a Boy-Bishop in almost every parish; the Montem at Eton still prevails for the Boy-Captain; and there is a closer connexion perhaps between the custom which produced the "Songs of the Crow and the Swallow," and our northern mummings, than may be at first suspected. The pagan Saturnalia, which the swallow song by its pleasant menaces resembles, were afterwards disguised in the forms adopted by the early Christians; and such are the remains of the Roman Catholic religion, in which the people were long indulged in their old taste for mockery and mummery. I must add in connexion with our main inquiry, that our own ancient beggars had their songs, in their own cant language, some of which are as old as the Elizabethan period, and many are fancifully characteristic of their habits and their feelings.

JOHN LEDYARD.

ABSTRACT OF THE MEMOIRS OF HIS LIFE AND TRAVELS.

JOHN LEDYARD was born in the year 1751, at Groton in Connecticut, a small village on the banks of the river Thames, opposite to New London. Little is known of his childhood; he attended the Grammar School in Hartford, and was originally intended for the law. The dryness of the pursuit, and perhaps the sedentary application, ultimately deterred him from that profession. He subsequently, at the age of nineteen, entered the Dartmouth college, just established by Dr. Wheelock; an institution intended to prepare young missionaries for the conversion and improvement of the Indians. His journey from Hartford to Hanover was performed in a sulky, the first vehicle of the kind that had been seen on Dartmouth Plain, and it attracted curiosity, not more from this circumstance, than from the old appearance of the equipage. Both the horse and the sulky gave evident tokens of having known better days; and the dress of their owner was peculiar, bidding equal defiance to symmetry of proportions and the fashion of the times. In addition to the traveller's own weight, the vehicle was burdened with a quantity of calico for curtains, and other articles to assist in theatrical exhibitions of which he was very fond. From the character of this outfit we may conclude that he did not intend time should pass on heavy wings at Dartmouth. Considering the newness of the country, the want of bridges, and the bad state of the roads, this jaunt, in a crazy sulky, was thought to indicate no feeble spirit of enterprise. The journey might have been performed with much more ease and expedition on horseback, but in that case his theatrical apparatus must have been left behind.

As a scholar, at college, he was respectable, but not over diligent; he acquired knowledge with facility, and could make quick progress when he chose; but was impatient of the school routine. Accordingly, he diversified his studies with acting Cato, and the like; but even this was not enough in the way of relaxation. He had not been quite four months in college, when he suddenly disappeared, without previous notice or permission. The full extent of his travels during his absence cannot now be known, but he is understood to have wandered to the borders of Canada, and among the Six Nations. Nothing more is heard of his missionary projects, although it is not clear at what time he absolutely abandoned them. When three months and a half had expired, he returned to college and resumed his studies.

If his dramatic performances were not revived, as it would seem they were not, his erratic spirit did not sink into a lethargy. In mid-winter, when the ground was covered with deep snow, Ledyard collected a party of whom he persuaded to accompany him to the summit of a high neighbouring mountain, and there pass the night. The night, as may be supposed, was dreary and sleepless to most of the party, and few were they who did not greet the dawn with gladness. Their leader was alert, prompt at his duty, and pleased with his success. The next day they returned home, all perfectly satisfied, unless it were Ledyard, with this single experiment of their hardihood.

After abandoning his missionary schemes, he began to grow weary of college, and the more so, probably, as his unsettled habits now and then drew a rebuke from the president, from which he determined to escape. On the margin of the Connecticut river, which runs near the college, stood many majestic forest trees. One of these Ledyard contrived to cut down. He then set himself at work to fashion its trunk into a canoe, and in this labour he was assisted by some of his fellow-students. As the canoe was fifty feet long and three wide, and was to be dug out and constructed by the unskilful workmen, the task was not a trifling one, nor such as could be speedily executed.

It was at last, however, finished and equipped. His wishes were now at their consummation, and bidding adieu to the haunts of the muses, where he had gained a dubious fame, he set off alone, with a light heart, to explore a river, with the navigation of which he had not the slightest acquaintance. The distance to Hartford was not less than one hundred and forty miles, much of the way was through a wilderness, and in several places dangerous falls and rapids. With a bearskin for a covering, and his canoe well stocked with provisions, he yielded himself to the current and floated leisurely down the stream, seldom rising his paddle, and stopping only in the night for sleep. He told Mr. Jefferson, in Paris, fourteen years afterwards, that he took only two books with him, a Greek Testament and Ovid; one of which he was deeply engaged in reading when his canoe approached Below's Falls, where he was suddenly roused by the noise of the water rushing among the rocks through the narrow passage. The danger was imminent, as no boat could go down that fall without being instantly dashed to pieces. With difficulty he gained the shore in time to escape such a catastrophe, and through the kind assistance of the people in the neighbourhood, his canoe was drawn by oxen around the fall. From that time, till he arrived at his place of destination, we hear of no accident, although he was carried through several dangerous passes in the river. On approaching Dartmouth many spectators were attracted by the singularity of his slowly floating bark, and all were conjecturing what it could be, till its questionable shape assumed the true and obvious form of a canoe; but by what impulse it was moved forward none could determine. Something was seen in the stern, but apparently without life or motion. At length the canoe touched the shore; a person sprang from the stern to a rock in the edge of the water, threw off a bearskin in which he had been enveloped, and behold John Ledyard, in the presence of his uncle and connexions, who were among the spectators, and imagined him safe at college.

He next studied regularly for the church; and, again, shortly changed his views, and was about to set up a school. He could not, however, rest still, but entered as a common sailor with Captain Deshon, a friend of his father's, for a voyage to the Mediterranean. At Gibraltar, it would seem, out of a gratuitous love of change, he entered into the British army; but was, presently, released, at Captain Deshon's persuasion and intercession.

After his return to America, he set out upon a romantic expedition to London; to discover some rich relations living there, and gain their friendship and assistance. Some slight doubts were at first thrown upon his identity, which so disgusted him, that he never afterwards would accept of notice or assistance from them of any kind. He said they were not Ledyards.

About this period, Captain Cook was making preparations for his third and last voyage round the world. Nothing could more exactly accord with Ledyard's desires. As a first step towards becoming connected with this expedition, he enlisted in the marine service; and then, by his address, obtained an engagement with Cook, who immediately made him a corporal. While on their voyage he was sent, as a volunteer, to examine a Russian establishment on the coast of Onalaska. He was sent alone, because numbers could not be spared for so hazardous an undertaking. At Otaheite, still a corporal, he conducted an expedition up the peak of Mouna Roa. He was close to Cook's person at the time of his death; and is of the opinion, which has more lately obtained, that Cook's own obduracy was the cause of his fate. While on board the Resolution, he wrote in a paper, got up among the officers, by whom his writing was considered somewhat florid and sentimental. From the specimens of his writings extant, this objection rather tells against the critics, than the criticized.

His next project was to establish a trade in furs, on the north-west coast of America. He spent a year or two in suffering incredible disappointments, and was ultimately obliged entirely to relinquish his projects. He is another instance of spirited enterprise left to shift for itself, while others profited by his invention. Among the many people who promised him the assistance of their capital, was Paul Jones, the famous captor of the Serapis.

His last disappointment found him in London, where he ultimately modified his views into a plan of travelling by land through the northern regions of Europe and Asia, over Behring's straits to the American continents. This he decided to do on foot. The day before he was on board, Ledyard wrote to Mr. Jefferson in the following animated strain:—

"Sir James Hall presented me with twenty guineas pro bono publico. I bought two great dogs, an Indian pipe, and a hatchet. My want of time, as well as of money, will prevent my going any otherwise than indifferently equipped for such an enterprise; but it is certain that I shall be no more in want before I see Virginia. Why should I repine? You know how much I owe the amiable La Fayette. Will you do me the honour to present my most grateful thanks to him? If I find in my travels a mountain as much elevated above other mountains as he is above other men, I will name it La Fayette. I beg the honour, also, of my compliments to Mr. Short, who has been my friend, and who, like the good widow in Scripture, cast in, not only his mite, but more than he was able, for my assistance."

The equipment of two dogs, an Indian pipe, and a hatchet, it must be confessed, was very scanty for a journey across a continent; but they were selected with an eye to their uses. The dogs would be his companions, and assist him in taking wild animals for food; the pipe was an emblem of peace to the Indians; and the hatchet would serve many purposes of convenience and utility. In December, 1786, he found himself in Hamburg with one dog, ten guineas, and perfect health. There he met with Major Langham, an eccentric traveller, just then in extreme distress. The guineas soon changed hands, and Ledyard would have had Langham accompany him part of the way. The major, however, had less sympathy than his benefactor, and bluntly answered Ledyard, "No; I esteem you, but I can travel in the way I do with no man on earth." Towards the end of January he arrived in Stockholm. The ordinary mode of crossing the Gulf of Bothnia in the winter, is by means of sledges on the frozen water. It occasionally happens, however, that the gulf, though too much clogged with ice for ships, is not uninterruptedly frozen over. The only means then of reaching Petersburg is by land, round the gulf, a distance of twelve hundred miles, over trackless snows, in regions thinly peopled, where the nights are long and the cold intense; and all this to gain no more than fifty miles.

Such was unfortunately the condition of the ice, when Ledyard arrived at the usual place of crossing.

The only alternative was, either to stay in Stockholm till the spring should open, or to go around the gulf into Lapland, and seek his way from the Arctic Circle to Petersburg, through the whole extent of Finland. He did not deliberate long. New difficulties nerved him with new strength to encounter and subdue them. He set out for Tornea in the heart of winter, on foot, and alone, without money or friends, on a road almost unfrequented at that frightful season, and with the gloomy certainty resting on his mind, that he must travel northward six hundred miles, before he could turn his steps towards a milder climate, and then six or seven hundred more in descending to Petersburg, on the other side of the Gulf. When Manpertuis and his companions were about leaving Stockholm, on their journey to Tornea, for the purpose of measuring a degree of the meridian under the Polar Circle, the King of Sweden told them, that "it was not without sensible concern, that he saw them pursue so desperate an undertaking;" yet they were prepared with every possible convenience for travelling and protection against a northern winter. A better idea of the degree and effects of cold, at the head of the Gulf, cannot be formed perhaps, than from Manpertuis's description.

"The town of Tornea, at our arrival on the thirteenth of December, had really a most frightful aspect. Its little houses were buried to the tops in snow, which if there had been any daylight, must have effectually shut it out. But the snows continually falling, or ready to fall, for the most part hid the sun the few moments that he might have shown himself at mid-day. In the month of January the cold was increased to that extremity, that Reaumur's mercurial thermometer, which, in Paris in the great frost in 1709, it was thought strange to see fall to fourteen degrees below the freezing point, was now down to thirty seven. The spirit of wine in the others was frozen. If we opened the door of a warm room, the external air instantly converted all the air in it into snow, whirling it round into white vortexes. If we went abroad, we felt as if the air were tearing our breasts in pieces. And the cracking of the wood, whereof their houses are built, as if the violence of the cold split it continually, alarmed us with an approaching increase of cold. The solitude of the streets was no less than if the inhabitants had been all dead; and in this country you may often see people that have been maimed, and had an arm or a leg frozen off. The cold, which is always very great, increases sometimes by such violent and sudden fits, as are almost infallibly fatal to those that happen to be exposed to it. Sometimes there arise sudden tempests of snow, that are still more dangerous. The winds seem to blow from all quarters at once, and drive about the snow with such fury, that in a moment all the roads are lost. Unhappy he, who is seized by such a storm in the fields. His acquaintance with the country, or the marks he may have taken by the trees, cannot avail him. He is blinded by the snow, and lost if he stirs but a step." Thus he reached Petersburg. Through innumerable difficulties he succeeded in reaching Yakutsk. There he was seized by order of the empress Catherine, privately examined before an arbitrary tribunal, and eventually conveyed to the frontiers of the country with an intimation that a second intrusion would be his death. We must not dismiss the Russians without extracting a remark of Ledyard's, illustrating the greatest excess of a mean passion that has perhaps been heard of.

The cause of this stretch of power is a mystery: at Yakutsk the officers gave it out that Ledyard was arrested as a French spy; Catherine herself said that she could not permit a man to rush upon the fatal dangers which Ledyard would have encountered. Every circumstance proves these reasons to be too absurd. The most probable reason was a compliance with the jealousy of the Russian Fur Company, who dreaded the appearance of such an enterprising man as Ledyard on the North West coast of America.

"So strong is the propensity of the Russians to jealousy, that they are guilty of the lowest offences on that account. The observation may appear trivial, but an ordinary Russian will be displeased, if one even endeavours to gain the good will of his dog. I affronted the commandant of this town very highly, by permitting his dog to walk with me one afternoon. He expostulated with me very seriously about it. This is not the only instance. I live with a young Russian officer, with whom I came from Irkutsk; no circumstances ever interrupted the harmony between us, but his dogs. They have done it twice. A pretty little puppy he has come to me one day and jumped upon my knee: I patted his head and gave him some bread. The man flew at the dog in the utmost rage, and gave him a blow which broke his leg. The lesson I gave him on the occasion has almost cured him; I bid him beware how he disturbed my peace a third time by this rascally passion."

Upon his return to London he called upon his friend, Sir Joseph Banks, who inquired what were his future intentions. The result was an introduction to the African Association; a society just then formed to encourage travellers to explore the interior of Africa. The following is an extract from the proceedings of the African Association; it is written by Mr. Beaufoy, the Secretary:—

"Sir Joseph Banks, who knew his temper, told him, that he believed he could recommend him to an adventure almost as perilous as one from which he had returned, and then communicated to him the wishes of the Association for discovering the inland countries of Africa. Ledyard replied, that he had always determined to traverse the Continent of Africa, as soon as he had explored the interior of North America; and as Sir Joseph had offered him a letter of introduction, he came directly to the writer of these memoirs. Before I had learned from the note the name and business of my visitor, I was struck with the manliness of his person, the breadth of his chest, the openness of his countenance, and the inquietude of his eye. I spread the map of Africa before him, and tracing a line from Cairo to Senaar, and from thence westward in the latitude, and supposed direction of the Niger, I told him, that was the route by which I was anxious that Africa might, if possible, be explored. He said, he should think himself singularly fortunate to be trusted with the adventure. I asked him when he would set out? 'To-morrow morning,' was his answer. I told him that I was afraid that we should not be able, in so short a time, to prepare his instructions, and to procure for him the letters that were requisite; but that if the Committee should approve of his proposal, all expedition should be used."

Hitherto in all his undertakings, Ledyard had been baffled by the most disheartening disappointments; now every thing seemed propitious; he had money at command, and influential men anxious to forward his views. Accordingly, he left London on the thirtieth of June. Mr. Beaufoy speaks of the interview he had with him, just as he was setting off, and adds these affecting remarks, as given in Ledyard's own words:—

"I am accustomed," said he, in our last conversation, ('twas on the morning of his departure for Africa), 'I am accustomed to hardships. I have known both hunger and nakedness to the utmost extremity of human suffering. I have known what it is to have food given me as charity to a madman; and I have at times been obliged to shelter myself under the miseries of that character, to avoid a heavier calamity. My distresses have been greater than I have ever owned, or ever will own, to any man. Such evils are terrible to bear; but they never yet had power to turn me from my purpose. If I live, I will faithfully perform, in its utmost extent, my engagement to the society; and if I perish in the attempt, my honour will still be safe, for death cancels all bonds.'"

From Cairo he writes thus to Mr. Jefferson. "At all events, I shall never want a subject, when it is to you I write. I shall never think my letter an indifferent one, when it contains the declaration of my gratitude and my affection for you; and this, notwithstanding you thought hard of me for being employed by an English Association, which hurt me much while I was at Paris. You know your own heart, and if my suspicions are groundless, forgive them, since they proceed from the jealousy I have, not to lose the regard you have in times passed been pleased to honour me with. You are not obliged to esteem me, but I am obliged to esteem you, or to take leave of my senses, and confront the opinions of the greatest and best characters I know. If I cannot, therefore, address myself to you as a man you regard, I must do it as one that regards you for your own sake, and for the sake of my country, which has set me the example."

His exertions, under the influence of the Egyptian climate, produced a bilious complaint; to alleviate which, he took vitriolic acid; but in so immoderate a quantity, most probably from mistake, that it caused a burning and intolerable pain, which terminated in death. The precise day of his death is not known, but it happened somewhere about the end of November, 1788. He was then in the thirty-eighth year of his age. The following description of him, is from the pen of Mr. Beaufoy:

"To those who have never seen Mr. Ledyard, it may not perhaps, be uninteresting to know that his person, though scarcely exceeding the middle size, was remarkably expressive of activity and strength; and that his manners, though unpolished, were neither uncivil nor unpleasant. Little attentive to difference of rank, he seemed to consider all men as his equals, and as such he respected them. His genius, though, uncultivated and irregular, was original and comprehensive. Ardent in his wishes, yet calm in his deliberations; daring in his purposes, but guarded in his measures; impatient of controul, yet capable of strong endurance; adventurous beyond the conception of ordinary men, yet wary and considerate, and attentive to all precautions, he appeared to be formed by nature for achievements of hardihood and peril."

His letters afford abundant proofs of a sweet disposition; no man was more unselfish in his dealings, or acted from a more extended sympathy with mankind. No man was more grateful to his benefactors, yet freer from servility. He was modest, unaffected, and not to be daunted by misfortune. His fortitude was of the finest kind; to great personal courage, an active body, with an expanse of chest which struck every one at first sight, he added great presence of mind, an inexhaustible patience, a fervent love for his kind, perfect confidence in the goodness of man, and of his God. We cannot conclude this article better than with his own words—his celebrated praise of woman, (written among the snows of Siberia,) which has become so famous for its great feeling and truth:—

"I have observed among all nations, that the women ornament themselves more than the men; that wherever found, they are the same kind, civil, obliging, humane, tender beings; that they are ever inclined to be gay and cheerful, timorous and modest. They do not hesitate, like men, to perform a hospitable or generous action; not haughty, nor arrogant, nor supercilious, but full of courtesy, and fond of society; industrious, economical, ingenious; more liable, in general, to err than man, but in general, also, more virtuous, and performing more good actions than he. I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship, to a woman, whether civilized or savage, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With man it has often been otherwise. In wandering over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark, through honest Sweden, frozen Lapland, rude and churlish Finland, unprincipled Russia, and the wide spread regions of the wandering Tartar, if hungry, dry, cold, wet, or sick, woman has ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so; and to add to this virtue, so worthy of the appellation of benevolence, these actions have been performed in so free and so kind a manner, that, if I was dry, I drank the sweet draught, and, if hungry, ate the coarse morsel, with a double relish."

A HAUNTED HOUSE.

In one of the baronial castles of the north, which had been uninhabited for years, there was heard at times such extraordinary noises, as to confirm the opinion among the country people that the place was haunted. In the western tower an old couple were permitted to live, who had been in the service of the former lord, but so imbued were they with the superstitions of the country, that they never went to bed without expecting to hear the cries of the disturbed spirits of the mansion. An old story was current, that an heir apparent had been murdered by an uncle, that he might possess the estate, who, however, after enjoying it for a time, was so annoyed by the sounds in the castle, that he retired with an uneasy conscience from the domain, and died in France.

Not many years ago, the property descended to a branch of the female line, (one of the heroes of Waterloo,) who, nothing daunted, was determined to make this castle his place of residence. As the noises were a subject of real terror to his tenantry, he formed the resolution of sleeping in the castle on the night he took possession, in order to do away these superstitious fears. Not a habitable room could be found, except the one occupied by the old gardener in the western turret, and he ordered his camp-bed to be set up in that apartment. It was in the autumn, at nightfall, that he repaired to the gloomy abode, leaving his servant, to his no small comfort, at the village inn; and after having found everything comfortably provided, turned the large old rusty key upon the antiquated pair, who took leave of him, to lodge at a farm hard by. It was one of those nights which are checkered with occasional gleams of moonshine and darkness, when the clouds are riding in a high wind. He slept well for the two first hours, he was then awakened by a low mournful sound that ran through the apartments. This warned him to be up and accoutred. He descended the turret stairs with a brilliant light, which, on coming to the ground floor, cast a gigantic shadow of himself upon the high embattled walls. Here he stood and listened; when presently a hollow moan ran through the long corridor, and died away. This was followed by one of a higher key, a sort of scream, which directed his footsteps with more certainty to the spot. Pursuing the sounds, he found himself in the great hall of his ancestors, and vaulting upon the large oaken table, set down his lamp, and folding his cloak about him, determined to wait the appearance of all that was terrible. The night, which had been stormy, became suddenly still: the dark flitting clouds had sunk below the horizon, and the moon insinuated her silvery light through the chinks of the mouldering pile. As our hero had spent the morning in the chase, Morpheus came unbidden, and, he fell asleep upon the table. His dream was short, for close upon him issued forth the horrid groan; amazed, he started up and sprang at the unseen voice, fixing with a powerful blow his Toledo steel in the arras. The blade was fast, and held him to the spot. At this moment the moon shot a ray that illumined the hall, and showed that behind the waving folds, there lay the cause concealed. His sword he left, and to the turret retraced his steps. When morning came, a welcome crowd greeting, asked him if he had met the ghost? "Oh yes," replied the knight, "dead as a door nail, behind the screen he lies, where my sword has pinned him fast; bring the wrenching bar, and we'll haul the disturber out." With such a leader, and broad day to boot, the valiant throng tore down the screen where the sword was fixed; when lo! in a recess, lay the fragments of a chapel organ, and the square wooden trunks, made for hallowed sounds, were used as props, to stay the work when the hall was coated round with oak. The wondering clowns now laughed aloud at the mysterious voice. It was the northern blast that found its way through the crannies of the wall to the groaning pipes, which had alarmed the country round for a century past.—Gardner's Music of Nature.

TABLE-TALK.

THE ITALIAN BOY.

[For the London Journal.]

I HAD only just heard of the murder of the poor wanderer, Carlo Ferrari, and having walked out in the hope of removing from my mind the painful feeling such atrocity awakened, I happened to overtake a lad with an organ and a little box of white mice. I now found any attempt to forget the murder fruitless, and minutely observed the youth before me. His eye, deeply sunken under a dark-lined brow, and his finely marked profile, told me from whence he came; he stopped opposite to a print shop, and having scanned the contents of the window, he suddenly fixed his attention on a drawing: a gleam of pleasure lightened up his face—his hitherto curled lip melted into a beautiful smile; a tear, like a fountain embosomed in a cave, stood ready to fall, when reverently uncovering his head, he moved his lips as it were in prayer. Gently retiring, and replacing his hat, he walked on. The object of his thought was a picture of the "Madonna and Child." "And they have murdered thy countryman," thought I, "and he was a stranger."

FREDERICK ARNAY.

Affecting proof of a loving disposition.—Three months before her death, (his wife's,) when she was so afflicted with an asthma that she could neither walk, stand, sit, or lie, but while on a chair, I was obliged to support her head, I told her that she never approached me without diffusing a ray of pleasure over the mind, except when any little disagreement had happened between us. She replied, "I can say more than that. You never appeared in my sight, not even in anger, without that sight giving me pleasure." I received the dear remark as I now write it, with tears.—Hutton's Autobiography. Hutton was a good and clever man, and with allowance for something a little coarse, a man fit to engage the heart of a sensible and estimable woman; but the compliment here paid him by his wife, though of the highest description, implies still more merit in herself than in him.

Singular Frontispiece to an edition of one of the classics, published about fifty years since on the Continent. The copper-plate which faces the title-page represents, on one side, Christ upon the cross, and on the other, a figure of the author, from whose mouth a label issues with the following words, "Lord Jesus, lovest thou me?" His question is thus answered by another label affixed to the mouth of the figure addressed; "Highly famed, excellent, and most learned Rector Seger, imperial poet, and well deserving master of the School at Wittenberg: yes, thou knowest that I love thee!!!" This is in similar taste to the portrait of the Spanish grandee, who was represented standing with his hat in his hand before an image of the Virgin Mary, the virgin saying to him, by the like help of a label, "Cousin, be covered."

Affecting Association of Ideas.—Poggio has commemorated in his Facetiae, (jest-book) a mortifying explanation which a noisy declaimer provoked by his over-weening vanity. A monk preaching to the populace, made a most enormous and uncouth noise, by which a good woman, one of his auditors, was so much affected, that she burst into a flood of tears. The preacher, attributing her grief to remorse of conscience, excited within her by his eloquence, sent for her, and asked her why she was so piteously affected by his discourse. "Holy father," answered the mourner, "I am a poor widow, and was accustomed to maintain myself by the labor of an ass, which was left me by my late husband. But alas! my poor beast is dead, and your preaching brought his braying so strongly to my recollection, that I could not restrain my grief."

LITERARY CRITICISMS.

Of their kind we know of nothing to compare with them; and if the large sum (not less we are assured, than six thousand pounds) which has been expended on them, do not command a corresponding degree of public patronage to the spirited exertions of the proprietor, the public deserves to be its own guide for the future."—Atlas.

THE FOREIGN EXCHANGE CALCULATOR. By the same AUTHOR, price 2s.

"Being a FAMILIAR AND PRACTICAL TREATISE upon the best means of resolving the money of foreign places into British sterling, together with accurate statements of existing monetary proportions between London and all places of importance abroad trading with England. By means of this book, the difficulties hitherto in the way of obtaining a competent knowledge of this very necessary branch of commercial education are completely removed—the whole being rendered perfectly simple, and easy of comprehension, and at less than one-eighth the cost of any work hitherto published on the subject.

IX.

THE COMMERCIAL CORRESPONDENT;

OR, UNIVERSAL MERCANTILE LETTER WRITER. By the same AUTHOR, price 2s.

It has very frequently been observed, and with too much truth, that out of fifty persons engaged in commercial pursuits, not more than one will be found competent to write a proper business-like letter; and the paucity of talent in this particular occupation is so great, that a clever corresponding clerk will invariably obtain the highest salary of the counting-house. This lack of capacity can only be ascribed to a want of some judicious means of instruction, and it is the object of this work to afford it, by giving a series of original letters on subjects strictly connected with the commerce of Great Britain, wherein will be exhibited the various forms of correspondence in general use amongst merchants—the peculiarities attached to different branches of trade, with the duties incidental thereto, with a description of the nature, quantity, and destination of goods, exported from, and imported into, this country; the whole forming an essentially useful companion to the Clerk, the Secretary, and the Traveller.

A PINCH OF SNUFF.

WILL the reader take a pinch of snuff with us?

Reader. With pleasure.

Editor. How do you like it?

Reader. Extremely fine! I never saw such snuff.

Editor. Precisely so. It is of the sort they call Invisible—or as the French have it, Tabac imaginaire—Imaginary snuff. No macuba equals it. The tonquin bean has a coarse flavour in comparison. To my thinking it has the hue of Titian's orange-colour, and the very tip of the scent of sweet-brier.

Reader. In fact, one may perceive in it just what one pleases,—or nothing at all.

Editor. Exactly that.

Reader. Those who take no snuff whatever, or even hate it, may take this and be satisfied. Ladies, nay brides, may take it.

Editor. You apprehend the delicacy of it to a nicety. You will allow, nevertheless, by virtue of the same fineness of perception, that even when you discern, or chuse to discern, neither hue, scent, nor substance in it, still there is a very sensible pleasure realized, the moment the pinch is offered.

Reader. True, the good-will—that which is passing between us two now.

Editor. You have it—that which loosens the tongues of people in omnibuses, and helps to thaw even the frozen-heartedness of diplomacy.

Reader. I beg your pardon for a moment,—but is thaw, my dear Sir, the best word you could have chosen? Snuff can hardly be said to thaw.

Editor. (Aside. This it is to set readers upon being critical, and help them to beat their teachers. You are right—What shall we say? To dissipate—to scatter—to make evaporate? To blow up in a sneeze?

Reader. I will leave you to judge of that.

Editor. (Aside. His politeness is equal to his criticism. Oh penny, two-penny, and three-halfpenny “trash!” You will end in ruining the trade of your inventors!) My dear reader, I wish I could give you snuff made of the finest Brazil, in a box of diamond. But good will is the flower of all snuff-taking; and luckily a pinch of that may be taken equally as well out of horn, or of invisible wood, as of the gifts of emperors. This is the point I was going to speak of. The virtues of snuff itself may be doubted; but the benevolence of an offered pinch and the gratitude of an accepted one, are such good things, and snuff-takers have so many occasions of interchanging these, that it is a question whether the harm of the self-indulgence (if any) is not to be allowed for the sake of the social benefit.

A grave question! Let us consider it a little, with the seriousness becoming snuff-takers, real or imaginary. They are a reflecting race; no men know better that every thing is not a trifle which appears to be such in uncleared eyes; any more than every thing is grand, which is of serious aspect or dimensions. A snuff-taker looks up at some mighty error, takes his pinch, and shakes the imposture, like the remnant of the pinch, to atoms, with one “flesh-quake” of head, thumb, and indifference. He also looks into some little nicety of question or of creation,—of the intellectual or visible world,—and having sharpened his eyesight with another pinch, and put his brain into proper cephalick condition, discerns it, as it were, microscopically, and pronounces that there is “more in it than the snuff-taking would suppose.”

We agree with him. The mere fancy of a pinch of snuff, at this moment, enables us to consider divers worlds of mistake in the history of man but as so many bubbles, breaking, or about to break; while the pipe out of which they were blown, assumes all its real superiority in the hands of the grown smoker,—the superiority of peace and quiet over war and childish dispute. An atom of good will is worth an emperor's snuff-box. We happened once to be compelled to moot a point of no very friendly sort with a stranger whom we never saw before and of whom we knew nothing, but whose appearance in the matter we conceived to be altogether unwarrantable. At one of the delicatest of all conjunctures in the question, and when he presented himself in his most equivocal light, what should he do, but with the best air in the world, take out a snuff-box, and offer us the philanthropy of a pinch? We accepted it with as serious a face as it was offered; but secretly the appeal was irresistible. It was as much as to say—“Questions may be mooted—doubts of all sorts entertained—people are thrown into strange situations in this world—but abstractedly, what is any thing worth compared with a quiet moment, and a resolution to make the best of a perplexity?” Ever afterwards, whenever the thought of this dispute came into our recollection, the bland idea of the snuff-box always closed our account with it; and our good-will survived, though our perplexity remained also.

But this is only a small instance of what must have occurred thousands of times in matters of dispute. Many a fierce impulse of hostility must have been allayed by no greater a movement. Many a one has been caused by less! The Times of Wednesday contained some extracts from a petition lately presented to the House of Commons on the subject of duelling; by which it appeared, that people have challenged and killed one another for words about “geese” and “anchovies,” and “a glass of wine.” Nay, one person was compelled to fight about our very peace-maker, “a pinch of snuff.” But if so small are the causes of deadly offence, how often must they not have been removed by the judicious intervention of the pinch itself. The geese, anchovies, glass of wine and all, might possibly have been made harmless by a dozen grains of Havannah. The handful of dust with which the Latin poet settles his wars of the bees, was the type of the pacifying magic of the snuff-box:—

Hi motus animorum, atque hæc certamina tanta,
Pulveris exigui jactu compressa quiescent.

These movements of high minds, these mortal foes,
Give but a pinch of dust, and you compose.

Yet snuff-taking is an odd custom. If we came suddenly upon it in a foreign country, it would make us split our sides with laughter. A grave gentleman takes a little casket out of his pocket, puts a finger and thumb in, brings away a pinch of a sort of powder, and then with the most serious air possible, as if he was doing one of the most important actions of his life (for even with the most indifferent snuff-takers there is a certain look of importance), proceeds to thrust, and keep thrusting it, at his nose! after which he shakes his head, or his waistcoat, or his nose itself, or all three, in the style of a man who has done his duty, and satisfied the most serious claims of his well-being. What should we say to this custom among the inhabitants of a newly-discovered island? And to provoke the poor nose in this manner! and call people's attention to it! A late physician, whom we had the pleasure of knowing, and who had a restless temperament, used to amuse us, as he sat pondering in his chair, with taking up a pair of scissors, and delicately poking the tip of his tongue with it,—thus taking delight in the borders of an uneasy sensation, for want of a better. We have often thought, that a snuff-taker, fond of a potent snuff, might as well addict himself to the doctor's scissors; or puncture any other part of his face with a fork at once. Elegant fork-takers might have boxes with little instruments made accordingly, and politely offer them to the company to poke their cheeks with. Or they might hover about the eyes; or occasionally practise some slight scarification. Bleeding is accounted cephalick.

It is curious to see the various modes in which people take snuff. Some do it by little fits and starts, and get over the thing quickly. These are epigrammatic snuff-takers, who come to the point as fast as possible, and to whom the pungency is every thing. They generally use a sharp and severe snuff,—a sort of essence of pin's points. Others are all urbanity and polished demeanour; they value the style as much as the sensation, and offer the box around them as much out of dignity as benevolence. Some take snuff irritably, others bashfully, others in a manner as dry as the snuff itself, generally with an economy of the vegetable; others, with a luxuriance of gesture, and a lavishness of supply, that announces a moister article, and sheds its superfluous honours over neckcloth and coat. Dr. Johnson's was probably a snuff of this kind. He used to take it out of his waistcoat-pocket, instead of a box. There is a species of long-armed snuff-taker, that performs the operation in a style of potent and elaborate preparation, ending with a sudden activity. But smaller and rounder men sometimes attempt it. He first puts his head on one side; then stretches forth the arm, with pinch in hand; then brings round his hand, as a snuff-taking elephant might his trunk; and, finally, shakes snuff, head, and nose together, in a sudden vehemence of convulsion. His eyebrows all the while are lifted up, as if to make the more room for the onset; and when he has ended, he draws himself back to his perpendicular; and generally proclaims the victory he has won over the insipidity of the previous moment, by a sniff and a great “Hah!”

We foresee that this article will be too long for the present number. We must finish it in our next.

THE WEEK,

From 18th to 25th of June inclusive.

MIDSUMMER WITH SHAKESPEARE.

NEXT Tuesday is Midsummer Day. Let us see if we cannot pass it with Shakspeare, by help of his “Midsummer Night's Dream.” What a dream for a full-grown poet, hacknied (as might be supposed) in the ways of the world! Milton, when he conjures up visions of bridal festivity, calls them

Such sights as youthful poets dream;

but Shakspeare was always young. The last play he wrote was Twelfth Night, with Viola in it,—a lover's play! The Midsummer Night's Dream, with two fond maidens, and its pretty cross-purposes between the four lovers, is another of the same kind. No man could have written it, who had not gone through all the faith and worship of the passion when young, and who did not retain a capability of it in the goodness of his heart. Shakspeare's genius, like the trees, was always prepared to put forth the youngest and tenderest blossom.

Did he actually dream this dream? We should not have wondered. While Burielgh was dreaming of despatches, and Sir Thomas Gresham of the Exchange, it is far from impossible that Shakspeare might have dreamt of lovers, and woods, and fairies. But at all events the play shews what he thought a fit dream for a night at Midsummer. And we may all partake of his dreams, at least by day,—politicians, merchants, and all. It will do none of us any harm, any more than a country walk, or the sound of the trees near the country houses that we possess, or hope to possess. It refreshes us for our tasks; helps us to remoteness and recreation, at a minute's notice, and in the intervals of our toil; makes the commonest in-door luncheon as if we took it on the grass, by the side of a brook, or in a June hay-field. Let us see how much June and Midsummer we can pick out of his play. Here is a morning by the sea-side, to begin with,—a picture uniting Claude and Titian. "I," says Oberon the fairy, (and Shakspeare might have said so to)—

I with the morning's love,* have oft made sport,
And, like a fosterer, the groves may tread,
Even till the eastern gate, all fiery red,
Opening on Neptune with fair blessed beams,
Turns into yellow gold his salt-green streams.

A BOWER FOR NOON.

I know a bank whereon the wild thyme blows,
Where ox-lip† and the nodding violet grows,
Quite over-canopied with lush‡ woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine.

TITANIA RECOMMENDS HER LOVE TO THE FAIRIES.

It is Mr. Hazlitt, we think, who has noticed the luxurious effect of the repetition of the rhyme in this passage:—

Be kind and courteous to this gentleman;
Hop in his walks, and gambol in his eyes,
Feed him with apricots and dew-berries,||
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;
The honey-bags steal from the humble bees,
And for night-tapers crop their waxen thighs,
And light them at the fiery glow-worm's eyes,
To have my love to bed, and to arise;
And pluck the wings from painted butterflies,
To fan the moon-beams from his sleeping eyes;
Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

In Shakspeare's time, the sound of the word bees in this passage was thought no such departure from the rhyme in i, as it is now-a-days. See the divine invocation to sleep in Beaumont and Fletcher's tragedy of Valentinian,—

Easy, sweet,
And as a purling stream, thou son of Night,
Pass by his troubled senses.

The fine ears of our ancestors discerned a harmony with the vowel e in the sound i,—ai-ee. Poetry was read more slowly in those days, and with a luxurious fetching out of the music. The Scotch, in their slower enunciation, retain evidence of the old sound. There is an e discernible in the way in which they pronounce the words light and night—Laigh-eet—Naigh-eet.

DEW-FALL.

I, says Puck,

— Serve the fairy green,
To dew her orbs‡ upon the green;
The cow-slips tall her pensioners be,
In their gold coats spots you see;
Those be rubies, fairy favours;
In those freckles live their savours:
I must go seek some dew-drops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.

EVENING.

Wania (to her fairies) Come, now a roundel,¶ and a fairy song;
Then, for the third part of a minute, hence;
Some to kill cankers in the musk-rose buds;
Some war with rear-mice for their leathern wings,
To make my small elves coats; and some, keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots and wonders
At our quaint spirits. Sing me now asleep,
Then to your offices, and let me rest.

* Cephalus, with whom Aurora was in love.

† The greater cowslip.

‡ Some say of a deep colour opposed to a faint one, others vigorous of growth, or exuberant, as if a contraction of "Insculous." "Eglantine" (a beautiful word) is the wild rose or sweet-brier, though Milton has made a distinction between them in his Allegro.

§ Gooseberries.

¶ Fairy circles or rings.

¶ A dance round about her.

 Bats.

All these "offices" are to be done in the "third part of a minute." A truly pigmy division of time, without being made too little. An inferior poet might have said the tenth part of a minute; but there are probabilities in Fairy-land as elsewhere; and Shakspeare must stick to truth!

NIGHT.

The iron tongue of midnight has told twelve.
Lovers, to bed.

June has ever been a bridal month; for by a most unseasonable superstition (we know not why) it was formerly thought unlucky to marry in the month of May. We would have concluded with a passage of exquisite delicacy, out of Mr. Campbell's "Gertrude of Wyoming," not unworthy to close these luxuries of Shakspeare; but somebody has got our copy of the book.

BIRTH DAYS.

June 20th, (8th O. S.) 1635, in Piedmont, of a noble family, Giovanni Domenico Cassini, the astronomer, who determined the diurnal motion of the planet Jupiter round his axis, by means of his belt, and made several other interesting discoveries.

June 23d, (11th O. S.) 1588, at Bentworth, in Hampshire, George Wither, a puritan writer, the rescue of some of whose verses from an oblivion too well merited by the prosaicalness and contented mediocrity of the rest, affords a gratifying proof of the discernment and justice of the present taste in poetry. We allude chiefly to his "Address to his Muse," which has been praised by Mr. Wordsworth and Mr. Lamb, and extracted by Mr. Hazlitt into his "New Elegant Extracts." Wither wrote it during an imprisonment occasioned by a political satire. An ample memoir of this author has just appeared in the "Lives of Sacred Poets," by Robert Aris Wilmott, Esq. of Trinity College, Cambridge; * a work interesting to the curious in poetry for its research, its air of sincerity, and yet at the same time, the more than justice, the generosity, which it shows to the very unequal objects of its criticism. Our own criticism upon it is at all events not hasty, for we have read every bit of the volume, and will read with equal attention as many more as Mr. Wilmott chuses to favour the public with, though he may dwell a little too much, perhaps, on points important only to book antiquaries. So delightful is the sincerity of an amiable man of taste. The following short extract from the life of Giles Fletcher, (cousin of Fletcher the dramatist,) a real poet, though failing with posterity for want of the power of selecting his thoughts, contains some delicate, seasonable touches, truly enjoyed both by poet and critic, upon three very pleasant things, to wit:—

NIGHTINGALES, VIOLETS, AND DEW-DROPS

"The monosyllabic terminations of the following lines produce (observes Mr. Wilmott) an inharmonious effect, but the imagery is very rural.

"Tell me, sad Philomel, that yonder sits't
Piping thy songs unto the dancing twig,
And to the water-fall thy music fit'st,
So let the friendly prickles never dig
Thy watchful breast with wound or small or big.
Whereon thou lean'st; so let the hissing snake.
Sliding with shrinking silence, never take
Th' unwary foot, while thou perchance hang'st half awake.

"The picture (continues the critic) of "the snake sliding with shrinking silence," is one of the happiest touches of description I have ever seen. It would be impossible more vividly to represent the sudden rustling of the leaves, and the shrinking stillness that follows. The idea is partly borrowed from Virgil.

"The following verses upon the "velvet-headed violets," are equally meritorious in a different manner:

"So let the silver dew but lightly lie
Like little watery worlds, within your azure sky,"

"This image might have dropped from the pencil of Rubens. Every wanderer in our green lanes on a spring morning, must have seen these "little watery worlds."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XIX.—GEORGE PSALMANAZAR, A LITERARY IMPOSTOR.

GEORGE PSALMANAZAR, a man of learning, of unknown origin, and subsequently one of the writers employed in compiling the Universal History, a task which he appears to have executed with sufficient skill and fidelity, actually took the pains to invent a language, which he wrote and spoke to the satisfaction of curious enquirers, alleging it to be that of the island of Formosa, where he pretended to have been born.

This adventurer, who attracted in his time no small attention, was first noticed by a Col. Lauder, in the garrison of Sluys, at which place, a wanderer from his parents and country, and under the pressure of extreme poverty, he had enlisted as a private soldier. But he industriously and artfully circulated a strange story that he was a native of the above island, converted from idolatry by certain missionaries of the Society of Jesus, and that he was obliged to fly from the vengeance of the Japanese, whose hatred used to be described as particularly virulent against Christianity in all its forms.

The singularity of this relation, and the apparent simplicity of the stranger's manners, induced the Colonel, and Innes, his regimental chaplain, an unprincipled profligate, to take him under their protection. Psalmanazar accompanied them to England, and was soon after introduced to the Bishop of London, who listened to his account with pity and implicit faith, became his patron, contributed generously towards his support, and rewarded with considerable preferment, the chaplain Innes, who was aware of, and had early detected the cheat, but considered it as a convenient step to patronage.

The artful conduct of the stranger, in producing and speaking a language, alphabet, and grammar, purely of his own invention, and of his eating raw meat, roots, and herbs, soon rendered him an object of public notice, and occasioned much curious disquisition between many characters of the first rank in church and state. The keen-eyed scepticism of the Doctors Halley, Mead, and Woodward, rescued them, however, from the charge of blind credulity, in which many of their respectable contemporaries were involved; these gentlemen had cried down Psalmanazar as an arrant rogue from the beginning.

The most sanguine hopes of the impostor, could he have silenced the accusation of his own heart, appear to have been crowned with success, and he derived liberal contributions from the pity, the curiosity, or the folly of mankind, who considered it their duty as Christians and as men, to protect an unfortunate fugitive, who had suffered in the cause of truth.

Psalmanazar drew up, in Latin, an account of the Island of Formosa, a consistent and entertaining work, which was translated and hurried through the press, had a rapid sale, and is quoted, without suspicion, by Buffon, whilst his adherence to certain singularities in his manners and diet, gathered from popular opinion, or from books, considerably strengthened the imposition for the carrying on of which he was eminently qualified, by possessing a command of countenance, temper, and recollection, which no perplexity, rough usage, or cross examination, could ruffle or derange.

His memory was, at the same time, so correctly tenacious, that after the exercise of habit, in verbal arrangement, on being desired to translate a long list of English words into the Formosan language, they were marked down without his knowledge, and his credit was considerably corroborated by his correctly fixing the same terms to the same words, three, six, or even twelve months afterwards. In this manner his imposture had been first discovered by Innes, but this disgrace to his cloth suppressed what he knew, and joined in the fraud, from sinister motives.

By favour of the Bishop of Oxford, who proved a warm advocate in his cause, Psalmanazar was enabled to improve himself in his studies, and convenient apartments were provided for him in one of the colleges of that university. To impress his neighbours at this place with proper ideas of his intense and unceasing application, it was his custom to keep lighted candles in his room during the night, and to sleep in an easy chair: that his bed-maker, finding his bed untumbled (and not failing to repeat the circumstance) might not suppose he indulged in so unphilosophical and illiterate a refreshment, as going to bed; he would also occasionally lament the noise and interruptions of certain young men in an adjoining apartment, who preferred the joys of wine and good fellowship, to solitude and midnight studies.

On his return to London, he drew up, at the desire of his ecclesiastical friends, a Version of the Church Catechism, in what he called his native tongue, which was examined by the learned, found regular and grammatical, and pronounced a real language and no counterfeit. By these and other conciliating arts, the supplies of his patrons continued liberal, and he was enabled to lead an idle, and in some instances, when he was thrown off his guard, an extravagant life. The person of our Formosan was far from being attractive, but his qualities, it is said, were thought otherwise by some fashionable ladies, one of whom is reported to have exclaimed, "I positively shall never be easy till I have been introduced to this strange man with a hard name, who has fled from Japan, and eats raw meat."

But many of his friends were offended by such conduct; and the critics, and among others, Dr. Douglas, "the scourge of impostors, the terror of quacks," could not rest till their doubts and incredulity were justified. They pointed out various absurdities and many contradictions, in his narrative, as well as in his declarations; he was gradually lowered in the general esteem, his benefactors silently withdrew their support;—the fraud was at length understood; the favour of the public converted, by a natural process, into resentment; and those who had originally given warning against the imposture, did not forget to increase the confusion of their opponents, by ridicule and sarcasm.

The situation of Psalmanazar thus became critical. Detected, and almost deserted, his subsistence was precarious, but having displayed in his assumed character considerable abilities, and having cultivated an extensive acquaintance with a class of men, who have been pronounced the best patrons of literary adventure, he was employed by the booksellers in a periodic publication, and lastly in a Universal History, a considerable portion of the ancient part of which was committed to his care.

By degrees he became quiet, untalked of, and comparatively respectable, and he privately confessed his imposture. He could never be prevailed on to disclose his real name and country, (supposed to be the South of France); he was afraid, he said, of disgracing his family; but the imposition he confessed thoroughly, adding to his confession all the marks of remorse. His repentance was sincere, in the opinion of Dr. Johnson, who used to say that the sorrows of Paalmanazer, in speaking of his deception, were heartfelt, strong, and energetic, like those of Peter after the denial of his Saviour, when he went out and wept bitterly; it was no common grief, arising from blasted hopes, but a real hatred of himself for the crime he had committed, and a dread of that punishment which he thought he deserved. His frame on these occasions was shaken and convulsed, his face drowned in tears, and his utterance choked with sobs; a spectacle which no feeling man could behold without emotion, or consider as produced by any thing short of real anguish.

Upon the whole, Paalmanazer appears to have been a clever, weak, and not bad-hearted man, whose vanity supported him in his falsehood till he got tired of it, and who then took extreme pity on himself and so was drowned in tears. The best point about him, and which shews his nature to have been good in the main, was his being able to sit down quietly and earn an honest living.

MODERN ANTIQUES.

PAGANINI ANTICIPATED.

(From the Common Place Book of a bookish Comedian.)

"There is nothing new under the sun."

My motto is nearly "as old as the hills," yet in spite of proverbial wisdom, and the march of intellect; John Bull still retains all his inordinate passion for novelties, and eagerly welcomes every supposed rarity with his usual cuckoo cry, "wonderful, wonderful! and most wonderful wonderful!! and yet again wonderful!!! and after that out of all whooping!!!!" In reality, however, most modern marvels, are merely reproduced, or reimported objects of ancient popularity, and the fashionable plaudits of to-day, only echo the acclamations bestowed by the children of Cockerney on similar exhibitions some centuries past. Public shows of animal sagacity are to be traced from very remote antiquity. It is asserted by classical authority that the effeminate Sybarites taught their horses to tread a measure "in graceful motion to harmonious sounds," and even elephants were displayed on the tight rope in imperial Rome. Zoological exercises are of early record in Britain. Caesar bears testimony to the skill of the Aborigines in managing their coursers when he first invaded the island, and Mr. Sukkt in his "Sports and Pastimes" has copied from an M. S. of the fourteenth century, in the Bodleian collection, several curious sketches of horse display, with various others, one representing a cock dancing on stilts to the music of a pipe and tabor, and another, a hare standing on his hind legs whilst beating the latter instrument. At a later period, Ben Jonson, also, enumerates among the amusements of Bartholomew Fair, "The Hare o' th' Taber" and a company of dogs that danced the morris. From the same minute painter of manners and customs, it appears that the "Industrious Fleas" now "all alive" in Regent Street, are not original in their achievements, for Lovewit, in "The Alchemist" of 1610, mentions among the "curiosities" then to be seen in London "the fleas that run at tilt upon a table." In the present age, the quadrupeds trained by Ducrow, though they may do every thing but speak, will never equal in fame, Bankes's celebrated bay horse, Morocco, so frequently alluded to by Shakespeare and his poetic brethren of the Elizabethan era; nor will the name of Ducrow himself, though the daring of his unrivalled equestrian feats, might lead a spectator to imagine he bore "a charmed life," descend to posterity with the singular honours that closed the career of Bankes and his learned steed at Rome, where the skill of Morocco in arithmetic, dancing, dice playing, and other accomplishments (some not very decorous), aroused the horrors of superstition to such a degree, that both the master and his docile pupil were, as "rare Ben" records in one of his epigrams, "burned for one witch" by command from the Pope, who decided that the wonders witnessed must be effected by too familiar an acquaintance with a certain personage unmentionable to "ears polite." Of biped prodigies, I presume, the most remarkable now extant, is the musical magician, who when he first drew bow in Britain, was shrewdly suspected of practising, like poor Bankes, "arts inhibited and out of warrant." Indeed, a poet not unknown to fame, openly sang, scarce seven days since, of this "observed of all observers"—

"The utmost seem'd,
To feeble or to melancholy eyes,
One that had parted with his soul for pride,
And in the sable secret liv'd forlorn."

With these surmises respecting the unearthly powers of Paganini floating in my memory, I was much interested by accidentally meeting in the course of my desultory studies, with some notices of another individual, so extraordinary in their coincidence of circumstances as almost "makes me waver in belief, to hold opinion with Pythagoras," for admitting the possibility of spiritual transmigration. I should at once say that the mortal frame of the Italian maestro, is but the temporary tenement of a wandering soul; perhaps, in its primeval state, the amputating essence of Orpheus, but which in the Seventeenth century inhabited the body of "Thomas Baltzar, a Lubbeckerborne" who in 1658, at Oxford, Anthony a Wood (according to his autobiography), "did then and there, to his very great astonishment, hear play on the violin. He then saw him run up his fingers to the end of the finger board of the violin, and run them back insensibly, and all with alacrity and in very good time, which he nor any in England saw the like before." At a subsequent meeting, Baltzar "played to the wonder of all the auditory and exercising his fingers and instrument several ways to the utmost of his power; Wilson, thereupon the public professor (the greatest judge of music that ever was), did, after his humoursome way, stoop down to Baltzar's feet, to see whether he had a Huff-on, that is to say, whether he was a Devil or not, because he acted beyond the parts of man." The sensation created here by Paganini's first appearance among "the greatest judges of music that ever was," is so well known, and corresponds so completely with honest Anthony's narrative, that any further comment were a waste of words, but whether the mysterious incarnation of melody, in question, brought with him "airs from heaven, or blasts from hell," most assuredly it is very fortunate for the corporeal covering at present worn by him, that Auto da fe are no longer in fashion.

Our correspondent may be right, to a certain extent, in saying that "there is nothing new under the sun," but he will allow that it is difficult to say how far old genius may not revive with new variations; and surely it is a fine thing to have it back again at all. One of the very delights we feel in the playing of Paganini, arises from reflecting that the wonderful things one hears about the ancient Greek music are possibly realized in his "magic shell." The sun itself, under which there is nothing new, is a fine thing. We are glad of its shining, though our ancestors had it in the times of Orpheus and Solomon.

THE READER DOMESTICATED WITH THE OLD DUTCH COLONISTS AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

We always wish, when we give an extract in the "London Journal," to give one of as complete a character as possible,—something that comes home to the greatest number of people's feelings, and that comprises within its limits an entire and satisfactory account of what it undertakes to describe. We are particularly anxious that this should be the case, when the extract is long; and such we conceive to be the character of the following domestic picture, from Mr. Pringle's African Sketches,—a book that has lately issued from the shop of one who publishes nothing that is not worthy of reception.—Mr. Moxon.

On riding up to the place, which consisted of three or four thatched houses, and a few reed cabins (kerseboest huisjes) inhabited by the Hottentot dependents, we were encountered by a host of some twenty or thirty dogs, which had been lying about in the shade of the huts, and now started up around us, open-mouthed, with a prodigious clamour, as is generally the case at every farm-house on the approach of strangers. In daylight, these growling guardians usually confine themselves to a mere noisy demonstration; but at night, it is often a matter of no small peril to approach a farm-house, for many of these animals are both fierce and powerful, and will not hesitate to attack a stranger, if, in their eyes, he has the ill luck to appear in any way suspicious. The barking of the dogs brought out Arend Coetzer, one of the farmer's sons, from the principal dwelling-house, a frank young fellow who had previously visited us at at Glen-Lynden. Seeing us thus beset, he came instantly to our help against the canine rabble, whom he discomfited with great vigour by hurling at them a few of the half-gnawed bones and bullocks horns which were lying about the place. The young boor was rejoiced to see me, and introduced me to his mother and sisters—a quiet looking matron, and two bashful girls, who now made their appearance from the house. My companion was already known to them. "Wil mynheer afadel?" ("Will the gentleman unasside?") was the first enquiry. I readily agreed, intending indeed, though it was still early in the afternoon, to spend the night in this place, with the view of becoming better acquainted with our rustic neighbours.

On entering the house, I found that the old boor had not risen from his afternoon nap or siesta, a habit which is generally prevalent throughout the colony. He was not long, however, in making his appearance; and after shaking hands with a sort of gruff heartiness, he took down a bottle of brandy from a shelf, and urged me to drink a dram (zoopgi) with him, assuring me that it was good brandewyn, distilled by himself from his own peaches. I tasted the spirit, which was colourless, with something of the flavour of bad whiskey; but preferred regaling myself with a cup of tea, which had in the meanwhile been prepared and poured out for me by the respectable and active-looking dame. This tea-water is made by a decoction rather than an infusion, of the Chinese leaf, and being diluted with a certain proportion of boiling water, without any admixture of milk or sugar, is offered to any visitor who may chance to arrive during the heat of the day. A small tin-box, containing sugar-candy, is sometimes handed round with the "tea-water," from which each person takes a little bit to keep in his mouth, and thus to sweeten, in frugal fashion, the beverage, as he swallows it. During this refreshment, I carried on a tolerably fluent conversation in broken Dutch with my host, and his huisvrouw (housewife); and gratified them by communicating the most recent information I possessed of the state of European politics; respecting which, old Coetzer was very inquisitive.

The domicile of my hospitable neighbours, in which we were thus seated, was not calculated to suggest any ideas of peculiar comfort of an Englishman. It was somewhat of the size and appearance of an old fashioned Scotch barn. The walls were thick and substantially built, of strong adhesive clay, a material, which being well prepared or tempered, in the manner of mortar for brick making, and raised in successive layers, soon acquires, in this dry climate, a great degree of hardness, and is considered scarcely inferior, in point of durability, to burned brick. These walls, which were about nine feet high, and tolerably smooth and straight, had been plastered over within and without, with a composition of sand and cow-dung; and this being afterwards well white-washed with a sort of pipe-clay, or with lime made of burned shells, the whole had a very clean and light appearance.

The roof was neatly thatched, with a species of hard rushes, which are considered much more durable and less apt to catch fire than straw. There was no ceiling under the roof, but the rafters over head were hung with a motley assemblage of several sorts of implements and provisions, such as hunting apparatus, dried flesh of various kinds of game, large whips of rhinoceros and hippopotamus hide (termed Sjamboks), leopard and lion skins, ostrich eggs and feathers, dried fruit, strings of onions, rolls of tobacco, bamboos for whip handles, calabashes, and a variety of other articles. A large pile of fine home-made soap graced the top of a partition wall.

The house was divided into three apartments; the one in which we were seated, (called the voorhuis) (forehouse) opened immediately from the air, and in the apartment in which the family always sit, eat, and receive visitors. A private room (slaap kamer), (sleeping chambers) formed at either end of this hall, by partitions of the same height, and construction as the outer walls. The floor, which though only of clay appeared uncommonly smooth and hard, I found, on enquiry, had been formed of ant-heaps, which being pounded into dust, and then watered and well stamped, assume a consistency of great tenacity. In making these floors, however, care must be taken to use only such ant-hills, as have been broken up and plundered by the ant-eater, and consequently deserted by the surviving insects; otherwise, in spite of all your pounding, you may find you have planted two or three troublesome colonies beneath your feet. This floor is carefully washed over every morning with water mixed with fresh cow-dung, in order to keep it cool and free from vermin—especially fleas, which are apt to become an intolerable pest in such mansions.

The house was lighted by four square windows in front, one in each of the bed-rooms, and two in the voorhuis; and also by the door, which appeared to be shut only during the night. The door consisted of reeds, rudely fastened on a wicker frame, and was fixed to the door-post by thongs of bullock's hide. The windows were without glass, and were closed at night, each with an untanned quagga-skin. There was neither stove nor chimney in any part of the dwelling-house; but the operations of cooking were performed in a small circular hut of clay and reeds, which stood in front of it. The furniture of the sitting-room consisted of a couple of wooden tables, and a few chairs, stools, and waggon chests; an immense churn, into which all the milk saved from the sucking calves, was daily poured and churned every morning; a large iron pot for boiling soup, two or three wooden pitchers, hooped with brass, and very brightly scoured; a cupboard, exhibiting the family service of wooden bowls and trenchers, pewter tureens, brandy flasks, with a goodly array in phials of Dutch quack medicines. A tea-vase and brass tea-kettle, heated by a chafing-dish,—which with a set of Dutch tea-cups, and a large brass-clasped Dutch bible, occupied a small table at which the mistress of the house presided,—completed the inventory. The bed-rooms, in which I more than once slept on future occasions were furnished each with one or more large bedsteads, or stretchers, without posts or curtains, but provided with good feather beds, spread on elastic frames, woven with thongs of bullock's hide, like a cane-bottomed chair.

In a corner of the hall, part of the carcass of a sheep was suspended from a beam; and I was informed that two sheep, and sometimes more, were daily slaughtered for family consumption; the Hottentot herdsmen and their families, as well as the farmer's own household, being chiefly fed upon mutton, at least during summer, when beef could not be properly cured. The carcasses were hung up in this place, it appeared, chiefly to prevent waste, by being constantly under the eye of the mistress, who, in this country, instead of the ancient Saxon title of "giver of bread" (plafidiga lavedy, whence our term lady), might be appropriately called the "giver of flesh." Flesh and not bread, is here the staff of life, and the frontier colonists think it no more odd to have a sheep hanging in the voorhuis, than a farmer's wife in England would do to have the large household loaf placed for ready distribution on her hall table. At this very period, in fact, a pound of wheaten bread, in this quarter of the colony, was three or four times the value of a pound of animal food.

In regard to dress there was nothing very peculiar to remark. That of the females, though in some respects more slovenly, resembled a good deal the costume of the rustic classes in England about thirty or forty years ago. The men wore long loose trousers of sheep or goat skin, tanned by their servants and made in the family. A check shirt, a jacket of coarse frieze or cotton, according to the weather, and a broad-brimmed white hat completed the costume. Shoes and stockings appeared not to be considered essential articles of dress for either sex, and were, I find, seldom worn, except when they went to church or to merry-makings. A sort of sandals, however, are in common use, called veld schoenen (country shoes) the fashion of which was, I believe, originally borrowed from the Hottentots. They are made of raw-bullocks hide, with an upper leather of sheep or goat skin, much after the same mode as the brogues as the ancient Scottish Highlanders.

Having previously heard that the industrious dame, Juffrowe Coetzer, sometimes manufactured leather dresses for sale, I bespoke a travelling jacket and trousers of dressed Springbok skin, the latter to be faced with leopard fur, the price of which altogether was thirteen rix dollars, or about one pound sterling. I purchased also the skin of a very beautiful leopard, which one of the young Coetzers had lately shot, for half a pound of gunpowder.

Old Coetzer and his family, like the remote Dutch colonists generally, were extremely inquisitive, asking a great variety of questions, some of them on very trifling matters. Englishmen are apt to feel annoyed by this practice, but without sufficient reason; for although it betokens a lack of refinement, it is not at all allied to rudeness or impertinence; it is simply the result of untutored curiosity in the manners of people living in a wild and thinly inhabited country, to whom the sight of a stranger is a rare event, and by whom news of any description is welcomed with avidity. Instead, therefore, of haughtily or sullenly repelling their advances to mutual confidence, I readily answered all questions, including those that respected my own age, the number, names, and ages of my family and relatives, the direction and extent of my present journey, and the like. In return, I plied them with similar and still more various interrogatories, to all of which they not only replied with the utmost openness, but seemed highly pleased with my frankness.

In this manner I soon learnt that my host had eight or ten brothers, all stout frontier graziers like himself, and all with numerous families. His own family consisted (if I rightly recollect) of six sons and as many daughters, several of whom were married and settled in the neighbourhood. Two of his sons, with their wives and families, were at present living at this place in cottages adjoining to his house. The old dame informed me that she was herself by birth a Jourdan, and was descended from one of the French Huguenot families, who settled in the colony after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Her father, she said, could speak French; but she herself knew no language but Dutch. Her manner and address, however, retained something of the French urbanity and politeness, which contrasted agreeably with the Batavian bluntness of her husband.

After exhausting the usual topics of country chat, I suggested a walk round the premises, and we sallied forth, accompanied by old Winzel and his son Arned. They led us first to the orchard, which was of considerable extent, and contained a variety of fruit, all in a thriving state. The peach trees, which were now in blossom, were most numerous; but there were also abundance of apricot, almond, walnut, pear, apple, and plum tree, and whole avenues of fig and pomegranates. The outward fence consisted of a tall hedge of quinces. There was also a fine lemon grove, and a few young orange trees. The latter require to be sheltered during the winter, until they have attained considerable size, the frost being apt to blight them in this upland valley. All the other fruits are reared with care; peach trees often bearing fruit the third year after the seeds are put in the ground. From the want of care, however, or of skill in grafting, few of the fruits in this part of the colony are of superior sorts or of delicate flavour. The peaches especially are but indifferent; but as they are chiefly grown for making brandy, or to be used in a dried state, excellence of flavour is but little regarded. Some mulberry trees, which had been planted in front of the house, were large and flourishing, and produced I was informed, abundance of fruit. These were not the wild or white mulberry, raised in Europe for feeding silkworms; but the latter sort also thrive extremely well in most parts of the colony.

The kitchen garden was very deficient in neatness, but contained a variety of useful vegetables. Onions were raised in great abundance, and of a quality fully equal to those of Spain. Pumpkins, cucumbers, musk and water-melons were cultivated in considerable quantities. The sweet potatoe was also grown here.

Adjoining to the garden and orchard was a small but well kept vine-yard, from which a large produce of very fine grapes is obtained, but these, as well as the peaches, are chiefly distilled into brandy.

The whole of the orchard, vineyard, and garden ground, together with twenty acres of corn land adjoining, were irrigated by the waters of a small mountain rill, which were collected and led down in front of the house by an artificial canal. This limited extent was the whole that could be cultivated on a farm comprising about six thousand acres. But this is quite sufficient for the wants of a large family; the real wealth of the farm, so far as respects marketable commodities, consisting in the flocks and herds raised on its extensive pastures. This old Winzel himself hinted, as, shutting up a gap in the garden hedge with a branch of thorny mimosa, he led us towards the kraals, or cattle folds, exclaiming, in a tone of jocund gratulation, while he pointed to a distant cloud of dust moving up the valley,—"Near daar koomt myn kee—de beste tuin!" ("But there come my cattle, the best garden.")

On approaching the cattle-kraals, I was struck by the great height of the principal fold, which was elevated fifteen or twenty feet above the level of the adjoining plain, and my surprise was certainly not diminished when I found that the mound on the top of which the pen was constructed, consisted of a mass of hard, solid dung, accumulated by the cattle of the farm being folded for a succession of years on the same spot. The sheep folds, though not quite so elevated, and under the lee, as it were, of the bullock-kraal, were also fixed on the top of similar accumulations. The several folds (for those of the sheep and folds consisted of three divisions,) were all fenced in with branches of the thorny mimosa, which formed a sort of rampart around the margin of the mounds of dung, and were carefully placed with their prickly sides outwards, on purpose to render the enclosures more secure from the nightly assaults of the hyænas, leopards, and jackals. Against all these ravenous animals the oxen are, indeed, quite able to defend themselves; but the hyænas and leopards are very destructive to calves, foals, sheep, and goats, when they can break in upon them, which they sometimes do, in spite of the numerous watch-dogs which are kept for their protection, and the cunning jackal is not less destructive to the young lambs and kids.

While we were conversing on these topics, the clouds of dust which I had observed approaching from three different quarters, came nearer, and I perceived that they were raised by two numerous flocks of sheep, and one large herd of cattle. First came the wethers, which are reared for the market, and are often driven by the butcher's servants even to Cape Town, seven hundred miles distant. These being placed in their proper fold, the flock of ewes, ewe-goats, and lambs, was next driven in, and carefully penned in another, those having young ones of tender age being kept separate. And finally, the cattle herd came rushing on pell-mell, and spontaneously assumed their station upon the summit of the guarded mound, the milch cows only being separated in order to be tied up to stakes within a small enclosure nearer the houses, where they were milked by the Hottentot herdsmen, after their calves, which were kept at home, had been permitted to suck for a certain period. Not one of those cows, I was told, would allow herself to be milked, until her calf had first been put to her; if the calf dies, of course there is an end of her milk for that season. About thirty cows were milked; but the quantity obtained from them was scarcely as much as would have been got from eight or ten good English cows.

The farmer and his wife, with all their sons, daughters, daughters-in-law, and grandchildren who were about the place, were assiduously occupied, while the herds and flocks were folding, in examining them as they passed in, and in walking among them afterwards, to see that all was right. I was assured that, though they do not very frequently count them, they can discover at once if any individual ox is missing, or if any accident has happened among the flocks from beasts of prey or otherwise. This faculty, though the result, doubtless, of peculiar habits of attention, is certainly very remarkable; for the herd of cattle at this place amounted to nearly 700 head, and the sheep and goats to about 5,000. This is considered a very respectable, but by no means an extraordinary stock, for a Tarka grazer.

Every individual of an African farmer's family, including even the child at the breast, has an interest in the welfare of the flocks and the herds. It is their custom, as soon as a child is born, to set apart for it a certain number of the young live stock, which increase as the child grows up, and which having a particular mark regularly affixed to them, form, when the owner arrives at adult age, a stock sufficient to be considered a respectable dowry for a prosperous farmer's daughter, or to enable a young man, though he may not possess a single dollar of cash, to begin the world respectably as a Kee-Boer, or grazer.

After the folding of the cattle was over, my host shewed us his corn mill, which was of very small dimensions and simple construction. The water-wheel which was driven horizontally by the little canal of irrigation on its passage to the orchard, was only about five feet in diameter, and the mill-stones not more than two. A slender iron axle, of which the lower end was fixed in the horizontal water-wheel, passing through a small hole in the centre of the nether mill-stone, was mortised into the upper one, which by this means was put in motion. The corn was supplied by an orifice in the upper stone, and the flour conveyed by a little wooden spout into a leathern bag; and this was the whole machinery. I was informed it would grind about a bushel of wheat in eight hours.

On returning to the house, the feet of all the family, commencing with Winzel and his wife, were washed in succession by an old slave woman. Supper was then served up, consisting chiefly of mutton broiled and stewed, with excellent wheaten bread, butter-milk, and some dishes of vegetables and dried fruits. Supper (avond-stuk) is the principal meal throughout the interior of the colony; the only other regular meal being breakfast, which consists of nearly the same viands, and is taken about eight in the morning. Grace was said before and after meat by one of the young girls, daughter of our host.

My companion and I slept on feather beds spread on mats for us in the voorhuis, which is the usual dormitory allotted for strangers in houses of this description, where there are seldom spare beds or bed-rooms. On subsequent occasions, when I happened to spend a night at this house with my wife on our way to Cra-dock, we had a bed allotted to us in the principal sleeping chamber, old Winzel and his wife occupying another bed in the same apartment. Some other of our neighbours who had superior accommodations, such as Basend Baster on the Tarka, and William Prinsloo of our own valley, always had a separate chamber for us, however numerous might be their guests.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

ABSTRACT OF THE NOVEL OF "LA MAISON BLANCHE," BY PAUL DE KOCK, WHICH HAS NOT YET BEEN TRANSLATED.

M. ROBINEAU, a round, bustling little clerk, about seven and eight and twenty, suddenly finds himself possessed, by the death of a relation, of what is to his notions a handsome fortune. From an economical, thrifty quill driver he is changed into an anxious aspirer after grandeur and distinction. He must immediately have clothes, horse, carriage, servants, house, and, above all, a name, more sounding and genteel than that he was born to. A chateau, situated in Auvergne, is offered to him for purchase; it is a real castle, a castellated castle, and is called la Roche Noire! (the Black Rock) Admirable! In France, a man may take the name of his estate. "Monsieur de la Roche Noire!" What an acquisition of a name for ci-devant little clerk! Nothing will content him but immediate possession; before the place is put in repair, or servants engaged. He sets off post, accompanied by his two friends, Alfred de Marcey, the heir of a rich marquis, and Edward Beaumont, a young author, who kindly give Robineau their countenance and instruction while he becomes initiated in the mysteries of house-keeping and gentility. On the day of their departure, Robineau placed himself in the chaise before the horses were put to. Three times he sent for his friends. At length they arrive, the luggage is fixed, they set off, and Robineau exclaims "Now we are on the road to my castle!"

At the little town of Clermont Ferrand, Alfred and Edward insist upon abandoning their carriage, and pursuing the remainder of their journey on foot; although Robineau would have been better pleased to enter his domain in greater style. At the door of the post-house a man was indolently sitting on a stone bench, his dress was poor, or rather vagabond. He appeared about forty-five or fifty years of age, but his mean dress, neglected beard, and black hair, hanging in matted locks about his face, made his age difficult to be decided upon. Still, in spite of these disfigurements, his face exhibited the remains of beauty. His nose was handsome, his mouth well-formed, but almost devoid of teeth, his eye-brows black and arched, and his large black eye had an ironical expression which well accorded with the sarcastic smile that from time to time played upon his lips. His figure was tall and firmly knit. In short, although dressed in shabby trowsers of grey-cloth, a red waistcoat covered with stains, a great coat to which, in many places, were adapted patches of far other texture, worn out boots, and a blue handkerchief round his neck, he had something in his face which announced more than a common origin, and in his manners an air of ease and almost haughtiness, which contrasted strangely with his costume.

This man overhearing the gentlemen speak of walking to the chateau, which was six miles distant, offered himself to be their guide, but Robineau thought he recognized something of the brigand in him, and declined his services.

Alfred and Edward harass Robineau by their admiration of the beauties of Nature, which delays his approach to la Roche Noire. Their benign philosophy leads them astray into a village, where Edward writes verses; and Alfred joins a rustic girl in a dance. With much persuasion, Robineau gets them away from their pastoral attractions; but they have not got far on the way, ere they find they are overtaken in a miserable aml, by the dark night. They knock up some peasants, and demand a guide; but the road to la Roche Noire is through a lonely valley, by the "White House," which is said to be haunted. Its history may be briefly told. A thrifty peasant and his wife occupied a little cottage in the middle of a fertile valley. In the course of time, Andrew Larpottie, the peasant, built a house near his cottage, with a view to profit by its sale. About this time his wife took a child to nurse, which they said was of poor parents; and soon after Andrew sold his house to a gentleman named Gervais; the house was furnished, but not inhabited. Lights occasionally seen in it at night were the only signs it possessed of inhabitants of any kind. In process of time, the old couple died, and left their foster child, Isaura, who had grown up into a charming girl, in possession of their little cottage. She still possessed it, untroubled by the midnight lights that sometimes (so frightfully to the peasantry) broke the solitary and desolate look of the White House. Nay more, she herself shared the ill-fame of the house; for somehow or other she cured a neighbour's cow or so; had attended a wounded dog; and, per contra, many an accident that had happened to the flocks of the neighbouring goatherds was attributed to her arts. There was even a talk of a large black demon, that relieved the solitude of her life with his company. Isaura was left thus alone at the age of fifteen, and had continued to live so; cheerful, busy with her garden, her goats, and her household cares; gradually more and more shunned by her neighbours and unharmed by the neighbouring horrors of the White House.

As Robineau and his friends could not procure a guide, they were obliged to pass the night in the miserable hut of their informant.

On the morrow, under the cheering influence of daylight, the peasant set out to show them their way. Arrived at the White House, Alfred stopped to examine it, and knocked at the gate to see if it was really desolate. There was no answer to his knocks. The barking of a large Newfoundland dog at the cottage attracted their notice, and while they regard the noble animal with admiration, "There she is!" cried the peasant, pointing with his finger up a hill. The young men turned their eyes that way, and perceived a young girl, who, driving her goats before her, descended rapidly into the valley. Alfred and Edward are immovable, and follow the young girl with their eyes. Now she descends a rapid slope, and her feet seem hardly to touch the ground—now she sportively leaps across a yawning fissure; at length she is in the valley, and her features are more easily distinguished. Her large eyes, of a deep blue, are shaded by long black eyebrows; and her eyelids, often half cast down, add to the sweetness of her look, which has an expression of simplicity and tenderness. Her nose is small and well made; her mouth a little large, and smiling, exhibits teeth as white as enamel; her flaxen hair falls in large curls on her forehead, and appears kept with more care than is usual with the peasantry. Her complexion is but slightly tanned, for a large straw hat shades it from the sun; her figure is of a middle height, but light-some and graceful, her foot small, and her hand the dearest little thing in the world. A brown corset, and a shirt of the same colour, with a red and white apron, compose all that adorn her person; but there is a grace in the manner she wears them, that has little of the heavy and awkward appearance of the Auvergnates.

She is charming," cries Alfred. Edward says nothing, but cannot move his eyes from her. "Yes," said Robineau, "she is pretty enough for a peasant." The little girl frankly invites the travellers to take what refreshment her cottage affords. While she prepares their breakfast, her dog Vaillant, by his mistress's orders, shews the travellers round the well-kept garden. Returning to the house, they find a breakfast of fruit, milk, butter, and bread, disposed upon a table with a taste and propriety that charms the sight. While the travellers are at their breakfast, she sits near them with her trusty guardian at her feet. Alfred told her that they had knocked at the White House; she betrayed some anxiety to know whether they had been answered. She confirmed his idea that the house was empty. At length Robineau persuades them once more to set off.

We must cut short his reception at the castle, where he made his appearance on an ass, which he had picked up by the way; he would have got off at a little distance, but the impatient donkey carried the unwilling Castellan into the stable. He had sent on his valet the day before, to prepare his vassals to receive him with dutiful attention; accordingly he is received by two old men, who had the care of the chateau, a few rustics, a schoolmaster, a veterinary surgeon, and a crowd of little children. The chateau is old and in miserable repair; but its antiquity and name more than reconcile Robineau to the necessary expences for repair. Henceforward he insists upon being called Monsieur de la Roche Noire.

In the morning Edward arises betimes, before Alfred has yet left his chamber, and with much philosophical meditation sets out to pay a visit to the fair goatherd. He finds her in the neighbourhood of her cottage, reading while she is tending her goats. He finds she reads much; and a work of Florian's is before her. Edward recommends her choice; "I did not chose it," said Isaura; "it was given me to read." Edward was on the point of asking "by whom?" but he could not summon courage; and yet he felt most uneasy, and desirous to know. Sometimes the young girl chatted with him, in the most frank and innocent manner possible. One of her goats goes astray, and Isaura runs after it. Edward watches the grace and freedom of her action with admiration. He falls into a train of reflection. Her equivocal situation, her beauty, the solitude, his youth! He begins to think less charitably of her than before; and almost determines to try how far she is really to be tempted. While he is yet buried in reflection, Isaura returns; she comes again to his side, smiling as she says "Here I am!" There was in this action, and in her countenance so much of the confidence of goodness, and so much openness of manner, that Edward was ashamed of the thoughts which had come over him; and it was not till his pulse was calmed that he dared again look at Isaura. He declined her invitation to breakfast, and returned to the Chateau; determining on his way not to inform Alfred where he had been. Alfred, however, guesses; and next morning, when Edward rises, he finds Alfred has stolen a march upon him. He follows as fast as he can; and finds the more enterprising Alfred seated in the cottage, with a plentiful breakfast before him; not a bit of which has he touched. The lively fellow, too, lets out that Vaillant had aided her mistress in avoiding a kiss, which he would unceremoniously have given her. Edward cannot conceal his jealousy; and Isaura is surprised and terrified at the appearance of anger between the young men. They put a stop, however, to this folly, and agree to start fairly and frankly in rivalry, and as a preliminary, never to visit Isaura, except together. The reconciliation and quarrel were equally unintelligible to her.

Time passes away, but not a morning escapes without the two friends paying a visit to Isaura. At length M. de la Roche Noire having completed his repairs, gives a plentiful bustling fete to some of the neighbouring gentry, full of mock heroic pretensions and ludicrous accidents. That day de Marcey and Beaumont would not abandon their kind hearted little host. The party breaks up late, and Alfred sleeps heavily in the morning. Edward slept not at all. That day was the first he had passed in the chateau without having seen Isaura in the morning. He rose early, and Alfred was not ready to depart. Should he wait for him? He knew that Alfred's feelings were less serious than his own; and, for once breaking his promise, he left the chateau without his friend. Isaura had passed a wearier day than usual; she missed the society of kind friends, who interested her, and took such an interest in her. She did not attempt to hide the pleasure she felt in seeing Edward again. "Here you are," said she, "Ah! I thought you were not coming again!" Edward explains the cause of his absence. Isaura confesses that she has become so accustomed to see her two friends that she fears she will never be so happy again when they are gone. Edward cannot contain himself; he avows his affection and asks Isaura whether she can love him. "Mon Dieu!" cried she, "I love to see you—both of you—" "Both!—equally?" The young girl blushed; she could not say what she felt. Edward drew closer, and passing his arm softly round her waist, said tenderly, "If Alfred did not come again, you would be sorry?"—"I should think of him sometimes;—we would talk of him together!"—"And if I did not return, would you console yourself the same way, talking with him?" "Never! never!" cried Isaura, in an accent which came from her soul.—Edward presses Isaura to become his wife and accompany him to Paris. He traces with enthusiasm the happy life they shall pass together. Isaura's delight is damped: she cannot leave the neighbourhood of the White House! "Why?—is she not alone—an orphan?—Has she relations living?"—"No; but still she cannot leave the White House; nor can she explain the reason. Her tenderness and the frankness of her manner, in spite of this mystery, convince Edward of her honest affection. They part, secure at least of seeing each other on the morrow. On his return to the chateau Edward encounters de Marcey. Indignant at his treachery, enraged with jealousy, Alfred bitterly reproaches him, and without listening to his defence challenges him on the spot. Edward bethinks himself of his own happiness and of Alfred's disappointment, and reminds Alfred of their friendship. "Friendship!" cried de Marcey, "I no longer believe in yours." "Alfred, I have but one thing to say," Alfred, surprised, confesses that his own intentions were not so serious, and frankly gives up the contest to his friend.

Edward now passed every morning alone with Isaura. He would sometimes press her to become his wife; but she always urged the necessity of delay. His jealousy was at length excited. He watched her sometimes after he had parted from her. She was the whole time alone; nor attempted to go to the White House; if she turned her eyes that way her countenance was instantly saddened. One day, after he had taken leave of her, he proceeded to the White House. It was a stormy September day, and he knew Isaura would be confined to the cottage. A gap in the high wall admits him to the garden. At every step his feet are entangled in the weeds and branches that overgrow the paths. All is gloomy and silent. He gets through a window into the house. It is furnished; he sees a library, the source of Isaura's reading; and on the table there are pistols. But there is no appearance of living thing within the walls; all is deserted. He has discovered nothing.

One night M. de la Roche Noire's whole household are aroused with the alarming announcement that there is an apparition in the castle;—a light has been seen in an old and uninhabited tower. While Edward remains to secure the safety of the terrified ladies, for there are visitors in the chateau, Alfred undertakes to dislodge the apparition. He goes, and returns somewhat graver; but alleges that the alarm was in every respect groundless, and the household return to their respective beds. Alfred had not told precisely the fact; there had been a light in the tower, and on entering the top room in the old tower he had found the same old man who had offered himself as a guide at the inn at Clermont—Ferrand, when they first came to Auvergne. They had often met him in their walks since, and found him to be fierce, sarcastic, misanthropical; a strange mixture of blackguardism and philosophy; next kin to a beggar, but refusing all assistance; he called himself the vagabond. He had once sneered at de Marcey's allowing Edward to continue his visits to Isaura alone for he had perceived and watched their movements in that quarter; and had even offered to carry her off for him. Alfred indignantly repulsed him. He now came to tell de Marcey that the young girl they so much admired had already a lover; that a light had been that night shown in the windows of the White House; that upon perceiving it Isaura immediately went there and was received in the arms of a man. A full hour elapsed before she returned to her own cottage.

The following day being devoted to Robineau's marriage with the daughter of a neighbour, a most poor marquis, Edward was obliged to refrain from seeing Isaura. Next morning he rose full early and hastened to repay himself for the self-denial he had practised.

Isaura did not shew her accustomed delight at seeing him. She is pale and sad. Edward enquires the cause of her chagrin; with tender sorrow she tells him that she shall always love him; but that he must forget her;—she had been forbidden to see him more. "Ah, who has said this? could I but find the person?"—"No!" cried Isaura with terror, "you must not even seek him." "Him!—Isaura you betray yourself! who then is this man? What right has he over you?" Isaura does not know herself. She only knows that she owes every thing to him; even her support with the peasants who appeared to the world to have adopted her. Edward rushes from her in despair, leaving her hardly less miserable, though more resigned.

Edward communicated his unhappiness to Alfred de Marcey, who told him of the vagabond's communication. They determine to unravel the mystery, and set out at night to watch. They see Isaura leave her house;—she is received at the White House,—by Alfred's father, the Marquis de Marcey! Edward's plans of vengeance upon his rival fall to the ground. Alfred now exerts himself to remove his friend from the scene of his troubles, and to that end they take leave of the newly married de la Roche Noire, who has already begun to give up his independence to his high-born wife. Edward cannot resist taking a last look at Isaura, and they seek the cottage. All is still. They enter. Vaillant is stretched at length in the court, bathed in his blood. Isaura is not to be seen! In the immediate search after her, they encounter, with mutual surprise, the Marquis de Marcey; who relates the poor girl's history to them. The Marquis had married twice. His second wife married him solely from obedience to her father. On their wedding-night, she attempted her own life, but was saved by the vigilance of the Marquis. She then informed him, though almost distracted with grief and shame, that she had been attached to another, the Chevalier de Lavigny; but that her father, discovering the attachment, and disapproving of the dissolute habits of Lavigny, had dismissed him, and forbidden his daughter to see him again; not however before the libertine had effected her ruin. The Marquis consoled his unfortunate young wife the best he could, and promised to be to her a tender brother. He immediately took her to Italy, where she gave birth to Isaura. On their return to France, he put the child under the care of Sarpiotte, at the same time buying the White House. A few years after his grateful wife died of a broken heart, and ever since then he had continued to come down from time to time to see her child; but always secretly, making the White House his abode. Even Isaura knew not her own history. Late he had observed her changed in manner. He questioned her, and heard how she loved "Edward." He knew not who this Edward was, nor his friend. He could only gather from her description that they appeared to be young men of fashion; and, if so, he feared for her happiness; and thus had desired her to break off the connexion, ere it should be too late.

Edward, in spite of the misfortune of her birth, was as anxious as ever to obtain the good, lovely, and innocent Isaura for his wife. The Marquis was rejoiced in her having gained so true a heart; for he had long known Beaumont as his son's most estimable friend; and Alfred desired nothing better than to love and be loved as the brother of both. The first step was to seek the lost treasure; and they all united in the search. Their suspicions, directed by Alfred, lighted on the vagabond. For some time they sought far and near, in vain. At length Vaillant, recovered from his wounds, aided them in his search. He leads them to a hut they had visited before.

Alfred's suspicions were not untrue. The vagabond had entered Isaura's unguarded cottage, and obliged her to depart with him. He carried her to a hut in a lonely place, among steep places, behind which was constructed an excavation in the hill, with a private entrance, with no other opening but to the sky. Here Isaura remained for many a weary day. Her long delayed hopes were suddenly revived; she hears Vailant's bark; and now voices are calling to the inmates to open the hut. The Vagabond enters the excavation, a sword in his hand. There is no hope that he can fly with Isaura, or evade the sagacity of her faithful dog. He determines to take her life. Her prayers are of no avail, he aims a fatal blow; but a hard substance in her bosom receives the blow. It is a miniature of her mother, which is driven from its gentle resting-place by the violence. The vagabond starts. "Who is this?" "My mother," said the terrified girl. "Your mother! Adila! then you are—" He seemed paralyzed. Ere he recovered his self-possession, the three friends enter the cave. The vagabond received a fatal wound from the hand of Alfred, he fell, and, expiring, confessed that he had taken Isaura for the Marquis's mistress; and that his persecution of her he had meant for retribution, for he was—Lavigny, her mother's unworthy lover.

Isaura was insensible to the horror of her situation, for she had fainted when the entrance of her friends had assured her safety. Her father's degradation was kept from her: the dying Lavigny himself requested that she might not be taught to consider her father, and the worst enemy her innocence had had, as the same. The friends carefully conveyed her to the White House. Here she recovered, and was united to her loving Edward, and has lived since among the dear friends, whom misfortune had taught to appreciate her unvarying sweetness.

Robineau, three years after these events, abandoning estate, wife, name, and all his grand schemes, came up to Paris with the wreck of his fortune. The last we hear of him is that Alfred, who was married, still welcomed him as cordially as ever to his house, and had promised to procure him a clerkship, better than the one he had lost.

APPLICATION OF STEAM TO VARIOUS PURPOSES.

[From Mr. Alderson's Prize Essay (just published), on the Nature and Application of Steam; a treatise containing scientific knowledge with popular explanation, and illustrated by nineteen lithographic plates.]

STEAM is used for warming rooms, manufactories, and public institutions, of an ordinary temperature; hot-houses, forcing-houses, and woollen, cloth, cotton, and other drying houses, of a very high temperature.

From the facility afforded of varying the heat of steam by increasing or diminishing the weight upon the safety valve, it is now generally used in chemical operations, which require an exact and certain degree of heat steadily exerted, and has almost superseded the use of the sand-bath, so frequently mentioned in works on chemistry.

It is used for the boiling of salt, several patents having been taken out for the peculiar modes of applying it; and immense salt-works are erected, both here, in England, and on the continent, carried on entirely by steam.

In the manufacturing or refining of sugar it is also extensively employed, and patents are taken out for different modes of using it.

It is also in request for steaming wood, previous to its being used by coach and cabinet makers, ship-builders, &c., in order to soften its fibres, and facilitate the bending of it to the required form.

Patents have been taken out for washing by steam, but as "the women folk cannot be fash't w'it," the ingenious and well meaning inventors are, we believe, seldom applied to for licenses, and certainly have no ground of complaint for infringement of patent right.

In agriculture it is used chiefly for boiling, on a large scale, potatoes, turnips, &c., and the same for domestic purposes on a small scale, as also for warming baths and cooking.

It is also used for destroying those noxious vermin called bugs, and for hatching chickens; destroying life by its intense heat in the one instance, and producing it in the other by its gentle and continued warmth.

Steam has been successfully and extensively employed for extinguishing that element from whence it derives its power, namely fire. But although it is stated by some that when supplied in large quantities, where there is no current of air, it is of itself sufficient to extinguish conflagration, yet the most common mode is by applying its mechanical power to the working of a force-water-pump. This may be done to great advantage in any place where there is already a powerful engine in use for driving machinery, as an air vessel can be fixed in a tower in a central situation in the yard, and connected by pipes with the pump of the engine. A play-pipe should be fixed on the top of the tower, connected to the air vessel with an universal joint, which would command all adjacent buildings. This is done in the flax manufactory of Messrs. Marshall and Co., of Leeds, and at many other places in the neighbourhood; and we have been informed by persons who have seen it tried, that its action is so effective as to make the ejected stream of water break the glass of the windows.

It is a desideratum to apply this active and powerful agent to the common fire engines, and this has been successfully attempted by Messrs. Braithwaite and Ericson.

The machine is almost as small and compact, and when properly made nearly as manageable as the common fire-engine, with the advantage, that as soon as the steam is up, it never flags or tires. It consists of a boiler fixed on wheels, with springs similar to a steam carriage, and a working cylinder and piston, which by a crank of one or more throws works the required number of pumps. An air vessel is necessary to keep up an equable stream of water from the play-pipe: hose, buckets, &c., are wanted as in the common engine.

To protect the immense warehouses and other property on the banks of the Thames in and about London, a fire engine on the common construction is fixed in a wherry, to be rowed where wanted, and worked by hand, thus constituting a floating fire engine.

For cooking steam is much used, and particularly in large establishments; almost all the large taverns and the public halls of the city companies are provided with a steam cooking apparatus. A pipe conveys the steam along a sort of sideboard, upon which is placed, in properly constructed dishes of tin, the food intended to be cooked. Branch pipes of small diameter go from the steam pipe into the several tin dishes, with a cock to each to enable the cook or attendant to shut off the steam. A cock is also left in the steam cooking vessel, to let off the waste steam. These vessels are sometimes made double and sometimes single, according to the kind of food to be cooked. The double ones answer for roast, the steam being contained between the two dishes, the other for boiled.

A syphon is applied to the end of the main steam-pipe to get the proper degree of pressure, in the same way as already described in the steam warming apparatus.

Patents have been taken out for ship's hearths for cooking by steam, and at the same time rendering salt-water quite fresh; the latter process is the same as that already described for making salt, excepting that here the evaporated water is the valuable commodity, and the salt the refuse. In this operation the steam is condensed as it rises and collected in vessels for the use of the ship, being the same process nearly as distillation. A ship's company need never run short of fresh water, so long as they retain a large kettle and the means of making a fire. The sea-water being put in the kettle and placed upon the fire, as soon as the steam issues out of the spout wet cloths are applied around it, which condensing the vapour as it arises, it assumes its original form of water, but quite freed from its saline qualities. An apparatus on this principle neatly and properly constructed, and combined with the cooking apparatus already described, but rendered more compact and portable by piling the tin dishes upon each other, the lower one being inserted in the lid of the boiler forms what is called the "Patent Ship's Hearth."

For destroying vermin a portable boiler is made similar to Papen's digester, fixed upon a chafing dish of charcoal. The spout should have a small tube attached by an universal joint, so that it can be turned in any direction. When the steam is raised of a high temperature, the spout should be applied to the crevices or other places containing the vermin, which by its action it instantly destroys.

For hatching chickens the eggs are placed in regular order similar to the manner in which the parent bird places them for incubation. The place in which they are deposited is then warmed by steam, conveyed in pipes, backwards and forwards, through the place of deposit, great care being taken to keep the place of an equal temperature of 96° Fahrenheit or 32° Réaumur; for at lower temperatures the living principle appears to become torpid and unable to assimilate the nourishment provided for developing the embryo. The eggs should not be laid upon the bare floor of the oven, but upon a mat, or bed of flax, or other non-conducting material.

THE REGULATORS.

"Regulators" is a very gentle and judicious word! The utmost urbanity of utilitarianism is in it. The gentlemen, however, thus designated in the present instance, have a trick of regulating people, not merely with advice and remonstrance, and other spiritual modes of ruling, but with good bodily applications of twigs and stinging nettles; and if these fail in regulating the patient, a rifle-ball is administered.

The passage is taken from Mr. Audubon's most interesting and valuable work, entitled "Ornithological Biography,"—a production which has but just been put into our hands, but with which we purpose to make both ourselves and our readers as well acquainted as lovers of nature ought to be.

"The population of many parts of America is derived from the refuse of every other country. I hope I shall elsewhere prove to you, kind reader, that even in this we have reason to feel a certain degree of pride, as we often see our worst denizens becoming gradually freed from error, and at length changing to useful and respectable citizens. The most depraved of these emigrants are forced to retreat farther and farther from the society of the virtuous, the restraints imposed by which they find incompatible with their habits and the gratification of their unbridled passions. On the extreme verge of civilization, however, their evil propensities find more free scope, and the dread of punishment for their deeds, or the infliction of that punishment, are the only means that prove effectual in reforming them.

In those remote parts, no sooner is it discovered that an individual has conducted himself in a notoriously vicious manner, or has committed some outrage upon society, than a concave of the honest citizens takes place, for the purpose of investigating the case, with a rigour without which no good result could be expected. These honest citizens, selected from among the most respectable persons in the district, and vested with powers suited to the necessity of preserving order on the frontiers, are named Regulators. The accused person is arrested, his conduct laid open, and if he is found guilty of a first crime, he is warned to leave the country, and go farther from society, within an appointed time. Should the individual prove so callous as to disregard the sentence, and remain in the same neighbourhood, to commit new crimes, then wo be to him; for the Regulators, after proving him guilty a second time, pass and execute a sentence, which, if not enough to make him perish under the infliction, is at least for ever impressed upon his memory. The punishment inflicted is generally a severe castigation, and the destruction by fire of his cabin. Sometimes, in cases of reiterated theft or murder, death is considered necessary; and, in some instances, delinquents of the worst species have been shot, after which their heads have been stuck on poles, to deter others from following their example. I shall give you an account of one of these desperadoes, as I received it from a person who had been instrumental in bringing him to punishment.

The name of Mason is still familiar to many of the navigators of the Lower Ohio and Mississippi. By dint of industry in bad deeds he became a notorious horse-stealer, formed a line of worthless associates from the eastern parts of Virginia (a State greatly celebrated for its fine breed of horses) to New Orleans, and had a settlement on Wolf Island, not far from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi, from which he issued to stop the flat-boats, and ride them of such provisions and other articles as he and his party needed. His depredations became the talk of the whole Western Country; and to pass Wolf Island was not less to be dreaded than to anchor under the walls of Algiers. The horses, the negroes, and the cargoes, his gang carried off and sold. At last, a body of Regulators undertook, at great peril, and for the sake of the country, to bring the villain to punishment.

Mason was as cunning and watchful as he was active and daring. Many of his haunts were successively found out and searched, but the numerous spies in his employ enabled him to escape in time. One day however, as he was riding a beautiful horse in the woods, he was met by one of the Regulators, who immediately recognised him, but passed him as if an utter stranger. Mason, not dreaming of danger, pursued his way leisurely, as if he had met no one. But he was dogged by the Regulator, and in such a manner as proved fatal to him. At dusk, Mason having reached the lowest part of a ravine, no doubt well known to him, hopped (tied together the fore-legs of) his stolen horse, to enable it to feed during the night without chance of straying far, and concealed himself in a hollow log to spend the night. The plan was good, but proved his ruin.

The Regulator, who knew every hill and hollow of the woods, marked the place and the log with the eye of an experienced hunter, and as he remarked that Mason was most efficiently armed, he galloped off to the nearest house, where he knew he should find assistance. This was easily procured, and the party proceeded to the spot. Mason, on being attacked, defended himself with desperate valour; and as it proved impossible to secure him alive, he was brought to the ground with a rifle ball. His head was cut off, and stuck on the end of a broken branch of a tree, by the nearest road to the place where the affray happened. The gang soon dispersed, in consequence of the loss of their leader, and this infliction of merited punishment proved beneficial in deterring others from following a similar predatory life.

The punishment by castigation is performed in the following manner. The individual convicted of an offence is led to some remote part of the woods, under the escort of sometimes forty or fifty Regulators. When arrived at the chosen spot, the criminal is made fast to a tree, and a few of the Regulators remain with him, whilst the rest secure the forest, to assure themselves that no strangers are within reach, after which they form an extensive ring, arranging themselves on their horses, well armed with rifles and pistols, at equal distances and in each other's sight. At a given signal that "all's ready," those about the culprit, having provided themselves with young twigs of hickory, administer the number of lashes prescribed by the sentence, untie the sufferer, and order him to leave the country immediately.

One of these castigations which took place more within my immediate knowledge, was performed on a fellow who was neither a thief nor a murderer, but who had misbehaved otherwise sufficiently to bring himself under the sentence with mitigation. He was taken to a place where nettles were known to grow in luxuriance, completely stripped, and so lashed with them, that although not materially hurt, he took it as a hint not to be neglected, left the country, and was never again heard of by any of the party concerned.

Probably at the moment when I am copying these notes respecting the early laws of our frontier people, few or no Regulating Parties exist, the terrible examples that were made having impressed upon the new settlers a salutary dread, which restrains them from the commission of flagrant crimes.

PERSONAL ANECDOTES OF BURNS.

From the fifth volume of Mr. Cunningham's edition, one of the most interesting of the series, containing the poet's correspondence with the original publisher of his songs. It makes us feel no end of our admiration of Burns's disinterested love of his art, and his most gentlemanly patience with the publisher's criticisms.

"Laddie, lie near me," (says he in one of his letters, speaking of a song) must lie near me for some time. I do not know the air; and until I am complete master of a tune, in my own singing (such as it is), I can never compose for it. My way is: I consider the poetic sentiment correspondent to my idea of the musical expression; then choose my theme; begin one stanza—when that is composed, which is generally the most difficult part of the business, I walk out, sit down now and then, look out for objects in nature round me, that are in unison or harmony with the cogitations of my fancy, and workings of my bosom; humming every now and then the air, with the verses I have framed. When I feel my muse beginning to jade, I retire to the solitary fire-side of my study, and there commit my effusions to paper; swinging, at intervals, on the hind legs of my elbow-chair, by way of calling forth my own critical strictures, as my pen goes on. Seriously, this, at home, is almost invariably my way. What cursed egotism!"

It was modest in the poet to say that this was "egotism;" but how truly the reader feels that it was no such thing, and how glad we should have been of more friendly communications of the same sort.

"Dumfries is a small town; a few steps carried Burns to green lanes, daisied brae-sides, and quiet stream banks. Men returning from labour were sure to meet him "all under the light of the moon," sauntering forth as if he had no aim; his hands behind his back, his hat turned up a little behind by the shortness of his neck, and noting all, yet seeming to note nothing. Yet those who got near without being seen, might hear him humming some old Scottish air, and fitting verses to it."

This is a capital portrait in action. The homely touch of the hat turned up behind by the shortness of the neck, lets us at once into the robustness of the poet's frame, and his freedom from coxcombray.

A FAIR DEVIL.

(From Miss Isabel Hill's new novel, the "Brother Tragedians,"—a production uniting in a rare degree the most reflective feeling with a charming womanly vivacity, though injured by an imperfect transpiration of the incidents through an exuberance of dialogue.)

"A Gottingen student went forth at night,
To meet with the forest-haunting sprite;
And 'first I'll preach to it, then I'll fight,'
Quoth this erudite Gottingen student.

His book and his sword were of ponderous size,
For the Gottingen student was brave and wise—
At least in his own remarkable eyes—
A handsome pair—for a student.

"Wisdom and wealth!" to himself he said,
'My mother and father are long since dead,
I want a few books, a new coat, and a bed,
And to dine don't disgrace a student.

"Thrice have I dreamt of our meeting high,
That is, this bountiful fiend and I,
Who am holy enough, all wiles to defy,
That can tempt a temperate student."

He wandered about the whole of the night
'Twas unluckily warm, and calm, and bright,
So the fiend a symptom he saw of the sprite—
Adventurous Gottingen student:

"Till he came to a castle, that frowned from a rock:
Six in the morning was tolled by a clock,
And answered by many a crowing cock—
'Too late even for ghosts!' sighed the student.

"But by him that instant a form there floats,
White as the whitest of new bank-notes,
While guinea-gold rouleaux of curls its coats
Half hid from the awe-stricken student.

"Fancy a face full of wit and lore,
Full of all that philosophers taught of yore,
Save Plato, for little it owed to his store—
'I'm lost!' thought the spell-bound student.

"From the vision's lip flowed a silvery voice,
Chanting, 'If wisdom and wealth's thy choice,
Take me into the bargain, come on and rejoice!
'It rings the right tune,' mused our student.

"'Tho' Landgraves and Counts may woo,' sung she,
'Not my cousin the Baron can rival thee,'—
'What, is not thy cousin a demon?' quoth he;
'The devil a bit, sir student.'

"'I'm the orphan heiress of earthly gold,
My library hundreds of tomes doth hold,
I will yield them all to the gay and bold!
'That's me!' cried the convert student."

TABLE TALK.

The Pet of the Petticoats.—Our Journal is not theatrical, but our heart, for many good old reasons, is so; and for some special reasons, in addition to those general ones, we cannot but express a wish, that as many of our theatre-loving readers as admire a natural actress and a whole heap of attractive entertainments, will go to Drury Lane to-morrow to see the piece above mentioned, with Mrs. Fitzwilliam in it. It is from the tried and hearty pen of Mr. Buckstone, and founded on Gresset's charming mock-heroic poem, recording the gallantries of the Parrot of Nevers, whom the author, by a very natural metamorphosis, has converted from Poll into Paul,—a little human rogue, instead of one with a beak. After the play, there is more of Mr. Barnett's music, and there is Mr. Phillips's singing, and Mr. Fitzwilliam's (who returns for the purpose, after an absence of several years) and there is Monsieur Albert's dancing, and Mr. Ducrow with his horses; in short, all sorts of gratifications for eye, ear, and imagination.

Catching is not keeping.—"Here's to the blessed memory of Redmond O'Hanlon!" cried Titus, draining a bumper. "And as to the story, did you ever hear mention made of one Captain Power? He was another brave boy, and quite the gentleman. Nicely he turned the tables on an ensign of musqueteers, that came out from Cork to seize him. You shall hear how it happened."

"This ensign had received intelligence that Power had taken up his quarters at a small inn, on the road leading from Kilworth, and being anxious to finger the reward offered for his apprehension, set out with a file of men. It was growing dusk when they reached the inn, and there, sure enough, was Power drinking, for they saw him through a window with his bottle before him, lighting his pipe, quite comfortable. 'Ha, ha,' thinks the ensign, 'my boy, I have you safe enough now, but knowing his man, and expecting a devil of a resistance, if he attempted to lay hands on the captain by force, he determined to resort to stratagem; so, entering the house, just as if he were on a recruiting party, he (the ensign) calls loud for whiskey for his men, and a bottle of port for himself, and marches into the room where Power was sitting, who got up to receive him very politely. Now, whether the captain suspected his intentions or not I can't say; at all events, he didn't let the ensign perceive it; but took his wine as pleasantly as we are doing now, with no suspicion of any thing in our heads—and no thoughts of any mischief brewing."

"Exactly," said Jack; "I understand."

"Well, the bottle was drawing to a close, and Power rose up to call for another, when the ensign, thinking it time, starts to his feet, presents a pistol to his head, and commands him to surrender. 'With all the pleasure in life,' replied the captain, 'that is, when you can take me; and knocking up the ensign's arm, so that he could not even pull his trigger, he threw himself upon him, effectually preventing his crying out, by stuffing his coat-pocket into his mouth; he then very coolly proceeded to divest the ensign of his grand uniform, and taking his purse and sword, and military cloak, tied him hand and foot, and telling him he hoped he was satisfied with his reward, walked out of the room, locking the door on the other side unconcernedly after him, and putting the key in his pocket. The men, who were busy with their whiskey toddy, seeing their officer, as they thought, come out and motion them to keep still, never stirred a peg—but suffered Power to get clear away, without so much as a question.—Rookwood.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We wish we could give a distinct answer to every one of our correspondents, and at as much length as each could desire; but as this is impossible, and, for reasons which they themselves would approve if they knew the circumstances, not always the best for any party, we have adopted certain rules for the occasion, which we trust will not be thought incompatible with due consideration for all.

To such correspondents as render a particular attention a matter of evident justice or courtesy, and to all such as request it, an answer will be given, as speedily as the nature of the publication will allow. But it is begged, on the Editor's part, for reasons which will be obvious to the considerate, that as few private answers will be required as possible; and no time is at present specified for the answers, because we do not yet know how long before the date of publication our Journal may be forced to go to press. But we undertake to keep nobody waiting longer than can be helped.

Correspondents, who are noticed only by their initials, or a simple acknowledgment of the receipt of their letters, will conclude that we think it all they require.

Letters intended for insertion or extract, will receive notices to that effect.

And should no notice at all be given, the writers will conclude, either that we think they do not desire any, or that our silence arises from any feeling but want of courtesy, or (which is not at all impossible, and which it will be a good-nature towards us to suppose) that their communications have not come to hand.

We shall now proceed to act upon these rules with regard to letters already received; but the first that presents itself extremely puzzles us, particularly as it was the prototype of a heap of others. It is the one from the "Son of an Old Friend." He will see how we have, at least, treasured up his friendliness. What can we say to letters so very kind, so very flattering, so tempting to one's self-love to communicate, and yet impossible for any reasonable degree of modesty to shew! And yet we have, truly, an honest doubt on that matter with regard to some of them. We remember when we first had the editorship of a journal, we thought it a fine magnanimous thing to suppress every word of approbation on the part of our correspondents; but as we grew older, and less self-satisfied, we discovered that there were two parties concerned in these matters, instead of one, and that there might be a sort of modesty prouder than pride, or if you will, vainer than vanity, in thus treating the good opinion of others. Besides, the general encouragement to good-will is not to be lost sight of. We believe that when the correspondent in these instances has so written his letter as to render it available for purposes of entertainment or instruction to the general reader (for he also is a third, and the most important party, to be considered) the best way is to let the goodwill have its pleasure, and the friendliness be openly shewn and honoured,—always, of course, with due consideration to quantity as well as quality, and to times and seasons. In short, the social spirit, which is our only inspirer on any occasions, must be our warrant and excuse on these, whether we do too much or too little. We shall endeavour strictly to make it our arbiter. But we will give a taste of these puzzling but most delightful letters, that the reader may see how natural it is in us to make use of both of those epithets, and what credit we really deserve for at all withholding them (for we are resolved to make our merit out somehow!) The passage is from the communication above-mentioned. Who the writer is, we know not.

"Dear Sir,

March 3.

Welcome, thrice welcome back, to your own peculiar department of our literature. Much has been done—and much more attempted—since your secession from the editorial throne; but I have a suspicion, that your place still has remained unoccupied in the hearts of your readers; every man has kept sacred a corner at his fire-side for the all-loved Burchell. What agreeable soirées and pleasant jaunts have we not passed and enjoyed in your company in the Indicator; what delightful chit-chat in the Tatler! And we are to have these fine times again, Sir! For one, I thank you; it is bravely determined on your part; may the resolution be as bravely appreciated."

Here follows a passage from a lady's letter (Griselda); and if encouraging letters from male correspondents are sometimes intoxicating, those from females may be allowed fairly to "take one off one's legs:—"

"Dear Quondam Indicator,

"That which I have so long desired is at length accomplished; I mean your return to us in the hebdomadal way, which in by-gone days afforded both pleasure and instruction to many circles. Fifteen years since, when sitting at the tea-table with your paper, I have imagined myself one, living in the "Queen's time, whose taste was directed and conserved by an Addison."

We should be ashamed to repeat words like these, if it were not a greater shame to be ashamed of kindness from any body, much more from the intelligent and amiable. But we must give this lady's letter entire in a succeeding number, since it contains matter of general import.

The reader may judge, however, from these specimens how difficult it is to make one's way through much of this kindly perplexity, and we have had (thank our stars) a great deal of it! It has even now, on the very threshold of our acknowledgments, cut us short, and forced us to delay all our answers but two, to the next number. We will make greater despatch then.

DIVARICATION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT into WORD OF GOD and WORD OF MAN, with numerous Embellishments. By T. WIGMAN, Esq.
This Work, the first edition of which had no sooner appeared than it was out of print, removes all ground of Religious dispute, annihilates all Sects, and establishes "PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY" as the only True Religion.

"This is, indeed, the most extraordinary production that has appeared or will appear even in this enlightened age. Its principles are incontrovertible, and have only to become known to be universally adopted."

A PINCH OF SNUFF.

(Concluded.)

FROM the respect which we shewed in our last to scented snuffs, and from other indications which will doubtless have escaped us in our ignorance of his art, the scientific snuff taker will have concluded that we are no brother of the box. And he will be right. But we hope we only give the greater proof thereby of the toleration that is in us, and our wish not to think ill of a practice merely because it is not our own. We confess we are inclined to a charitable regard, nay, provided it be handsomely and cleanly managed, to a certain respect for snuff-taking, out of divers considerations: first, as already noticed, because it helps to promote good-will: second, because we have known some very worthy snuff-takers: third, out of our regard for the snuff-taking times of Queen Anne, and the wits of France: and last, because in the benevolence, and imaginativeness, and exceeding width of our philosophy (which fine terms we apply to it in order to give a hint to those who might consider it a weakness and superstition),—because we have a certain veneration for all great events and prevailing customs, that have given a character to the history of society in the course of ages. It would be hard to get us to think contemptuously of the mummies of Egypt, of the ceremoniousness of the Chinese, of the betelnut of the Turks and Persians, nay, of the garlick of the South of Europe; and so of the tea-drinking, coffee-drinking, tobacco-smoking, and snuff-taking, which have come to us from the Eastern and American nations. We know not what great providential uses there might be in such customs; or what worse or more frivolous things they prevent, till the time comes for displacing them. "The wind bloweth where it listeth;" and so for ought we know doth the "cloud" of the tobacco-pipe. We are resolved, for our parts, not to laugh with the "scornor," but even to make merry with submission; nay, to undermine (when we feel compelled to do so) with absolute tenderness to the thing dilapidated. Let the unphilosophic lover of tobacco (if there be such a person), to use a phrase of his own, "put that in his pipe, and smoke it."

But there is one thing that puzzles us in the history of the Indian weed and its pulverization; and that is, how lovers, and ladies, ever came to take snuff. In England, perhaps, it was never much done by the latter, till they grew too old to be "particular," or thought themselves too sure of their lovers; but in France, where the animal spirits think less of obstacles in the way of inclination, and where the resolution to please and be pleased is, or was, of a fancy less nice and more accommodating, we are not aware that the ladies in the time of the Voltaires and Du Chatelets ever thought themselves either too old to love, or too young to take snuff. We confess, whether it is from the punctilios of a colder imagination, or the perils incidental to a warmer one, that although we are interested in comprehending the former privilege, we never could do the same with the latter. A bridegroom in one of the periodical essayists, describing his wife's fondness for rouge and carmine, complains that he can never make pure, unsophisticated way to her cheek, but is obliged, like Pyramus in the story, to kiss through a wall,—to salute through a crust of paint and washes:

"Wall, vile wall, which did those lovers sunder."

This is bad enough; and considering perhaps a due healthiness of skin, worse; yet the object of paint is to imitate health and loveliness; the wish to look well is in it. But snuff!—Turtle-doves don't take snuff. A kiss is surely not a thing to be "sneezed at."

Fancy two lovers in the time of Queen Anne, or Louis the Fifteenth, each with snuff-box in hand, who have just come to an explanation, and who in the hurry of their spirits have unthinkingly taken a pinch, just at the instant when the gentleman is going to salute the lips of his mistress. He does so, finds his honest love as frankly returned, and is in the act of bringing out the words, "Charming creature," when a sneeze overtakes him!

"Cha - Cha - Cha - Charming creature!"

What a situation! A sneeze! O Venus, where is such a thing in thy list?

The lady, on her side, is under the like mal-a-propos influence, and is obliged to divide one of the sweetest of all bashful and loving speeches, with the shock of the sneeze respondent:—

"Oh, Richard! Sho - Sho - Sho - Should you think ill of me for this!"

Imagine it.

We have nothing to say against the sneeze abstract. In all nations it seems to have been counted of great significance and worth respectful attention, whether advising us of good or ill. Hence the "God bless you," still heard among us when people sneeze; and the "Felicita" (Good luck to you) of the Italians. A Latin poet, in one of his most charming effusions, though not, we conceive, with the delicacy of a Greek, even makes Cupid sneeze at sight of the happiness of two lovers:

Hoc ex dicit, Amor, sinistram ut ante,
Dextram sternuit approbationem.

Catullus.

Love, at this charming speech and sight,
Sneez'd his sanction from the right.

But he does not make the lovers sneeze. That omen remained for the lovers of the snuff-box; people more social than nice.

We have no recollection of any self-misgiving in this matter on the part of the male sex, during the times we speak of. They are a race, who have ever thought themselves warranted in taking liberties which they do not allow their gentler friends; and we cannot call to mind any passage in the writings of the French or English wits in former days, implying the least distrust of his own right, and propriety, and charmingness in taking snuff, on the part of the gentleman in love. The "beaux," marquises, men of fashion, Sir Harry Wildairs, &c. all talk of, and use, and pique themselves on their snuff boxes, without the slightest suspicion that there is any thing in them to which courtship and elegance can object; and we suppose this is the case still, where the snuff-taker, though young in age, is old in habit. Yet we should doubt, were we in his place. He cannot be certain how many women may have refused his addresses on that single account; nor, if he marries, to what secret sources of objection it may give rise. To be clean is one of the first duties at all times; to be the reverse, or to risque it, in the least avoidable respect, is perilous in the eyes of that passion, which of all others is at once the most lavish and the most nice,—which makes the greatest allowance for all that belongs to it, and the least for whatever is cold or foreign, or implies a coarse security. A very loving nature, however, may have some one unlovely habit, which a wise party on either side may correct, if it have any address. The only passage which we remember meeting with in a book, in which this license assumed by the male sex is touched upon, is in a pleasant comedy translated from the French some years ago, and brought upon the stage in London—the "Green Man." Mr. Jones, we believe, was the translator. He also enacted the part of the lover, and very pleasantly he did it. It was one of his best performances. Luckily for our present purpose, he had a very sweet assistant, in the person of Miss Blanchard, a young actress of that day, who after charming the town with the sprightly delicacy of her style, and with a face better than handsome, prematurely quitted it to their great regret, though, we believe for the best of all reasons. In the course of her lover's addresses, this lady had to find fault with his habit of snuff-taking, and she did it with a face full of such loving and flattering reason, and in a voice also so truly accordant with the words which the author had put into her mouth, that we remember, thinking how natural it was for the gentleman to give up the point as he did, instantly, and to pitch the cause of offence away from him, with the exclamation, "Ma tabatiere, adieu." (Farewell, snuff-box.) Thus the French, who were the greatest sinners in this matter, appear, as they ought, to have been the first reformers of it; and openly to have protested against the union of love and snuff-taking, in either sex.

We merely give this as a hint to certain snuff-takers at a particular time of life. We are loth to interfere with others, till we can find a substitute for the excitement and occupation which the snuff-box affords, fearing that we should steal from some their very powers of reflection; from some their good-temper, or patience, or only consolation; from others their helps to wit and good-fellowship. Whenever Gibbon was going to say a good thing, it was observed that he announced it by a complacent tap on his snuff-box. Life might have been a gloomier thing, even than it was, to Dr. Johnson, if he had not enlivened his views of it, with the occasional stimulus of a pinch. Napoleon, in his flight from Moscow, was observed one day, after pulling a log on to a fire, impatiently seeking for his last chance of a consoling thought, and he found it in the corner of his snuff-box. It was his last pinch; and most imperatively he pinched it! digging it, and fetching it out from its intrenchment. Besides, we have a regard for snuff-shops and their proprietors, and never pass Pontet's, or Killpack's, or Turner's, without wishing well to the companionable people that frequent them, and thinking of the most agreeable periods of English and French wit. You might almost as soon divorce the idea of the Popes, Steeles, and Voltaires, from their wigs and caps, as from their snuff-boxes. Lady Mary Wortley took snuff; Madame Du Bocage also, no doubt; we fear even the charming Countess of Suffolk, and my lady Harvey. Steele in the character of Bickerstaff, speaking of his half-sister, Miss Jenny Distaff, who was a blue-stock and about to be married, thinks it desirable that she should not continue to have a nose "all over snuff" in future. He seems, in consideration of her books, willing to compromise with a reasonable beginning. Ladies are greatly improved in this respect. No blue-stockings now-a-days, we suspect, take snuff, that have any pretensions to youth or beauty. They rather chuse to realize the visions of their books, and vindicate the united claims of mind and person. Sure of their pretensions, they even disclaim any pretence, except that of wearing stockings like other people; to prove which, like proper, unaffected women, they give into the fashion of short petticoats, philosophically risking the chance of drawing inferior eyes from the charms of their talk, to those of their feet and ancles.

In the battle of the Rape of the Lock, Pope makes his heroine Belinda conquer one of her gallant enemies by chucking a pinch of snuff in his face; nor does he tell us that she borrowed it. Are we to conclude that even she, the pattern of youthful beauty, took it out of her own pocket?

But this bold lord with manly strength endued,
She with one finger and a thumb subdued,
Just where the breath of life his nostrils drew,
A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw;
The Gnomes direct, to every atom just,
The pungent grains of titillating dust;

A capital line!

Sudden, with starting tears each eye o'erflows,
And the high dome re-echoes to his nose.

This mode of warfare is now confined to the shop-lifters. No modern poet would think of making his heroine throw snuff at a man.

An Italian wit has written a poem on Tobacco (La Tabaccheide), in which, with the daring animal spirits of his countrymen, he has ventured upon describing a sneeze. We shall be bolder than he, considering the less enthusiastic noses of the north, and venture to give a free version of the passage.

Ma mi sento tutto mordere
E dentro e fuori
Il meato degli odori,
E la piramide
Rinocerontica;
E via più crescere
Quella prurigine,
Che non mai sazia,
Va stuzzicandomi,
Va rimorrendomi,
E inugiolandomi,
E va gridandomi
Fiuta, fiuta, annasa, annasa
Questa poca, ch'è rimasa.—
Chi m'ajuta? su, finiamola,
Che non è già questa elleboro,
Ma divina quintessenza,
Che da Bacco ha dipendenza,
Donatrice d' allegri . . .
D' allegri . . . gri—gri—allegri . . .
(Lo starnuto mel rapia),
Donatrice d' allegria.

There is more of it, but we cannot stand sneezing all night. (We write this towards bed-time).

What a moment! What a doubt!—
All my nose, inside and out,
All my thrilling, tickling, caustic
Pyramid rhinocerostic,
Wants to sneeze, and cannot do it!
Now it yearns me, thrills me, stings me,
Now with rapturous torment wrings me,
Now says "Sneeze, you fool; get through it."
What shall help me—Oh! Good heaven!
Ah—yes, thank 'ye—Thirty-seven—
*Shee—shee—*Oh, tis most del-ishi
*Ishi—ishi—*most del-ishi
(Hang it! I shall sneeze till spring)
Snuff's a most delicious thing.

Sneezing however is not a high snuff-taking evidence. It shews the author to have been raw to the science, and to have written more like a poet than a professor.

As snuff-taking is a practice inclining to reflection, and therefore to a philosophical consideration, of the various events of this life, grave as well as gay, we shall conclude the present article with the only tragical story we ever met with in connexion with a snuff-box. We found it in a very agreeable book—"A Week on the Loire."

"The younger Cathilineau, devoted with hereditary zeal to the worn out cause of the Bourbons, took up arms for Madame la Duchesse de Berri; associated in his successes with M. de Suriau, M. Morriset, and M. de la Soremere, names dear in the annals of fidelity and courage. Orders were given to arrest them at Beaupreau; they took refuge in a Chateau in the neighbourhood. The troops surrounded and searched it, but all in vain; not a single human being was found in it. Certain however that the objects of their search were actually within the precincts of the Chateau, they closed the gates, set their watch and allowed no one to enter, except a peasant whom they employed to show the hiding places. This watch they kept three days, till wearied by the non-appearance of the parties, and the bellowing of the cattle, who were confined without water and on short allowance, they were on the point of quitting the spot; one of the officers, however, thought, previous to doing so, he would go over the Chateau once more—the peasant followed close at his heels: suddenly the officer turned towards him, "Give me a pinch of snuff, friend," said he.

"I have none," replied the man, "I do not take it."

"Then who is there in this Chateau that does!"

"No one that I know of—there is no one in the Chateau, as you see."

"Then whence comes the snuff which I see here?" said the officer, pointing with his foot to some which was scattered on the ground.

The man turned pale, and made no reply; the officer looked round again, examined the earth more closely, stamped with his foot, and at last thought he felt a vibration, as if the ground below were hollow. He scrutinized every inch, and at length saw something like a loose board; he raised it up, and then alas! he beheld Cathilineau, in front of his three companions with his pistols in his hand ready to fire. The officer had not a moment to deliberate,—he fired,—Cathilineau fell dead, and his companions were seized. This story was told us by the keeper of the Muscè, and afterwards confirmed by an officer who was one of the party employed."

We almost regret to have closed a light article with "so heavy a stone" as this. ("To tell him that he shall be annihilated," saith Sir Thomas Brown, "is the heaviest stone that melancholy can throw at a man.") But the snuff-taker, with his magic box in hand, is prepared for all chances. As the Turk takes to his pipe, and the sailor to his roll of tobacco, so he to his pinch; and he is then prepared for whatsoever comes,—for a melancholy face with the melancholy, or a laugh with the gay.

Another pinch, reader, before we part.

THE WEEK.

From the 25th of June to the 3d of July, inclusive.

HONEY-DEW.

"How honey-dews enbalm the fragrant morn."

GARTH.

DURING the latter half of June and the first half of July, the observer of trees is most accustomed to find upon them a sweet and mysterious liquid, the origin of which is still a question among naturalists. The following chapter on this subject is taken from the work which furnished us with our extract the other day respecting the swarming of bees, and the title of which was accidentally omitted. We hasten to repair this involuntary injustice to the best-written and most comprehensive book which exists in the English language on the subject of bees. It is entitled "The Honey-Bee, its Natural History, Philosophy, and Management," and is the production of Dr. Bevan. It was published some years ago by the house of Baldwin and Cradock, and we cordially recommend it to all who love to have thorough information on a pleasant subject.

The term Honey-dew, (says Dr. Bevan,) is applied to those sweet clammy drops that glitter on the foliage of many trees in hot weather. The name of this substance would seem to import that it is a deposition from the atmosphere, and this has been the generally received opinion respecting it, particularly among the ancients; it is an opinion still prevalent among the husbandmen, who suppose it to fall from the heavens. Virgil speaks of "Aëri mellis cœlestia dona;" (the celestial present of honey out of the air), and Pliny expresses his doubts, "sive ille est cœli sudor, sive quædam siderum saliva sive purgantis se aëris succus," (whether it is an exudation from heaven, or the stars, or the atmosphere). The Rev. Gilbert White, in his Naturalist's Calendar, regards honey-dew as the effluvia of flowers, evaporated and drawn up into the atmosphere by the heat of the weather, and falling down again in the night with the dews that entangle them. But if this were the case, the fall would be indiscriminate, and we should not have it confined to particular trees and shrubs, nor would it be found upon green-house and other covered plants. Some naturalists have regarded honey-dew as an exudation or secretion from the surface of those leaves upon which it is found, produced by some atmospheric stroke, which has injured their health. Dr. Darwin stands in this class. Others have viewed it as a kind of vegetable perspiration, which the trees emit for their relief in sultry weather; its appearance being never observed in a cold ungenial summer. Dr. Evans is of this opinion. Mr. Curtis has given it as his opinion that the honey-dew is secreted by the aphid or vine-fretter, an insect which he regards as the general cause of what are called blights. He assures us that he never, in a single instance, observed the honey-dew unattended with aphids.

I believe it will be found that there are at least two sorts of honey-dew; the one a secretion from the surface of the leaf, occasioned by one of the causes just alluded to; the other a deposition from the body of the aphid. Sir J. E. Smith observes, of the sensible perspiration of plants, that "when watery, it can be considered only as a condensation of their insensible evaporation, perhaps from some sudden change in the atmosphere. Groves of poplar or willow exhibit this phenomenon, even in England, in hot calm weather, when drops of clear water trickle from their leaves, like a slight shower of rain. Sometimes this secretion is of a Saccharine nature, as De la Hire observed in orange trees. "It is somewhat glutinous in the tilla or lime tree, rather resinous in poplars, as well as in Cistus Creticus." Ovid has made an elegant use of the resinous exudations of Lombardy poplars, which he supposes to be the tears of Phaeton's sisters, who were transformed into those trees. Such exudations must be considered as effusions of the peculiar secretions; for it has been observed that manna may be scraped from the leaves of Fraxinus ornus, as well as be procured from its stem by incision. They are often, perhaps, a sign of unhealthiness in the plant; at least such appears to be the nature of one kind of honey-dew, found in particular upon the beech, which in consequence of an unfavourable wind, has its leaves often covered with a sweet exudation, similar in flavour to the liquor obtained from its trunk. So likewise the hop, according to Linnæus, is affected with the honey-dew, and its flowers are rendered abortive, in consequence of the attacks of the caterpillar of the Ghost moth (Phalena Humuli) upon its roots. In such case the Saccharine exudation must decidedly be of a morbid nature.

The other kind of honey-dew, which is derived from the aphid, appears to be the favourite food of ants, and is thus spoken of by Messrs. Kirby and Spence, in their late valuable Introduction to Entomology. "The loves of the ants and the aphides have long been celebrated; and that there is a connexion between them, you may at any time, in the proper season, convince yourself; for you will always find the former very busy on those trees and plants on which the latter abound; and, if you examine more closely, you will discover that the object of the ants, in thus attending upon the aphides, is to obtain the saccharine fluid secreted by them, which may well be denominated their milk. This fluid, which is scarcely inferior to honey in sweetness, issues in limpid drops from the abdomen of these insects, not only by the ordinary passage, but also by the setiform tubes placed, one on each side, just above it. Their sucker being inserted in the tender bark, is, without intermission employed in absorbing the sap, which, after it has passed through the system, they keep continually discharging by these organs. When no ants attend them, by a certain jerk of the body, which takes place at regular intervals, they ejaculate it to a distance. The power of ejecting the fluid from their bodies, seems to have been wisely instituted to preserve cleanliness in each individual fly, and indeed for the preservation of the whole family; for, pressing as they do upon one another, they would otherwise soon be glued together and rendered incapable of stirring. "When the ants are at hand, watching the moment at which the aphides emit their fluid, they seize and suck it down immediately; this, however, is the least of their talents; for the ants absolutely possess the art of making the aphides yield it at their pleasure; or in other words, of milking them." The ant ascends the tree, says Linnæus, that it may milk its cows the aphides, not kill them. Huber informs us that the liquor is voluntarily given out by the aphid, when solicited by the ant, the latter tapping the aphid gently, but repeatedly, with its antennæ, and using the same motion as when caressing its own young. He thinks, when the ants are not at hand to receive it, that the aphid retains the liquor for a longer time, and yields it freely and apparently without the least detriment to itself, for even when it has acquired wings it shows no disposition to escape. A single aphid supplies many ants with a plentiful meal. The ants occasionally form an establishment for their aphides, constructing a building in a secure place, at a distance from their own city, to which after fortifying it, they transport those insects, and confine them under a guard, like cows upon a dairy farm, to supply the wants of the metropolis. The aphides are provided with a hollow pointed proboscis, folded under the breasts, when the insects are not feeding, with which instruments they puncture the turgid vessels of the leaf, leaf-stalk, or bark, and suck with great avidity their contents, which are expelled nearly unchanged, so that, however fabulous it may appear, they may literally be said to void a liquid sugar. On looking steadfastly at a group of these insects (aphides Salicis), while feeding on the bark of the willow, their superior size enables us to perceive some of them elevating their bodies and emitting a transparent substance in the form of a small shower.

"Nor scorn ye now, fond elves, the foliage scar
When the light aphid, arm'd with puny spear,
Probe each emulgent vein, till, bright below
Like falling stars, clear drops of nectar glow."

EVANS.

The willow accommodates the bees in a kind of three-fold succession, the farina of the flowers yielding spring food for their young,—the bark giving out propolis for sealing the hives of fresh swarms,—and the leaves shading with honey-dew in the midst of summer scarcity. But to return to the aphides. "These insects may also be seen distinctly with a strong magnifier, on the leaves of the hazel, lime; but invariably on the inferior surface, piercing the vessels, and expelling the honey-dew from their body with considerable force." "These might easily have escaped the observation of the earlier philosophers, being usually concealed within the curl of the leaves that are punctured." The drops that are spurted out, unless intercepted by the surrounding foliage, or some other interposing body, fall upon the ground, and the spots may often be observed, for some time, beneath the trees affected with honey-dew, till washed away by the rain. When the leaves of the kidney-bean are affected by honey-dew, their surface assumes the appearance of having been sprinkled with soot.

Honey dew usually appears upon the leaves, as a viscid, transparent substance, sweet as honey, sometimes in the form of globules, at others resembling a syrup, and is generally most abundant from the middle of June to the middle of July.

It is found chiefly upon the oak, the elm, the maple, the sycamore, the lime, the hazel, and the blackberry; occasionally also on the cherry, currant, and other fruit trees. Sometimes only one species of trees is affected at a time. The oak generally affords the greatest quantity. At the season of its greatest abundance, the happy humming noise of the bees may be heard at a considerable distance from the trees, sometimes nearly equalling in loudness the united hum of swarming. Of the plane there are two sorts; the oriental and the occidental, both highly ornamental trees, and much regarded in hot climates for the cooling shade they afford.

"Jamque ministrantem Platanum potantibus umbran."
Virgil.

(And plane-tree, ministering a shade to drinkers.)

The ancients so much respected the former that they used to refresh its roots with wine instead of water, believing, as Sir William Temple has observed, that this tree loved that liquor, as well as those that used to drink under its shades.

"Crevit et effuso latior umbra mero."

Virgil.

(It drank the wine, and spread a kindlier shade.)

The sycamore has been discarded from the situation it used formerly to hold near the mansions of the convivial, owing to the bees crowding to banquet on its profusion of honey-dew, and occasionally an early fall of its leaves. The lime or linden tree has been regarded as doubly acceptable to the bees, on account of its fragrant blossom, and its honey-dewed leaves appearing both together, amidst the oppressive heats of the dog-days; but it seems doubtful whether the flowers have any attraction but their fragrance, as they are said to have no honey-cup.

It is of great importance to apianians who reside in the vicinity of such trees as are apt to be affected with honey-dew, to keep their bees on the storifying plan, where additional rooms can at all times be provided for them at pleasure, as, during the time of a honey-dew, more honey will be collected in one week than will be afforded by flowers in general. So great is the ardour of the bees on these occasions, and so rapid are their movements, that it is often dangerous to be placed betwixt the hives and the dews.

That species of honey-dew which is secreted from the surface of the leaves, appears to have been first noticed by the Abbe Boisier de Sauvages. He observed it upon the old leaves of the holm-oak; and upon those of the blackberry, but not upon the young leaves of either, and he remarked at the same time that neighbouring trees of a different sort were exempt from it: among these latter he noticed the mulberry tree, "which," says he, "is a very particular circumstance, for the juice (honey-dew) is a deadly poison to silk-worms."

Some years do not afford any honey-dew; it generally occurs pretty extensively once in four or five years.

BIRTH-DAYS.

1st July (19th June, O. S.), 1623, at Clermont, in Auvergne (France), Blaise Pascal, a man remarkable for the greatness of his understanding and the weakness of his temperament, which rendered him, in spite of his wisdom, a victim to hypochondria and superstition. He was an admirable mathematician, reasoner, wit, and a most excellent man; and yet, notwithstanding this union of the most solid and brilliant qualities, a wretched constitution sometimes reduced him to a state which idiots might have pitied. As if his body was not in ill condition enough, he wore an iron girdle with points on it next his skin, and was in the habit of striking it with his elbow, when a thought which he regarded as sinful or vain, came across him. During his latter days, he imagined that he saw a deep abyss by the side of his chair, and that he was in danger of falling into it. How modest it becomes the cleverest men to be, and thankful for a healthier state of blood, when they see one of the greatest of minds thus miserably treated by the case it lived in! Pascal languished several years in a state of occasional nervous imbecility, and died at Paris, aged thirty-nine. He made himself hateful to the Jesuits by his admirable exposition of the casuistry and daring want of principle of that extraordinary body; but good men of all parties honoured and loved him.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XX.—ADVENTURE OF EUSTACHIO CHERUBINI.

This account, which was first published, it we remember, by Mrs. Graham, in her "Six Months Residence near Rome," has been repeated by Mr. M'Farlane in the "History of Banditti;" but we are not aware that it has hitherto appeared in any publication which gives it so cheap an introduction to thousands, as one like our own. The undoubted authenticity of the terrors so naturally painted by the poor apothecary, produces the last degree of interest, by uniting certainty with surprise, and a domestic familiarity with the remoteness of wild stories. The narrative is given in a letter from the person principally concerned.

Castel Madama, August 30, 1819.

I send you the detailed account you requested of the misfortune which befel me on the 17th current. Early on the morning of that day, the factor (baillif or farm-agent) of the Cavaliere Settimio Bischi, named Bartolomeo Marasca, a person well known to me, came to my house with a letter from his master, desiring me to come to Tivoli, my assistance, as a surgeon, being necessary, both to Signor Gregorio Celestini, and to the nun sister, Chiara Eletta Morelli. On this account I hurried over my visits to my patients at Castel Madama, and set off on horseback accompanied by the factor, who was armed with a gun, towards Tivoli. I passed through all the parish of San Gregorio and that of Tivoli, as far as the second arch of the antique aqueducts which cross the road two miles from that town, to a spot commonly called the narrows of Tivoli, without accident. And here I must observe, that it is impossible for the road, from its natural position, to be better adapted for banditti, or more terrible to travellers. After passing the bridge degli arabi, on the way to Tivoli, it is bounded on the left by a steep hill, covered with thick underwood, which reaches to the very edge of the road; the other side is a continued precipice of great height, and quite perpendicular to the plain, through which the Anio runs below. The breadth of this road is very little more than sufficient for a carriage, so that it is not possible to perceive the danger, which may easily be concealed in the thicket above, nor to fly from it on either side when it bursts out upon one, and therefore one must inevitably become the victim of lawless violence.

I had scarcely passed the second arch of the antique aqueducts, when two armed men rushed from the thicket, near a little lane to the left, and stopped the way; and pointing their guns at the factor, who was riding a little before, ordered him to dismount. Meantime two others came out of the wood behind me, so as to have us between them and the former. We had both dismounted on the first intimation. The two men behind me ordered me to turn back instantly, and to walk before them not by the road to Castel Madama, but that to San Gregorio.

The first question they asked me was, whether I was the Prince of Castel Madama, meaning, I fancy, the Vice-Prince, who had passed a little before. To this I answered, that I was not the Prince, but a poor surgeon of Castel Madama; and to convince them I spoke truth, I showed them my case of lancets, and my bag of surgical instruments; but it was of no use. During our walk towards San Gregorio, I perceived that the number of brigands increased to thirteen. One took my watch, another my case of lancets. At the beginning of our march we met at short distances, four youths belonging to San Gregorio, and one elderly man, all of whom were obliged to share my fate; shortly after, we met another man, and an old woman, whose earrings were taken, and they were then permitted to continue their journey.

In the meadow by the last aqueduct, the horses which I and Bartolomeo had ridden were turned loose, and after passing the ravine, called dell'Ascensore we began to pass the steepest part of the mountain with such speed that, together with the alarm I felt made me pass so violently that I trembled every moment lest I should burst a blood-vessel. At length, however, we reached the top of the hill, where we were allowed to rest, and we sat down on the grass. The factor Marasca then talked a good deal to the brigands, showed himself well acquainted with their numbers, and said other things, which my wretched state of mind prevented me from attending to very distinctly; but seeing him apparently so intimate with the robbers, a suspicion crossed my mind that I was betrayed by him.

The chief brigand then turned to me, and throwing down my lancet case by me, said that he had reflected upon my condition, and that he would think about my ransom. Then I with tears explained to him my poverty, and my narrow means, and told him how, to gain a little money, I was on my road to Tivoli to attend a sick stranger. Then he ordered me to write to that stranger, and desire him to send two thousand dollars, or I should be a dead man, and to warn him against sending out an armed force. He brought me pen, ink, and paper; and I was obliged to write what he bade me, with all the earnestness that thirteen assassins, and the fear of death could inspire me. While I was writing he sent two of his men to take a man who was ploughing a little lower down; he belonged to San Gregorio, but one of the messengers having seen one of Castel Madama in the flat below, he went down for him, and they were both brought up to us. As soon as they were come, I begged the man of Castel Madama to carry my letter to Tivoli for Signor Celestini; and, in order to enforce it, I sent my case of surgical instruments, with which he was well acquainted as a token. This countryman, who was as civil, as he was wary, prudent, and fit for the business, accepted the commission which I gave him, and after having afforded me some encouragement without however offending the brigands, he gave me some bread which he had with him, and set off for Tivoli, the chief desiring him to take one of the horses we had left below, that he might make more speed. The ploughman from San Gregorio was sent with him, but not quite to Tivoli, and only to await at a given spot the return of the peasant of Castel Madama.

We were remaining in the same state in expectation of the return of the messenger, when, in about three hours time we saw, in the distance, a man on horseback, coming straight to us, which we believed to be the man returning. A little after, however, several people were seen together, which the chief took to be the armed force of Tivoli. He abused one of his companions who had broken his spy glass the day before, because he could not obtain a more satisfactory view of them. At length having made the best observations he could, he concluded that there was really an armed force advancing, and gave orders to his men to retire to the highest and most woody part of the mountain, obliging me and the other prisoner to keep pace with them. After a long and painful march finding himself in a safe place, he halted, and there awaited the return of the messenger; but, as he still delayed, the chief came to me and said perhaps it might happen to me, as it did to a certain inhabitant of Viterbi, who had been taken by this very party that entered his house in disguise, and carried him off to the woods, and because his ransom was long in coming, they killed him, and when the money came, the messenger found him dead. I was alarmed beyond measure at this story, and regarded it as a fore-runner of my own speedy death.

However, I entreated them with tears to have a little patience, and the messenger would surely return with the money. Meantime, to satisfy the chief as well as his companions, I told them I might have written another letter to Castel Madama, with orders to sell whatever I possessed, and to send up the money immediately. Thank God, this pleased them, and instantly they caused me to write another letter to Castel Madama, and one of the prisoners from San Gregorio was sent with it. After he was gone, I saw the factor Marasca walking carelessly about among the brigands, looking at their arms and making angry gestures, but he did not speak. Shortly after he came and sat down by me; it was then that the chief, having a large stick in his hand, came up to him, and without saying a single word, gave him a blow on the back of the head just where it joins the neck. It did not kill him; so he rose and cried, "I have a wife and children; for God's sake spare my life," and thus saying, he defended himself as well as he could with his hands. Other brigands closed round him; a struggle ensued, and they rolled together down a steep precipice. I closed my eyes, my head dropped on my breast, I heard a cry or two, but I seemed to have lost all sensation. In a very short time, the brigands returned, and I saw the chief thrust his dagger still stained with blood, into his sheath; then turning to me he announced the death of the factor in these very words: "Do not fear: we have killed the factor because he was a sbirro; such as you are not sbirri; then he was of no use among us. He looked at our arms, and seemed disposed to murmur; and if the force had come up, he might have been dangerous." And thus they got rid of Marasca. The chief seeing that the money did not come from Tivoli, and being afraid least troops should be sent, seemed uncertain what to do, and said to his companions, "How shall we dispose of our prisoners; we must either kill them or send them home;" but they could not decide on either, and he came and sat down by me. I, remembering that I had a little money about me which might amount altogether to thirty pauls (three crowns)—gave them frankly to him to gain his goodwill. He took it in good part, and said he would keep it to pay the spy.

After this it came on to rain heavily; it was already twenty-one o'clock (about four in the afternoon, English time) and I was wet to the skin. Before the rain was quite over we heard some voices from the top of the hill above us on the left hand. Then a strict silence was kept, that we might discover if they were the voices of the messengers from Tivoli, or some party of the troops of whom they seemed much afraid. I endeavoured to convince them that it was probably the messenger. They then called out "Come down;" but no one came; nor did we ever find out who it was, so we remained where we were.

After another short interval we heard another voice also from above, on the left; and then we said, surely this must be the messenger. But the brigands would not trust to it, and forced us to go on to a place a good deal higher, and even with that whence the voice proceeded. When we reached it they all presented their muskets, keeping the prisoners behind them, and thus prepared to stand on the defensive they cried out, "Come forward!" In a few moments the men appeared among the trees, one of them the peasant of Castel Madama, who had been sent in the morning to Signor Celestini at Tivoli; the other, the ploughman of San Gregorio his companion.

As they were recognized they were ordered to lie down with their faces to the ground, and asked if they came alone. But the man of Castel Madama answered—"It would be a fine thing, indeed, if I, who am almost dead with fatigue after climbing these mountains, with the weight of five hundred scudi about me, should be obliged to prostrate myself with my face to the earth! Here's your money. It was all that could be got together in the town! Then the chief took the money, and ordered us to change our station. Having arrived at a convenient place, we stopped, and he asked if there were any letters; being answered that there were two, he gave them me to read; and learning from them that the sum sent was five hundred crowns, he counted them, and finding them exact, said all was well, praised the punctuality of the peasant, and gave him some silver as a reward for his trouble: his companion also received a small present.

The robbers, who no longer cared to keep the prisoners belonging to San Gregorio, from whom they could not hope to get anything, released them all from this spot. I, therefore, and the peasant of Castel Madama, remained the only prisoners; and we began to march across the mountains, perhaps only for the sake of changing place. I asked why they did not set me at liberty as well as the others, as they had already received so considerable a sum on my account. The chief said that he meant to await the return of the messenger sent to Castel Madama. I continued to press him to let me go before night, which was now drawing on apace, saying, that perhaps it had not been possible to procure any more money at Castel Madama, and that if I remained out all night on the hill in the cold air, it would have been better to have killed me at once. Then the chief stopped me and bade me take good care how I said such things, for that to them killing a man was a matter of perfect indifference. The same thing was also said to me by another outlaw who gave me his arm during our rocky journey. At length we reached the top of the mountain where there were some pools of water, formed by the rain that had fallen a little before; and then they gave me some very hard and black bread that I might eat, and drink some of that water. I drank three times, but I found it impossible to eat the bread.

The journey continued over the tops of those mountains which succeed one another, till we arrived at a place known by the name of S. Sierla, about midnight. There we saw an ass feeding, and heard some one call to us, to ask if we had seen the ass. The chief in a feigned voice, answered, Yes; and then made the man from Castel Madama desire him to come down from the ass. It appeared that the man was afraid to come down; for which reason the chief said that if he were near enough, he would have stuck his knife into him. Piqued that the shepherd was afraid of them, he said, "Did one ever hear of a shepherd being afraid of the brigands?" When the man at length came down, they reproached him with his fear; but he, taking courage, said he was not afraid, and invited them to his hut. The ass was then taken and a great coat put upon his back, with a shepherd's coat of sheepskin, upon which I was mounted, and we went on to the hut, where there was a threshing-floor. This was the only time I saw them drink anything but water. The chief told me they were always afraid when fresh wine came, lest it should be drugged; and that they always made whoever brought it, drink a good deal of it; and if in two hours no bad symptom appeared, they used the wine.

After this we went to the sheep-fold, which we reached about the fifth hour; and where we found a quantity of boiled meat which the brigands tied up in various handkerchiefs, and a great coat, together with some cheeses. Before we left the fold, the chief, reflecting that the messenger was not come back from Castel Madama, began to think he might have made his escape entirely, because he was one of the prisoners from San Gregorio, and determined to make me write another letter, and accordingly brought me all that was requisite for writing; and ordered me to tell my friends at Castel Madama that if they did not send eight hundred crowns the following day, they would put me to death; or carry me to the woods of Fajola, if there was a farthing less than the abovenamed sum. I consequently wrote a second letter, and gave it to the countryman to carry, telling him also by word of mouth, if they found no purchasers at Castel Madama for my effects, to desire that they might be sent to Tivoli and sold for whatever they might fetch. The chief of the brigands also begged to have a few shirts sent. One of the brigands proposed, I don't know why, to cut off one of my ears, and send it with my effects to Castel Madama. It was well for me that the chief did not approve of the civil proposal, so it was not done. He, however, wanted the countryman to set out that moment; but the man, with his usual coolness, said it was not possible to go down that steep mountain during night; on which the chief told him he might remain in the sheep-cote all night and set out at daylight: "But take notice," said he, "if you do not return at the twentieth hour to-morrow to the sheep-cote, you may go about your business, but we shall throw Cherubini into some pit." The peasant tried to persuade them that perhaps it might not be possible to collect so much money in a small town, at so short a notice, and begged to have a little more time; but the chief said that they had no time to waste, and that if he did not return next day by the twentieth hour, they would kill Cherubini."

After they had given their orders they left the countryman at the sheep-fold, to wait for daylight before he set out for Castel Madama, which was about three miles from it. The brigands then set off, carrying me with them, and obliging a shepherd to carry the great coat, in which they had wrapped up the cold meat and cheese. And now, instead of the low thicket which it was so difficult to walk through, we came to fine, tall timber trees, where the road was comparatively smooth, except where a fallen tree, here and there, lay across it. At this time I was overcome by fear in consequence of the new threats I had heard to kill me next day if the whole sum of eight hundred crowns was not brought by the twentieth hour; for I thought it quite impossible that so much money could be collected at Castel Madama. I therefore recommended myself to God and begged him to have compassion on my wretched state, when one of the brigands, a man of great stature, who figured among them as a kind of second chief, came up to me, and taking me by the arm, he assisted me to walk, and said, "Now, Cherubini, that you cannot tell the man from Castel Madama, I assure you that to-morrow you shall go home free, however small the sum he brings may be. Be of good cheer, therefore, and do not distress yourself! At that moment I felt such comfort from the assurance of the outlaw, that he appeared to me to be an angel from heaven; and, without thinking why I should not, I kissed his hand, and thanked him fervently for his unexpected kindness.

When we again reached the thicket, and found a fit place, we all lay down to sleep, and I had the skins to rest on as before, and the chief wrapped my legs in his own great coat, and he and the second chief lay on each side of me. Two sentinels were placed to keep watch, and to prevent the shepherd with the provisions from making his escape. I know not how long we rested before one of the sentinels came, and gave notice of day-break. "Come again, then, when it is lighter," said the chief, and all was again quiet. I turned my face so as not to see the brigands, and dozed a little, till I was roused by the cry of some wild bird. I am not superstitious; but I had often heard that the shriek of the owl foreboded evil; and in the state of spirits in which I was, every thing had more than its usual effect upon me. I started, and said, "What bird was that?" They answered, "A hawk." "Thank God!" I replied, and lay down again. Among my other sufferings I cannot forget the stings and torments of the gnats, which fastened on my face and throat; but after the death of poor Marasca, I dared not even raise my hand to drive them away, lest it should be taken for a sign of impatience. A little after this we all arose and walked on for about an hour, when we came to a little open space in the midst of the thicket, where the brigands began to eat their cold meat, inviting me to join them; but I only took a little new cheese, without bread. After they had breakfasted they lay down to sleep, the second chief giving me his great coat to wrap myself in, as the ground was damp. While the others slept, one of them began to read in a little book, which I understood to be the romance of the Cavalier Meschino. After about an hour, they all arose, and fled off one by one guard to a higher place, leaving a single sentinel to me and the shepherd. In another hour the youngest of the robbers came to relieve the guard, who then went and joined the others. When I saw this, and perceived that they were engaged in a kind of council of war, I feared that they had taken some resolution about my life, and that the new sentinel was come to put their cruel designs in execution; but he very soon said to me, "Be cheerful, for to night you will be at home;" which gave me some comfort; but as I could not entirely trust them, I had still an internal fear, which, however, I endeavoured to hide. Shortly afterwards we were called to join the rest, our station being now on the mountain, commonly called Monte Picione, not very far from the ancient sanctuary of Mentorella. There we remained the rest of the day only going out of the way once, on the approach of a flock of goats, that we might not be seen; but we soon returned.

Then the second chief, who said he was of Sonnino, and one of the five who went to treat with the President of Frosinone, began to talk of the political nature of their situation. He said that government would never succeed in pulling them down by force; that they are not a fortress to batter down with cannon, but rather birds, which fly round the tops of the sharpest rocks without having any fixed home; that if, by any misfortune, seven perished, they were sure of ten recruits to replace their loss; for criminals, who would be glad to take refuge among them were never wanting; that the number of their present company amounted to a hundred and thirty individuals; and that they had an idea of undertaking some daring exploit, perhaps of threatening Rome itself. He ended by saying that the only way to put an end to their depredations would be to give them a general pardon, without reservation or limitation, that they might all return to their houses without fear of treachery; but otherwise they would not trust to, nor treat with any one; and added, that this was the reason for which they had not concluded anything with the prelate sent to Frosinone to treat with them. As it was, their company was determined to trust nothing but a pardon from the Pope's own lips; and he repeated this same sentiment to me several times during the second day I was obliged to pass with him and his fellows.

One of the brigands begged me to endeavour to obtain from government the freedom of his wife, Marinicia Carcapola di Pistero, now in the prison of St. Michael in Rome. Another said to me, "Have patience, Signor Cherubini; we made a blunder when we took you; we intended to have had the prince, who according to our information, should have passed by at that very time." In fact, he was to have travelled that road, and just before I passed, not the prince, but the person commonly called so, the vice-prince, or agent, Signor Filippo Gazoni had gone by, but fortunately for him they did not know him, because, as I understood, he was walking leisurely, only accompanied by an unarmed boy, who was leading his horse. The banditti bit their fingers with rage when they found that they had let him slip, for they said they would not have released him under three thousand crowns. The brigand who said all this had the collar of the Madonna della Carmine round his neck, and said to me, "Suffer patiently, for the love of God." Then the chief came to me and told me he was not very well, and desired me to prescribe for him, which I did in writing. Another, the same who had taken my watch from me, told me that the watch did not go, and shewed it me. I found that he had broken the glass and the minute hand. He said if I had any money he would sell it me, but I gave it him back saying nothing, but shrugging up my shoulders. Meantime the day was drawing to a close, and the chief, taking out his watch, said it was now twenty o'clock. He called the shepherd to him, and ordered him to return to the sheepfold which we had left during the night, and see if the countryman was come back with the answer to the second letter to Castel Madama. In that case he ordered him to accompany him back to the place we were now in; and if he were not come, he ordered him to wait three hours; and if he did not come then, to return alone. The shepherd obeyed, and after an hour and a half he came back with the countryman and another shepherd, who had been sent with him. They brought with them two sealed packets of money, which they said contained six hundred crowns. They also brought a few shirts of home-spun linen, which the chief had begged of me, and some little matter for me to eat, and a little wine to recruit me. But I could take nothing but a pear and a little wine, the rest was eaten by the robbers. They took the money without counting, and gave the messengers some silver for their pains; after which, they gave me leave to depart. And thus I found myself free from them, after having thanked them for their civility, and for my life, which they had had the goodness to spare.

On the way homewards the two men of Castel Madama informed me, that the prisoner from San Gregorio, who was sent the day before with the first letter to Castel Madama for money, and who had not been seen since, had really been there, and had gone back the same day, at the hour and to the place appointed, with the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven crowns sent from Castel Madama; but the robbers having forgotten to send any one to meet him at the place agreed on, because we were a great way from it, the messenger returned to town with the money, after having waited till night, carrying back the intelligence that the factor had been killed, which alarmed all my townsmen who began to fear for my life. I found that the last six hundred dollars had been furnished half by Castel Madama, and half by Tivoli.

I went on towards Castel Madama, where all the people anxiously expected me. In fact, a mile before I reached the town, I found a number of people, of all ranks, who had come out to meet me, and I arrived at home a little before night, in the midst of such public congratulations and acclamations as were never before heard, which presented a most affecting spectacle. I had hardly arrived, when the arch-priest Giustini ordered the bells to be rung to call the people to the parish church. On the first sound all the people flocked thither with me, to render public and devout thanks to the most merciful God, and to our protector, Saint Michael, the arch-angel, for my deliverance. The priest had done the same when he first heard of my capture, and soon after, when he sent the six hundred crowns. Both times he had assembled his congregation in that very church, to offer up supplications to the Lord to grant me that mercy which he deigned afterwards to shew.

I cannot conclude without saying that the epoch of this my misfortune will be ever remembered by me. I shall always recollect that the Lord God visited me as a father; for, at the moment when his hand seemed to be heavy upon me, he moved the city of Tivoli, and the whole people of Castel Madama, even the very poorest, to subscribe their money, and to sell their goods in so short a time, and with such profusion, for my sake. The same epocha will also always remind me what gratitude I owe to those, particularly the Signors Cartoni and Celestini, both Romans, who, with such openness of heart, exerted themselves in my favour. I now pray God that he will preserve me from all the bad consequences which commonly arise out of similar misfortunes; and I am always

UNSOCIAL READERS OF PERIODICALS.

Dear Quondam Indicator,

That which I have so long desired, is at length accomplished;—I mean your return to us in the hebdomadal way, which in by-gone days afforded both pleasure and instruction to so many circles. But wherefore have you changed the size of your sheet? Fifteen years since, when sitting at the tea-table with your paper, I have imagined myself one, living in the "queen's time," whose taste was directed and conserved by an Addison. The lapse of years has not impaired the character of the Indicator with me, and I have a sensible gratification in the prospect of a renewal of those times. This change in the form is however, some drawback, and is to me twofold. First, inasmuch as the illusion is weakened;—and secondly, which is yet more tantalizing. . . . But the "second count" involves a narrative, which shall be unfolded with all brevity, and to which you are invited most graciously to lend an ear.

Imprimis, I wish you would not place Leigh Hunt at the head of your Journal; I would still call you, "dear Indicator;" but no matter for the name. Now to the narrative. Know then, that I am the wife of a gentleman, remarkable for the regularity of his habits, on which he plumes himself not a little. Having a taste for purchasing most of the periodicals, he stitches together all those, which from their similarity in size, are susceptible of this conjunction. Thus, when I would be lôte-a-lôte with you, "Chambers's Information for the People," presents itself; and what is more, the sheet must always be appended to those miscellanies, ere it be consigned to me. The octavo would not have been liable to this accident, there being no work of that form going on at this time in weekly succession.

This is one of the many annoyances arising out of the love of order; a superstition (when it amounts to such) to which you, as a party concerned, would do well to apply your ingenuity in the exposure of its inconvenience. "The inconvenience of order!" some would exclaim. To such I would not address myself. There is no one to whom I would consign the handling a paradox, with such confidence, as to you. Twenty years long have I borne that the Examiner should be cut and sewed before it was resigned to one, out of four or five, who waited in vain for a sheet. Need I point out to you the comfort of holding a page of a favourite author between the fire and your eyes, with your feet placed on the fender; contrasted with being planted at a large table, remote from such appliances, and sitting bolt upright as though you were examining Magna Charta? I hope you will think of some alleviation to a lone family, living in the country, where to read is almost the only resource, and where any abridgment of this pleasure is a serious annoyance. One thing I do insist on, that you turn not the shafts of your wit against us. We look to you for succour. We hear a vast deal of the "ignorant impatience" of women, and the necessity of restraining it; and if you, too, were to glance that way, it would be the unkindest cut of all. But we know you for a 'Squire of Dames. En passant, an occasional Essay in support of our claims to a small share of understanding, would not be misplaced. Your late friend Hazlitt took some pains to prove, that women were totally incapable of reasoning; and it must be acknowledged that he had reason for the assertion. I never knew any woman, nor man either, save one or two fantastical wits, who could develop the mysteries of his ratiocinations. But de mortuis, &c. I shall look with no small trepidation for the recognition of our grievances; and do engage, in case they are properly noticed, to furnish such remuneration, as may amply reward a man of letters and an elegant poet. Imprimis, in the village of Mopeham, where I reside, it is not that Mopeham where dwells the old lady of oblivious memory; and from whence the "Parson's Daughter" posted home in the carriage lôte-a-lôte with the young Count. This was thought, in our circle, rather a new incident, and a happy hit in the novel department.) But to leave digression: this Mopeham is Our Village; and in its woody haunts are to be found more nightingales than, perchance, you may have ever heard or seen congregate; for you see them in their flight from one tree to another throughout the day "when every goose is cackling," yet lose they none of their fame as prima donnas. Now do I intend noting every minim, crotchet, quaver, &c. &c. in the combined scale of harmony, to present you with; and yet this is only a small part of what I project, if you will undertake to prove that order does not always produce harmony; and to disabuse, of that other heresy, one, on whom time has no other effect than to strengthen and confirm him in preconceived errors.

It was with much concern I read in your commencement to your present work, that you should cease to speak of yourself in future. There has been a long hiatus in our acquaintance, and I had hoped to have collected some gleanings from your hearth again,—that hearth which I used to picture as the union of what was most pleasing and elegant. You once wrote, long ago, that in the contemplation of a Poet's honey-moon, there was more of speculation than in the moons of common mortals; and the sequel, in that instance, strengthened your hypothesis. But hearths change; blooming children become men and women, having the same wants as ourselves, which we are not so ready to accord to them; they murmur, and often with reason. There is much difficulty in abstracting from the mind the impression that they are still but children. But I must conclude; for this subject will lead me beyond my limits; so I finish with expressing a hope that these changes may have fallen lightly on one, who has been so much the favourite of nature, that fortune, in her envy of his endowments, has been oft unwilling to recognise the justice of his claims.

Pardon must be asked for the loose half sheet, with which this letter commences. It had been written on the other side, before the mistake was discovered.

Vale!

GRISelda.

Mopeham, May-day, (Incongruous!) 1834.

Again we must ask, what are we to do with letters so intoxicating as these, and from fair correspondents? For before we have done reading them, our heads are not in a condition to judge. If we publish them entire, we seem shameless; and if garbled, ungrateful; and in the latter case, our friends may think also that we baulk that openness of intercourse, and those impulses of good-will and sociality, which it is one of the first objects of this Journal to encourage. We feel however what must be our course in future:—we must endeavour to reconcile with that encouragement a most unwilling portion of sobriety and self-sacrifice. We can assure the writers of such letters that the passages we omit will be those that are the most precious to us, and that our virtue will be indeed so unwilling as to have no merit whatsoever. And yet this, instead of depriving us of any other rewards, such as the nightingale's songs, &c. so generously held forth by our fair friend, will, we conceive, doubly secure them for us; for it is not merit alone that elicits recompence from the charitable:—grievous privations are held to be some title. We think we even deserve a little balm before-hand, for the very painful, though we are sure unintentional, wound inflicted on us by our correspondent in her objection to the use of the name at the head of our paper,—a most involuntary and long-contested concession on our part to the representations of persons conversant with periodical literature and with the state of public feeling, and for which we have since been consoled by the opinion of a friend of ours, conversant both with literature and business, that he "looked upon it as the cause of half of the Journal's success." We mention this in self-defence. The name is now identified with the Journal, and cannot be laid aside: and to say the truth, we had one consolation in it before; for it looked like a part of the frankness and open dealing which our paper recommends, and was, perhaps (if we may say so without arrogance), not without its use in furthering the pretensions of cheap literature. With regard to the size, it was thought best to square that to the similitude of our popular friend Chambers. The Indicator we never thought of. But what have we been saying all this while? Of what ungrateful forgetfulness have we not been guilty? For now we think of it, our fair friend no sooner inflicted the wound, than she did apply the balm to it, when she followed it up with a reason for the objection. Is there no way by which we can still retain this right of being so pleasantly addressed? Might not some nom-de-guerre (de pair, rather,) some appellation implying a friend in masquerade, be found out by us, or for us, so that we might be addressed by it notwithstanding appearances, and in spite of that brazen-faced necessity at the head of our Journal? Will the lady herself christen us? We cannot promise to be a very "good little boy;" but we will promise to be a very great big godson, a great deal older perhaps than herself.

As to the case which she has done us the honour to submit to our judgment, and which (from the allegorical name she has given her village) we conclude she has enveloped in a due quantity of generous inapplicability as to sex or relationship, it surely requires no other discussion, after the very argumentative conclusions implied by the way in which she has stated it. Extremes meet this as in all other cases. Order is not order if it pervert the very end of order, and produce disordered feelings and a sense of superogation and tyranny. Primness and petty exactions have none of the ease and liberality of true order, which should go gracefully and equably like a dance, and not stiffly and slavishly like soldiers before a martinet. One of the very advantages of a periodical consisting of several sheets, is the power it affords a generous reader of enabling the persons around him to do as he does, and partake at the same moment of the same pleasure. For this, among other reasons, were Examiners, and Atlases, and Spectators, and True Sons ordained. There is an old story which will settle the spirit of this matter. A professed lover of order called out one day, in a crowd, so vociferously and provokingly for "silence," that some one was at length moved to exclaim, "Knock down that fellow crying silence!" We might have asked whether the gentleman in the present instance could not be coaxed out of his humour; for there is no counter-argument like your coaxing,—no lips so eloquent as those which "Convince us at once with a kiss."

But "twenty years" is a long time for a crick in the fancy.

PETRARCH'S ACCOUNT OF A DREADFUL STORM AT NAPLES.

THE late storm at Brighton, with its four-inch globes of hail-stones, and its windows battered as with musketry, has reminded us, not in those particulars, but in its having taken place by the sea-side, of a more awful tempest which had the above great poet for one of its spectators, and of which he has left an account to posterity. We take it from the "Life of Joanna, Queen of Naples," which we mentioned the other day as a work deserving greater publicity than it appears to have obtained. The tempest, the poet, the black night-time, the day as black, the earthquake, the cavaliers "coming as if to assist at the obsequies of their country," the white ghastly sea, and the fair queen with her ladies issuing forth barefoot and with dishevelled locks, to beg the mercy of heaven, make up a picture truly southern and appalling. It is only in climates of general luxury and occasional violence that such combinations of beauty and horror take place.

"Petrarch (says our author) had frequent conferences with Joanna during his stay at Naples at this period. These turned chiefly on literary subjects and inspired her with a high esteem for his abilities and worth. Loving letters, she wished to attach him to her court, and under happier circumstances might perhaps have succeeded, but being, as she afterwards herself expressed it, 'a queen in name only, without power to do good to any one,' she was obliged to content herself with appointing him, in imitation of Robert, her domestic chaplain and almoner, an office possessed only by people of distinction, and to which some valuable privileges are attached. It is a remarkable circumstance that the letters patent for this employment bear date on the day of the most remarkable tempest by which Naples had ever been visited. This tempest was caused by a violent Sirocco* and was felt all round Italy, and on all the shores of the Mediterranean, but more particularly at Naples. Petrarch's description of its effects in that capital is peculiarly lively and interesting.

"This scourge of God, says he, had been predicted a few days before, by the bishop of a neighbouring island skilled in astrology. But as an astrologer never foretells the exact truth, he had also predicted that Naples would be destroyed by an earthquake, on the 25th of November. This prediction had gained so much credit, that the greater part of the populace, resigning every other thought, and expecting only immediate death, craved the mercy of heaven for their sins. Others, however, derided the prophecy and the vain science of the astrologer. Between hope and fear, but I confess rather more inclined to fear, for accustomed to inhabit colder climates I regarded a storm of thunder and lightning in winter as a phenomenon, and looked on that I now witnessed as a menace from heaven,—on the evening of the 24th I retired at an early hour to the convent of St. Lawrence, where I lodged, having previously seen the principal part of the ladies of the metropolis, more mindful of the presaged danger than of decorum, running to and fro with bare feet and dishevelled tresses, with their children in their arms, visiting the churches and bathing the altars with their tears, exclaiming, "Mercy, Lord! Have pity on us!"

"The evening was, however, more serene than ordinary: my servants after supper retired to rest: but I thought it best to observe how the moon looked, and opening the window I remained at it till it set about midnight behind San Martino, looking dim and surrounded with clouds. Barring the window, I laid myself on the bed, and after lying awake a considerable time, I was falling into a sound sleep when I was roused by the rumbling of an earthquake, which not only burst open the windows and extinguished the light which I was accustomed to keep in my chamber, but shook the walls to the foundations. The calm of sleep being thus changed into fear of instant death, I went out into the cloisters where we groped about for each other in the dark, and exhorted one another to patience and fortitude. The brothers and the prior, David, (a most holy man) who had risen to chaunt matins, terrified at the tremendous storm came with devout prayers and tears, and with crosses and relics and a number of lighted torches to the place where I was. This gave me a little courage, and I went with them into the church where we all threw ourselves on the ground and implored the mercy of heaven, expecting from time to time that the church would fall upon us. The terrors of that infernal night would take too long to narrate, and though the truth would much exceed anything I could say, yet my words would appear incredible.

"What bursts of water!—What wind!—What flashings of lightning!—What awful re-echoing of the heavens!—What fearful trembling of the earth!—What horrible roaring of the sea!—and what groans of the assembled populace! It seemed as if by magic art the duration of that night had been doubled; but at last the morning arrived, which we knew rather by conjecture than by any light it afforded. The priests then robed themselves to celebrate mass, whilst we not daring to raise our eyes to heaven, prostrate on the earth continued to sigh, and pray, and weep. Day at length appeared, but scarcely less obscure than night; the wakings in the higher part of the town beginning to cease, we could hear frightful cries from the Strand. We also heard a number of horses prancing through the streets, we knew not what for. Exchanging despair for hardness I mounted on horseback, determined to see what was going on, or to die. Great God! when was such a sight ever seen! The most aged mariners had never heard of or seen anything like it. In the middle of the bay an immense number of wretches were seen tossed about by the waves, who whilst they endeavoured to gain the shore were driven by their fury against the rocks, and appeared like so many eggs broken in pieces. All this space was full of drowned or drowning persons, and the shore was strewn with corpses and shattered limbs; some with arms and legs broken; some with their brains and some with their entrails protruding. Nor were the shrieks of the men and women who inhabited the falling houses close to the sea, less terrific than the roaring of the sea itself. Where the day before we had gone to and fro on a dusty path, was now a sea more dangerous than the straits of Messina. The ocean seemed no longer to observe the bounds which God has prescribed it; respecting neither the works of man nor those of nature, that immense causeway, which, as Virgil says, "projects to break the rolling waves," was covered by the waves, as well as the whole of the lower town. You could not pass in the streets without the risk of being drowned. More than a thousand Neapolitan cavaliers came from all sides to the spot where we were, as if to assist at the obsequies of their country. This brilliant troop re-assured me a little. "If I perish," thought I, "it will at least be in good company." But at the instant in which I was making this reflexion, a terrible cry was set up around, that the ground on which we stood was beginning to be submerged: the water had sapped the foundation, and we retired in haste to the upper part of the town. Certainly it was beyond measure awful to mortal eyes, to behold the raging of the heavens and the fury of the sea. A thousand mountains of water seemed to come from Iachia to Naples, neither black, nor azure, as in common tempests, but of a dazzling whiteness. The young queen now came out of her palace bare-footed, and with her hair flowing loose about her, at the head of an immense troop of ladies in the same penitential disarray, and visited in turn all the churches of the Virgin Mother of God.

"But it was not the virgin who was supposed at last to have calmed the fury of the elements. In the evening the storm ceased, when St. Nicholas, St. George, and St. Mark, shewed a fisherman at Venice a boat filled with demons endeavouring to enter the port, who, at the command of the saints disappeared, and a calm immediately ensued, as by their evil agency a storm had been raised. The malice of these imps of Satan effected no irreparable injury on shore, but it was far otherwise at sea. Not a vessel in the port of Naples escaped, except one galley of mulefactors, destined to be sent on the first expedition against Sicily, the forlorn hope of Naples."

We may fairly conclude that Petrarch and his brilliant band of cavaliers resorted to the palace of Joanna on the occasion of the storm: she was not likely otherwise to have thought of his letters patent, on the eve of the this agitating day, and she was still less likely to sign them previous to her devout pilgrimage. Passing from one extreme to another, it is not unlikely that the halls of Castelnuovo, were the scene of more real gaiety that evening, than they had been since the death of good Robert.

The damage sustained by the merchants at Naples from this storm, was estimated at forty thousand ounces of gold: the Venetian and Genoese trade was also so much injured by it, that silk and spices, and the products of the trade of the Levant, rose from fifty to a hundred per cent.

BIANCA CAPELLO.

The work upon which this abstract is founded, is the Life by Siebenkees, translated by Ludger. A work had appeared by Muller, written in a style of florid romance,—an unmeasured laud—to which Mr. I. obviously wrote in opposition. Thus he has fallen into the opposite extreme, and would make Bianca the scapegoat for all the censures due to the intrigues and follies with which she was any way connected. It will be seen that we have taken a very different view of the subject; which we leave to the facts to justify.

The precise light in which we should view the reputation of Bianca Capello is, at the present time, rather difficult to determine. While, on the other side, she is assailed with the bitterest reproaches by her opponents, her friends obscure their own defence of her by adulatory exaggeration. Much, however, that is urged against her, is referable rather to the perverted morals of the time, than to any personal deficiency of rectitude. She was one against many; and yet even her greatest enemies cannot charge her with deeds so bad as many a well-famed princess has committed; on the other hand, her artfulness, with one exception alone, is always of a very equivocal nature, and very like a charming kindness and candour. If she made use of art, at least she had taste, wisdom, and confidence enough in goodness, to base her cunning upon kindness and endearment. It is an easy but a very dangerous and uncertain plan, to test human action by motives, rather than consequences; particularly when the heart that felt those motives, and the face that betrayed them, has long ceased to be, and we have no eye-witness to interpret that countenance but such as could neither see, nor speak disinterestedly. Her most credible defamer, her brother-in-law, Cardinal de' Medici, is at least stained with prejudice, inconsistency, and ingratitude.

Bianca Capello descended from the Venetian house of the Capelli, and spent her early days in strict confinement to her father's palace, as was then customary with the ladies of Venice. The nobles of Italy in those days, sometimes augmented their substance by thrifty commerce. The Salviati, a celebrated Florentine family, so trading, held a counting-house in Venice, in the neighbourhood of the Capelli palace. In this counting-house was one Buonaventuri, a man addicted to intrigue; the beauty of the young Bianca caught his eye, and he pursued her. At church he spoke to her, representing himself as a partner in the house he served, and obtained her affection. It is rather to be imagined that that affection, as astonishment is said to be, was the effect of novelty upon ignorance; for Buonaventuri was a heartless man, not calculated to inspire a genuine attachment. May not this, by the way, have paved a road for Francesco's advances afterwards? Their meetings continued till Bianca found herself unable to conceal them much longer. Taking some of her jewels with her, she absconded from Venice, with Buonaventuri, to whom she was married. Of course he had already been obliged to apprise her of the deception he had originally practiced upon her. They sought refuge in Florence.

For some time Bianca lived as secretly as she could, dreading the displeasure of her family, and the Venetian government. Francesco de' Medici was then Regent; his father, the Grand Duke, having withdrawn himself, in his old age, from all participation in public affairs. By some means, for it is by no means certain how, he obtained a sight of Bianca; her beauty quite ensnared him; and her art, (and most probably that consisted in her real kindness and engaging disposition,) made a constant lover of one naturally weak, impetuous, and fickle. It has been asserted that he saw her one day, as he was passing the house in which she lived, some casual disturbance in the streets having drawn her to the window. The story is, however, very apocryphal. It appears that Bianca for some time resisted Francesco's advances. Her husband, as we have before said, was a heartless fellow, and had cruelly deceived her at the first. It is little likely that she could really feel much lasting affection for him; he was coarse and cowardly. Francesco, on the contrary, has given many testimonies of having a sincere and most durable attachment to Bianca; partly attributable, no doubt, to her own attractiveness. This love he made known to her. It is to be remembered that Bianca was young, undefended from the threatened vengeance of her family and the Venetian State, poor, and in restraint. The connexion offered her with Francesco, would be a defence against her dangers, it held out to her acceptance, power, enjoyment, and freedom; the manners of the time, in her country especially, presented little in the way of obstacle to such a connexion; and accordingly Bianca Capello became the mistress of Francis de' Medici.

At first the affair was kept a secret, for about this time, one of those curses of royal life, a political marriage, was in treaty, between Francesco and Joanna, the sister of the Empress Maximilian. The reviving power of the Medici had excited the jealousy of the neighbouring princes, and a marriage of the kind was necessary to preserve the importance of the family. When however the prince was married, and caution was no longer necessary, the concealment was less carefully preserved, and ultimately Bianca was introduced at court. Although the dutchess never appears to have been quite reconciled to her consort's infidelity, she shared with others in yielding to the effects of Bianca's fascination, though both irritable and violent by nature. At last however her passion was too much even for Bianca's art, and meeting her one day on the Lungarno, she was about to desire her attendants to throw her into the river. A gentleman represented to her that this murderous impulse was suggested by the devil, and she being very superstitious, she was struck with repentance.

Buonaventuri, made indolent by the honors accorded him by the prince, was so indiscreet as to boast of the favors of a lady of high family, two of whose paramours had already paid the price of their lives for a similar mistake. He was assassinated by her relations; and the lady herself was the same night slain in her bed. To the last, though little regarded by him, nay, treated always with ingratitude, and roughness, Bianca always shewed a lively consideration for her husband's welfare; and had he listened to her representations, he might have avoided his fate. Repeated insolence and insult, not a single transgression, had drawn upon him the revenge of the insulted parties.

Francesco greatly desired a son. He had said that he would, rather than none, welcome even an illegitimate son. Bianca had only borne a daughter to her husband (who afterwards married a Tuscan nobleman.) The Grand-Dutchess had only had daughters. Bianca artfully feigned herself indisposed, and finally produced a child as her own; which, however, was the child of a poor woman, procured by Bianca's agents. Many suspected the fraud. Francesco was delighted; and even when some years afterwards Bianca confessed the deception, he still persisted in looking upon the child as his own. Bianca's object in this deception is not very clear; nor is it at all defensible. If she desired to provide a male heir to Francesco, why confess the fraud, as long as her husband continued to believe her? Most probably, her object was merely to please him, without proposing any definite end to be gained; she felt herself sure of his regard, the wish not to risk losing it by detection, with which she was continually threatened, enforced by regret at having ever deceived him, made her rather forestall her enemies, and tell him with her own lips the worst he could hear; making the friend, accuser, and culprit all in one, and drowning the deceit in greater ingenuousness. If she were artful, this was always the drift of her art. If she struggled, and conquered it, was always with kindness, and womanly gentleness. She has been accused of some tyrannical and bloody deeds in conducting the fraud,—of making away with her own agents,—but there is not a credible word in the evidence of that kind, and such proceedings were quite inconsistent with the genius of her alleged artfulness. Don Antonio, the child, was legitimated many years afterwards, by Francesco. His legitimation was revoked by Ferdinand on his accession to the throne, but presently restored; and Ferdinand ultimately procured him the grand priorship of the order of Malta.

In the year 1578 the Grand-Dutchess died. She had not long been dead, when Francesco determined to fulfil a vow he had made during his life-time, to wed Bianca. His decision was much opposed by his confessor, and many of his friends; but he more regarded Bianca's smiles and tears, than the etiquette of courts of priesthood. His determination was strengthened by the tender and solicitous care with which she nursed him through a fit of illness. On the morning of the fifth of June, 1579; Bianca entered his apartment, to ask, if he wished to eat; "No," said he, "I feel no appetite." "Well," replied Bianca, "accept at least this egg from me as a present; eat it, it will certainly do you good." Francesco ate the egg, and said to her: "I feel a great deal better and thank you for your present. I have been a debtor to you this long while, and that debt I now, in return for your kindness, discharge. Here, take my hand; you are my wife." They were on the same day secretly married. The marriage was kept very private during the mourning for the late Grand-Duchess. Nobody was surprised at Bianca's having apartments assigned her in the palace, because a report prevailed, that she had been appointed governess of the young princesses.

At the expiration of the proper time it was publicly announced. Cardinal Ferdinando seems to have received intelligence of this marriage some time before it was publicly known. He had, indeed, long suspected this step, from his brother's aversion to a match with another princess, and his reconciliation with Bianca. But he had not been apprised of their actually having contracted a matrimonial connection till towards the middle of the year 1579. The illness of his brother at that time called him to Florence, when he perceived that Bianca never left the Grand-Duke, whom she attended with the most assiduous perseverance. The Cardinal having asked him the cause of this particular attachment, the Grand-Duke confessed that they were secretly married. Ferdinando concealed his resentment, and returned to Rome, as soon as the recovery of his brother would permit his departure, without ever disclosing to any one his opinion on the subject.

Francesco and Ferdinando had never agreed; on the contrary, their quarrels were frequent and bitter. Francesco was an inconsiderate impulsive person; Ferdinando proud and irascible; not unkind, but hard, and little softened by sentiments of affection. It was undoubtedly to Bianca's interest to keep friends with Ferdinando; but it must have required more than common temper to do so, even following her interest, with so headstrong and ungrateful a person as the Cardinal. As soon as Bianca was in power, she sought his friendship. The Cardinal, on his part, did not hold back; and many were the benefits that he derived from her kindness. Her intercession often procured him money from his brother, wherewith to make a figure. Her gentleness and quick kindness made them many times reconciled; nay, almost her last act was reuniting the disaffected brothers. And yet the Cardinal denied her virtues, persecuted her very corpse, and blazoned her failings, after her death. Pride is said to be the meanest of passions. The Cardinal's pride made him ungrateful, cowardly, and mean. He accepted favours from the hand he abused, he strove to injure when his interest was not at stake, and forgot every benefit received, when hostility was his readiest way to arrangement.

After her marriage, Bianca was created a "Daughter of the Republic," by the Venetian senate, a title which put her upon an equality with the princesses of Italy, and crowned as such with a ducal crown; and shortly after crowned Grand-Duchess of Tuscany. Her marriage was immediately followed by a fresh reconciliation between the Grand Duke and his brother, brought about entirely by her address. Still Ferdinando feared lest Bianca should now present Francesco with a legitimate heir; for the surviving son of Joanna, a very weakly boy, was the only barrier between him and the throne, in case of Francesco's decease. A very delicate and important disputed treaty with the court of Mantua, concerning a marriage between Vincenzo, the Duke of Mantua's son, and the princess Eleonora of Tuscany, was among the things to which her address gave a happy conclusion. It was ever her policy to conciliate every one, and gain her ends by persuasion and gentleness. If this were art, a little more such would hardly make politicians less humane, or every body less happy.

Her married life was past in this way, varied only by hopes and doubts of having a son, which her husband ardently desired. Her cleverness in resolving political discords, and uniting angry powers, obtained for her the admiration of Pope Sixtus V., who was about to pay the court of Tuscany a visit, out of compliment to her, when his intentions were frustrated by the death of Francesco (on the 15th August, 1587,) of an intermittent fever, followed in a few hours by her own, of the like disorder. Francesco was aged forty, Bianca forty-five.

Many stories were circulated concerning the manner of her death; some saying that she had attempted to poison the cardinal in a tart; that the cardinal suspecting, she was obliged to eat of it herself, in order to save her fame, and that her husband ate with her. Others said the cardinal himself had poisoned the tart, and as soon as the poison had taken effect, had locked his brother and sister into a bed-room, suffering no one to enter to assist them. These reports are however all groundless, and on their face absurd, and inconsistent with the characters of the parties concerned.

Thus died Bianca Capello, originally a private gentlewoman, then the wife of a man of obscure origin, then the mistress of the regent prince, and eventually his wife, and dutchess, and one of the most influential personages among the petty states of Italy. What were the means she possessed to attain this eminence? Not family importance.—Not wealth.—Not fame, and high estimation.—Was it beauty in the first instance?—Granted; but beauty is transient, and produces no lasting impression of any kind. It was then her good sense, her ready perception of difficulties, and the means to overcome them, supported by an unflinching patience and a happiness of temper, that outlasted every opposing passion in the struggle for power. She conciliated the hostile, subdued the haughty, fixed the fickle, cheered the discontented, and reconciled the quarrels of all around by means of this inexhaustible store of kindness, which was perpetually called upon, and always given out with liberal and urgent bounty.

FRIENDS AND BOYHOOD.

[We anticipate the feelings of tenderness and respect which the reader will experience in seeing the name which is appended to the following (we believe) original verses. No sickness can extinguish the kindly fire of his nature.]

Talk not of years! 'twas yesterday
We chased the hoop together,
And for the plover's speckled egg
We waded through the heather.

The green is gay where gowans grow,
'Tis Saturday—oh! come,
Hark! hear ye not our mother's voice,
The earth—she calls us home.

Have we not found that fortune's chace
For glory or for treasure,
Unlike the rolling circle's race,
Was pastime, without pleasure?

But seize your glass—another time
We'll think of clouded days—
I'll give a toast—fill up, my friend!
Here's "Boys and merry plays!"

JOHN GALT.

TABLE-TALK

Spenser's Stanza.—It is somewhat remarkable that, notwithstanding Dr. Johnson's objections to the Spenserian stanza, and his presumption of its unfitness for popularity, the best poems of the best poets since that dictum was delivered, have been written in that same despised stanza! I need only mention "Childe Harold," "Gertrude of Wyoming," and "The Revolt of Islam." Others might be enumerated, such as Burns's "Cottar's Saturday Night;" Shenstone's exquisite "School-mistress," which will keep his name alive; and Beattie's "Minstrel," which, as long as there are young and romantic minds, will find admirers, for it is beautifully descriptive of the yearnings and struggles of young intellect. Added to these again are Keats's "Eve St. Agnes," written in the very spirit and warmth of Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet;" Wordsworth's noble "Laodamia," and John Clare's "Village Minstrel."

Philosophy in Trifles.—Those persons who cannot find pleasure in trifles are generally wise in their own opinion, and fools in the opinion of the wise: they neglect the opportunity of amusement, without which the rugged road of life would be insupportably tedious. I think the French are the best philosophers, who make the most they can of the pleasures, and the least they can of the pains of life; and are ever strewing flowers among the thorns all mortals are obliged to walk through; whereas, by much reflection, the English contrive to feel and see the thorns double, and never see the flowers at all, but to despise them; expecting their happiness from things more solid and durable, as they imagine: but how seldom do they find them! Lady Luxborough's Letters.

Apparent Idleness not always such. Pardon me for differing with you in opinion, you are not the idle man of the creation. You may be busied to the benefit of society without stirring from your seat, as much as the mischievous man, with seeming idleness, may be busied in the destruction of it. You give innocent pleasure to yourself, and instruction as well as pleasure to others, by the amusements you follow. Your pen, your pencil, your taste, and your sincere unartful conduct in life (which are things that make you appear idle) give such an example as it were to be wished might be more generally followed—few have the capacity, fewer the honesty to spend their time so usefully, as well as unblameably. Lady Luxborough's Letters to Shenstone.

Death from a Frightened Imagination.—We have all heard of the Italian jester who perished with the mere fear of being executed, and of the criminal, who died in the same manner under the belief that he was being bled to death.—The following similar instance of mortal sensibility is believed to be new to the reading public: About thirty years ago, a man, named Whitwam, was employed in a coal-yard at Taunton, who had been, during the greater part of his life, a soldier in the 33rd regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Webster, and was very actively engaged throughout the American war. He had been wounded in almost every part of his body, and eked out the pension which he received from Government by working as above stated. One day, having been out delivering coals at a house in the town, he is supposed, while taking some refreshment, to have held his handkerchief to the fire, for, on returning to the coal-yard, in taking it out of his hat, it suddenly burst into a flame. He looked upon it as an omen, cried out, "I am a dead man;" went home, took to his bed, and in a few days expired.

True National Spirit. Testimony of an enlightened Frenchman to the merits of England and Germany.—The true greatness of a people does not consist in borrowing nothing from others, but in borrowing from all whatever is good, and in perfecting whatever it appropriates. I am as great an enemy as any one to artificial imitations; but it is mere pusillanimity to reject a thing for no other reason than that it has been thought good by others. With the promptitude and justness of the French understanding, and the indestructible unity of our national character, we may assimilate all that is good in other countries without fear of coming to be ourselves. Placed in the centre of Europe, possessing every variety of climate, bordering on all civilized nations, and holding perpetual intercourse with them, France is essentially cosmopolitan; and indeed this is the main source of her great influence. Besides, civilized Europe now forms but one great family. We constantly imitate England in all that concerns outward life, the mechanical arts, and physical refinements; why, then, should we blush to borrow something from kind, honest, pious, learned Germany, in what regards inward life and the nurture of the soul?—Victor Cousin's Report on the State of Public Instruction in Prussia.

Venetian Horsemanship.—Venice being a city built in the sea, with canals for streets, the other Italians joke the inhabitants on their ignorance of horsemanship, as we joke sailors in England. In Mr. Shepherd's Life of Poggio Bracciolini, it is related that Antonio Lusco, a friend of Poggio's, in the course of a journey to Vicenza overtook a Venetian, in whose company he rode to Siena, where they took up their lodgings for the night. The inn was crowded with travellers, who, on the ensuing morning, were busily employed in getting their horses out of the stable, in order to pursue their journey. In the midst of the bustle, Lusco perceived his Venetian friend booted and spurred, but sitting with great tranquillity at the door of the inn. Surprised at seeing him thus inactive, he told him, that if he wished to become a fellow traveller for that day's journey, he must make haste as he was just going to mount; on which the Venetian said, "I should be happy to accompany you, but I do not recollect which is my horse, and I am waiting till the other guests are gone in order that I may take the beast which is left."

The above is given as a fact. The following is a caricature, in the style of our Irish jokes.

As a Venetian (says Poggio), was journeying to Trivigi on a hired horse, attended by a running footman, the servant received a kick from the beast, and in the first emotion of pain took up a stone and threw it at the aggressor; but missing his aim, he hit his master on the loins. The master looking back, and seeing his attendant limping after him at some distance, asked him why he did not quicken his pace. The servant excused himself by saying that the horse had kicked him, on which his master replied, "I see he is a vicious beast, for he has just now given me a severe kick on the back."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Also the article "On a Stone;" and the "Remarks on the Metropolis" suggested by accompanying a boy to school. Several other papers will be read forthwith, and the authors replied to in our next.

Our cordial thanks are returned to C., to C. W., H. B. D., Orlando, W. H. C., T. R., A. constant Reader and Friend, A. W. D., An Invalid, Hugh McG., G. E. I., A. M. P., and our Norfolk friend J. B., whose invitation we should gladly accept, especially this fine weather, if time and circumstances were as accommodating as he is.

We are obliged by the suggestions of W. M. T., and have thought much on that and similar projects; but must postpone its consideration for the present.

By some chance, which we much regret, the first note written some weeks ago by our fair correspondent I. H. was overlooked.

We are sorry we could not see the "wrestling." Perhaps our correspondent will give us another opportunity.

THE PENNY CYCLOPEDIA

Of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Just Published, Part XVII., price 9d.

This work has now been published, with invariable regularity since Jan. 1833; and the great circulation which it has attained is the best proof of the confidence of the Public in the accuracy and completeness of its information. In the commencement of such an undertaking, the Editors, bearing in mind the difficulty of securing at once an efficient body of contributors, recommended to the Committee only to attempt the publication of six numbers in each month. Their present stock of materials, and their reliance upon their numerous coadjutors, founded upon ample experience, have induced them to desire that the work should proceed at a quicker rate. In this they feel satisfied that they only second the wishes of the great body of its purchasers. The committee have therefore to announce the following arrangements:—

1. That the first volume of the Penny Cyclopædia—containing eleven parts—was concluded on the 30th of November; and published on that day, handsomely bound in cloth, lettered, at 7s. 6d.
2. That, commencing with December, two numbers of the work will be published regularly every week, without supplements, that sometimes eight, and sometimes ten numbers will appear in each calendar month.
3. That on the 1st of January, 1834, part XII was published, price nine-pence, and the monthly parts will be regularly continued at that price.
4. That on the 1st of September, 1834, the second volume, containing eight ninenpenny parts, will be published, bound uniformly with vol. I. at 7s. 6d.; and that the future volumes will be completed every eight months.

BREAKFAST IN SUMMER.

"Breakfast in Summer!" cries a reader, in some narrow street in a city: "that means, I suppose, a breakfast out of doors, among trees; or at least, in some fine breakfast-room, looking upon a lawn, or into a conservatory. I have no such breakfast-room; the article is not written for me. However, let us see what it says:—let us see whether, according to our friend's recipe,

One can hold

A silver-fork, and breast of pheasant on't

By thinking of sheer tea, and bread and butter.

Nay, let us do him justice too. Fancy is a good thing, though pheasant may be better. Come, let us see what he says:—let us look at his Barmecide breakfast;—at all the good things I am to eat and drink, without tasting them.

Editor. Reader, thou art one of the right sort.—Thy fancy is large, though thy street be narrow. In one thing only do we find thee deficient. Thy faith is not perfect.

Reader. How? Am I not prepared to enjoy what I cannot have? And do I not know the Barmecide? Am I not a reader of the Arabian Nights,—a willing visitor of that facetious personage, who set the imaginary feast before the poor hungry devil Shacabac, and made him drunk with invisible wine, till, in the retributive intoxication of the humour, mine host got his ears boxed?

Editor. Hallo—what is that you are saying?—Oh you "intend nothing personal." Well, it is luckily added; for look you—we should otherwise have "heaped coals of fire on your head." The want of faith we complain of is not the want of faith in books and fancies, but in us and our intentions towards thyself; for how camest thou to suppose that we intended omitting thy breakfast,—thy unsophisticated cup of bohea, and most respectable bread and butter? Why, it is of, and to such breakfasts, that we write most. The others, unless their refinement be of the true, universal sort, might fancy they could do without us: whereas those that really can do so, are not unwilling to give us reception, for sympathy's sake, if for nothing else. To enjoy is to reciprocate. We have the honour (in this our paper-person) of appearing at some of the most refined breakfast-tables in the kingdom, some of these being at the same time the richest, and some the poorest, that epicure could seek or eschew; that is to say, unintellectual epicure; and when such a man is found at either, we venture to affirm that he misses the best things to be found near him. It does not become us to name names; but we may illustrate the matter by saying, that, had it been written forty years back, we have good reason to think that the intentions of the London Journal would have procured it no contemptuous welcome at the breakfast-table of Fox with his lords about him, or Burns with his "bonnie Jeanie" at his side. Porcelain, or potter's-clay, silver or pewter, potted meats, oatmeal, or bacon, are all one to us, provided there is a good appetite, and a desire to make the best of what is before us. Without that, who would breakfast with the richest of fools? And with it, who that knows the relish of wit and good humour, would not sit down to the humblest fare with inspired poverty?

Now the art of making the best of what is before us, (not in forgetfulness of social advancement, but in encouragement of it, and in aid of the requisite activity or patience, as the case may require), is one of the main objects of this publication; and as the commoner breakfast seems to require it most, it is to such tables the present paper is chiefly addressed,—always supposing that the breakfaster is of an intelligent sort; and not without a hope of suggesting a pleasant fancy, or so to the richest tables that may want it. And there are too many such!—perhaps because the table has too many "good things" on it already,—too much potted gout, and twelve-shilling irritability.

Few people, rich or poor, make the most of what they possess. In their anxiety to increase the amount of the means for future enjoyment, they are too apt to lose sight of the capability of them for present. Above all, they overlook the thousand helps to enjoyment, which lie round about them free to every body, and obtainable by the very willingness to be pleased, assisted by that fancy and imagination which nature has bestowed, more or less, upon all human beings. Some mis-called Utilitarians, incapable of their own master's doctrine, may affect to undervalue fancy and imagination, as though they were not constituent properties of the human mind, and as if they themselves, the mistakers, did not enjoy even what they do by their very assistance! Why they have fancies for this or that tea-cup, this or that coat, this or that pretty face! They get handsome wives, when they can, as well as other people, and when plain ones would be quite as "useful!" How is that? They pretend to admire the green fields, the blue sky, and would be ashamed to be insensible to the merits of the flowers. How can they take upon them to say where the precise line should be drawn, and at what point it is we are to cease turning these perceptions of pleasure and elegance to account?

The first requisite towards enjoying a breakfast, or anything else, is the willingness to be pleased; and the greatest proof and security of this willingness, is the willingness to please others. "Better" (says a venerable text) "is a dinner of herbs, where peace is, than a stalled ox with contention." Many a breakfast, that has every other means of enjoyment, is turned to bitterness, by unwilling discordant looks, perhaps to the great misery of some persons present, who would give and receive happiness, if at any other table. Now breakfast is a foretaste of the whole day. Spoil that, and we probably spoil all. Begin it well, and if we are not very silly or ill-taught persons indeed, and at the mercy of every petty impulse of anger and offence, we in all probability make the rest of the day worthy of it. These petty impulses are apt to produce great miseries. And the most provoking part of the business is, that for want of better teaching, or of a little forethought, or imagination, they are sometimes indulged in by people of good hearts, who would be ready to tear their hair for anguish, if they saw you wounded or in a fit, and yet will make your days a heap of wretchedness, by the eternal repetition of these absurdities.

It being premised then that persons must come to breakfast without faces sour enough to turn the milk, (and we begin to think that our cautions on this head are unnecessary to such readers as take in the London Journal) we have to inform the most unpretending breakfaster—the man the least capable of potted meats, partridges, or preserves, that in the commonest tea-equipage and fare which is set upon his board, he possesses a treasure of pleasant thoughts; and that if he can command but the addition of a flower, or a green bough, or a book, he may add to them a visible grace and luxury, such as the richest wits in the nation would respect.

"True taste," says one of these very persons, (Mr. Rogers in his notes to a poem,) "is an excellent economist. She delights in producing great effects by small means." This maxim holds good, we see, even amidst the costliest elegancies; how much more is it precious to those whose means are of necessity small, while their hearts are large? Suppose the reader is forced to be an economist, and to have nothing on his breakfast table but plain tea and bread and butter. Well; he is not forced also to be sordid, or wretched, or without fancy, love, or intelligence. Neither are his tea-cups forced to be ill shaped, nor his bread and butter ill cut, nor his table-cloth dirty: and shapeliness and cleanliness are in themselves elegancies, and of no mean order. The spirit of all other elegance is in them,—that of selectness,—of the superiority to what is unfit and superfluous. Besides, a breakfast of this kind is the preference, or good old custom, of thousands who could afford a richer one. It may be called the staple-breakfast of England; and he who cannot make an excellent meal of it, would be in no very good way with the luxuries of a George the Fourth, still less with the robust meats of a huntsman. Delicate appetites may reasonably be stimulated a little, till regularity and exercise put them in better order; and nothing is to be said against the innocencies of honies and marmalades. But strong meats of a morning, are only for those who take strong exercise, or who have made up their minds to defy the chances of gout and corpulence, or the undermining pre-digestion of pill-taking.

If the man of taste is able to chuse his mode of breakfasting in summer time, he will of course invest it with all the natural luxuries within his reach. He will have it in a room, looking upon grass and trees, hung with paintings, and furnished with books. He will sit with a beautiful portrait beside him, the air shall breathe freshly into his room, the sun shall colour the foliage at his window, and shine betwixt their chequering shadows upon the table; and the bee shall come to partake the honey he has made for him.

But suppose that a man capable of relishing all these good things, does not possess one of them,—at least can command none that require riches. Nay, suppose him destitute of every thing but the plainest fare, in the plainest room, and in the least accommodating part of a city. What does he do? Or what, upon reflection, may he be led to do? Why, his taste will have recourse to its own natural and acquired riches, and make the utmost it can out of the materials before it. It will shew itself superior to that of thousands of ignorant rich men, and make its good-will and its knowledge open sources of entertainment to him unknown to treasures which they want the wit to unlock. Be willing to be pleased, and the power will soon come. Be a reader, getting all the information you can; and every fresh information will paint some common-place article for you with brightness. Such a man as we have described will soon learn not to look upon the commonest table or chair without deriving pleasure from its shape or shape-ability; nor on the cheapest and most ordinary tea-cup, without increasing that gratification with fifty amusing recollections of books and plants and colours, and strange birds, and the quaint domesticities of the Chinese.

For instance, if he breakfasts in a room of the kind just mentioned, (which is putting the case as strongly as we can, and implies all the greater comforts that can be drawn from situations of a better kind,) he will select the snuggest or least cheerless part of the room, to set his table in. If he can catch a glimpse of a tree from any part of a window, (and a great many more such glimpses are to be had in the city than people would suppose) he will plant his chair, if possible, within view of it; or if no tree is to be had, perhaps the morning sun comes into his room, and he will contrive that his table shall have a slice of that. He will not be unamused even with the Jack-o'-lantern which strikes up to the ceiling, and dances with the stirring of his tea, glancing and twinkling like some chuckling elfin eye, or reminding him of some wit making his brilliant reflections, and casting a light upon common-places. The sun is ever beautiful and noble, and brings a cheerfulness out of heaven itself into the humblest apartment, if we have but the spirit to welcome it.

But if we have neither tree nor sun, and nobody with us to make amends, suppose it winter time, and that we have a fire. This is sun and company too, and such an associate as will either talk with us, if we chuse to hear it; or leave us alone, and gives us comfort, unheard. It is now summer time however, and we had better reserve our talk of fires for colder weather. Our present object is rather to point out some new modes of making the best of imaginary wants, than to dilate upon luxuries recognised by all.

Suppose then, that neither a fire, the great friend in-doors, nor sunshine, the great friend out of doors, be found with us in our breakfast room,—that we could neither receive pleasure from the one, if we had it, nor can command a room into which the other makes its way,—what ornament is there,—what supply of light or beauty could we discover, at once exquisite and cheap—that should furnish our humble board with a grace, precious in the eyes of the most intelligent among the rich? Flowers.—Set flowers on your table, a whole nosegay, if you can get it,—or but two or three,—or a single flower,—a rose, a pink, nay, a daisy. Bring a few daisies and butter-cups from your last field-walk, and keep them alive in a little water; aye, preserve but a branch of clover, or a handful of flowering grass, one of the most elegant as well as cheap of nature's productions,—and you have something on your table that reminds you of the beauties of God's creation, and gives you a link with the poets and sages that have done it most honour. Put but a rose, or a lily, or a violet on your table, and you and Lord Bacon have a custom in common; for that great and wise man was in the habit of having the flowers in season set upon his table,—morning, we believe, noon, and night; that is to say, at all his meals; for dinner, in his time, was taken at noon; and why should he not have flowers at all his meals, seeing that they were growing all day? Now here is a fashion that shall last you for ever, if you please, never changing with silks, and velvets and silver forks, nor dependent upon the caprice of some fine gentleman or lady, who have nothing but caprice and change to give them importance and a sensation. The fashion of the garments of heaven and earth endures for ever, and you may adorn your table with specimens of their drapery,—with flowers out of the fields, and golden beams out of the blue ether.

Flowers on a morning table are specially suitable to the time. They look like the happy wakening of the creation; they bring the perfumes of the breath of nature into your room; they seem the representations and embodiments of the very smiles of your home, the graces of its good-morrow, proofs that some intellectual beauty is in ourselves, or those about us, some house Aurora (if we are so lucky as to have such a companion) helping to strew our life with sweets, or in ourselves some masculine mildness not unworthy to possess such a companion, or unlikely to gain her.

Even a few leaves, if we can get no flowers, are far better than no such ornament,—a branch from the next tree, or the next herb market, or some twigs that have been plucked from a flowering hedge. They are often, nay always, beautiful, particularly in spring when their green is tenderest. The first new bougns in spring, plucked and put into a water-bottle, have often an effect that may compete with flowers themselves, considering their novelty, and indeed

Leaves would be counted flowers, if earth had none.

(There is a verse for the reader, and not a bad one, considering its truth). We often have vines (such as they are,—better than none) growing upon the walls of our city houses,—or clematis, or jessamine,—perhaps ivy on a bit of an old garden-wall, or a tree in a court. We should pluck a sprig of it, and plant it on our breakfast table. It would shew that the cheap elegancies of earth, the universal gifts of the beauty of nature, are not thrown away upon us. They shad-dow prettily over the clean table-cloth or the pastoral milk, like a piece of nature brought in doors. The tender bodies of the young vernal shoots above-mentioned, put into water, might be almost fancied clustering together with a sort of virgin delicacy, like young nymphs, naïve-struck, in a fountain. Nay, any leaves, not quite faded, look well, as a supply for the want of flowers,—those of the common elm, or the plane, or the rough oak, especially when it has become gentle with its acorn tassels, or the lime which is tasseled in a more flowery manner, and has a breath as beautiful. Ivy, which is seldom or never brought in doors, greatly deserves to be better treated, especially the young shoots of it, which point in a most elegant manner over the margin of a glass or decanter, seeming to have been newly scissared forth by some fairy hand, or by its own invisible quaint spirit, as if conscious of the tendency within it. Even the green tips of the fir-trees, which seem to have been brushed by the golden pencil of the sun, when he resumes his painting, bring a sort of light and vernal joy into a room, for want of brighter visitors. But it is not necessary to a loving and reflecting spirit to have any thing so good as those. A bit of elm-tree or poplar would do, in the absence of any thing rarer. For our parts, as far as ourself alone is concerned, it seems to us that we would not be mastered by the blackest storm of existence, in the worst pass that our pilgrimage could bring us to, as long as we had shelter over our heads, a table with bread and a cup of tea upon it, and a single one of these green smiles upon the board, to shew us that good-natured Nature was alive.

Does any reader misgive himself, and fancy that to help himself to such comforts as these would be "trifling?" Oh, let him not so condescend to the ignorance of the proud or envious. If this were trifling, then was Bacon a trifier, then was the great Conde a trifier, and the old Republican Ludlow, and all the great and good spirits that have loved flowers, and Milton's Adam himself, nay, heaven itself; for heaven made these harmless elegancies, and blessed them with the universal good will of the wise and innocent. To trifle, is not to make use of small pleasures for the help and refreshment of our duties, but to be incapable of that real estimation of either, which enables us the better to appreciate and assist both. The same mighty energy which whirls the earth round the sun, and crashes the heavens with thunderbolts, produces the lillies of the valley, and the gentle dew-drops that keep them fair.

To return then to our flowers and our breakfast-table,—were time and place so cruel as not to grant us even a twig, still there is a last resource, and a rich one too,—not quite so cheap as the other, but obtainable now-a-days by a few pence, and which may be said to grow also on the public walls,—a book. We read, in old stories, of enchanters who drew gardens out of snow, and of tents no bigger than a nut-shell, which opened out over a whole army. Of a like nature is the magic of a book,—a casket, from which you may draw out at will, bowers to sit under, and affectionate beauties to sit by, and have trees, flowers, and an exquisite friend, all at one spell. We see it now before us, standing among the cups, edgeways, plain-looking, perhaps poor and battered, perhaps bought of some dull huckster in a lane for a few pence. On its back we read, in old worn-out letters of enchantment, the word "Milton;" and upon opening it, lo! we are breakfasting forthwith

— Betwixt two aged oaks
On herbs and other country messes
Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses, in a place which they call "Allegro." Or the word on the back of the casket is "Pope," and instantly] a beauty in a "negligé" makes breakfast for us, and we have twenty sylphs instead of butterflies, tickling the air round about us, and comparing colours with the flowers, or pouncing upon the crumbs that threaten to fall upon her stomach. Or "Thomson" is the magic name; and a friend still sweeter sits beside us, with her eyes on ours, and tells us with a pressure on the hand and soft low words, that our cup awaits us. Or we cry aloud "Theocritus!" plunging into the sweetest depths of the country, and lo! we breakfast down in a thick valley of leaves and brooks and the brown summer-time, upon creams and honeycombs, the guest of bearded Pan and the Nymphs; while at a distance on his mountain-top, poor overgrown Polyphemus, tamed and made mild with the terrible sweet face of love, which has frightened him with a sense of new thoughts, and of changes which cannot be, sits overshadowing half of the vineyards below him; and with his brow in tears, blows his harsh reeds over the sea.

Such has been many a breakfast of our own, dear readers, with poverty on one side of us, and these riches on the other. Such must be many of yours; and as far as the riches are concerned, such may be all. But how is this? We have left out the milk, and the bread, and the tea itself! We must have another breakfast with the reader, in order to do them justice.

THE WEEK,

From the 2nd to the 9th of July.

SUMMER.

The following extract from Mr. Howitt's Book of the Seasons, requires no more introduction than a fine day itself. The luxuriance glows upon you at once, and remains fervid and beautiful to the last, like a proper piece of July.

Summer! glowing summer! This is the month of heat and sunshine; of clear, fervid skies, dusty roads, and shrinking streams; when doors and windows are thrown open:—a cool gale is the most welcome of all visitors, and every drop of rain is worth its weight in gold! such is July commonly; yet it is sometimes, on the contrary, a very showery month, putting the hay-maker to the extremity of his patience, and the farmer upon anxious thoughts for his ripening corn. Generally speaking, however, it is the heat of our summer. The landscape presents an air of warmth, dryness, and maturity; the eye roves over brown pastures, corn fields already white to harvest, dark lines of intersecting hedge-rows, and darker trees, lifting their heavy heads above them. The foliage at this period is rich, full, and vigorous; there is a fine haze cast over distant woods and bosky slopes; and every lofty and majestic tree is filled with a soft shadowy twilight, which adds infinitely to their beauty, a circumstance that has never been sufficiently noticed by either poet or painter. Willows are now beautiful objects in the landscape: they are like rich masses of arborescent silver, especially if stirred by the breeze, their light and fluent forms contrasting finely with the still and sombre aspect of the other trees.

Now is the general season of hay-making. Bands of mowers in their light dresses and broad straw hats, are astride long before the fiery eye of the sun glances along the horizon, that they may toil in the freshness of the morning, and stretch themselves at noon in luxurious ease by trickling waters, and beneath the shade of trees. Till then with regular strokes and a sweeping sound, the sweet and flowery grass falls before them, revealing, at almost every step, nests of young birds, mice in their cozy domes, and the mossy cells of the humble bee streaming with liquid honey; anon, troops of hay-makers are abroad, tossing the green swaths to the sun. It is one of Nature's festivities, endeared by a thousand pleasant memories and habits of the olden days, and not a soul can resist it.

There is a sound of tinkling teams and wagons rolling along lanes and fields the whole country over, aye, even at midnight, till at length, the fragrant ricks rise in the farm yard, and the pale, smooth-shaven fields are left in solitary beauty.

With the exception of a casual song of the lark in a fresh morning, and the blackbird and thrush at sunset, or the monotonous wail of the yellow hammer, the silence of birds is now complete; even the lesser reed-sparrow, which may very properly be called the English mock-bird, and which kept up a perpetual clatter with the notes of the sparrow, the swallow, the white-throat, &c., in every hedge-bottom, day and night, has now ceased its song also.

Spring-flowers have given place to a very different class. Climbing plants mantle and festoon every hedge. The wild hop, the bryony, the clematis or traveller's joy, the large white convolvulus, whose bold but delicate flowers will display themselves to a very late period of the year,—vetches, and white and yellow ladies' bed-straw invest every bush with their varied beauty, and breathe on the passers by their faint summer sweetness. The Campanula rotundifolia, the harebell of poets, and the blue-bell of botanists, arrests the eye on every dry bank, rock, and way-side, with its airy stems, and beautiful cerulean bells. There too we behold wild scabiouses, mallows, the woody night-shade, wood-betony and centaury; the red and white striped convolvulus also throws its flowers under your feet; corn-fields glow with whole armies of scarlet poppies, cockle, and the rich azure plumes of the viper's bugloss; even thistles, the curse of Adam, diffuse a glow of beauty over waste and barren places.

But whoever would taste all the sweetness of July, let him go in pleasant company, if possible, into heaths and woods; it is there, in uncultured haunts, that summer now holds her court. The stern castle, the lowly convent, the deer, and the forester, have vanished thence many ages, yet nature still casts round the forest lodge, the gnarled oak, and lonely mere, the same charms as ever. The most hot and sandy tracks, which we might naturally imagine would now be parched up, are in full glory. The Erica Tetralix, or bell-heath, the most beautiful of our indigenous species, is now in bloom, and has converted the brown bosom of the waste into one wide sea of crimson. The air is charged with its honied odour; the dry elastic turf glows, not only with its flowers, but with those of the wild thyme, the clear blue milkwort, the yellow asphodel, and that curious plant the sundew, with its drops of inexhaustible liquor sparkling in the fiercest sun like diamonds. There wave the cotton-rush, the tall fox-glove, and the latter golden mullein; there grows the classical grass of Parnassus, the elegant favourite of every poet, there creep the various species of heath-berries, cranberries, bilberries, &c.; furnishing the poor with a source of profit, and the rich of simple luxury. What a pleasure it is to throw ourselves down beneath the verdant screen of beautiful fern, or in the shade of a venerable oak, in such a scene, and listen to the summer sounds of bees, grasshoppers, and ten thousand other insects mingled with the more remote and solitary cry of the pewit and curlew! Then to think of the coach-horse urged on his sultry stage, and the plough boy and his team plunging in the depths of a burning fallow, or of our ancestors, in time of national famine, plucking up the wild fern roots for bread, and what an enhancement of our own luxurious ease!

But woods, the depths of woods, are the most delicious retreats during the fiery noons of July. The great azure campanulas or Canterbury bells are there in bloom; and in chalk and lime-stone districts there are also now to be found those curious plants the bee and fly orchis. The soul of John Evelyn well might envy us a wood-lounge at this period;

All the cool freshness of the humid air, the walk by the border of the brook chiming over the shadow-chequered pebbles, the green and breezy canopy above us, and luxurious thoughts in our hearts.

HAND-WRITINGS

From the Fifth Vol. (just published) of Mr. D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature.

THE art of judging of the character of persons by their hand-writing, can only have any reality, when the pen, acting without constraint, becomes an instrument guided by, and indicative of the natural disposition. But regulated as the pen is now too often by a mechanical process, which the present race of writing-masters seem to have contrived for their own convenience, a whole school exhibits a similar hand-writing: the pupils are forced in their automatic motions, as if acted on by the pressure of a steam-engine; a bevy of beauties will now write such fac-similes of each other, that in a heap of letters presented to the most sharp-sighted lover, to select that of his mistress—though like Bassanio among the caskets, his happiness should be risked on the choice—he would despair of fixing on the right one, all appearing to have come from the same rolling-press. Even brothers of different tempers have been taught by the same master to give the same form to their letters, the same regularity to their line, and have made our hand-writings as monotonous as are our characters in the present habits of society. The true physiognomy of writing will be lost among our rising generation; it is no longer a face that we are looking on, but a beautiful mask of a single pattern; and the fashionable writing of our young ladies is like the former tight-lacing of their mother's youthful days, when every one alike had what was supposed to be a fine shape.

Assuredly Nature would prompt every individual to have a distinct sort of writing, as she has given a peculiar countenance, a voice, and a manner. The flexibility of the manner differs with every individual, and the hand will follow the direction of the thoughts, and the emotions and the habits of the writers. The phlegmatic will pourtray his words, while the playful haste of the volatile will scarcely sketch them; the slovenly will blot, and efface, and scrawl, while the neat and orderly-minded will view themselves in the paper before their eyes. The merchant's clerk will not write like the lawyer or the poet. Even nations are distinguished by their writing; the vivacity and variousness of the Frenchman, the delicacy and suppleness of the Italian, are perceptibly distinct from the slowness and strength of pen discoverable in the phlegmatic German, Dane, and Swede. When we are in grief, we do not write as we should in joy. The elegant and correct mind which has acquired the fortunate habit of a fixity of attention, will write with scarcely an erasure on the page, as Fenelon, Gray, and Gibbon; while we find in Pope's manuscripts the perpetual struggles of correction, and eager and rapid interlineations struck off in heat. Lavater's notion of hand-writing is by no means chimerical; nor was General Paoli fanciful, when he told Mr. Northcote, that he had decided on the character and dispositions of a man from his letters, and the hand-writing.

Long before the days of Lavater, Shenstone in one of his letters said, "I want to see Mrs. Jago's handwriting, that I may judge of her temper." One great truth, however, must be conceded to the opponents of the physiognomy of writing.—general rules only can be laid down. Yet the vital principle must be true that the handwriting bears an analogy to the character of the writer, as all voluntary actions are characteristic of the individual. But many causes operate to counteract or obstruct this result. I am intimately acquainted with the handwritings of five of our great poets. The first in early life acquired among Scottish advocates a handwriting which cannot be distinguished from that of his ordinary brothers; the second, educated in public schools, where writing is shamefully neglected, composes his sublime or sportive verses, in a school-boy's rugged scrawl, as if he had never finished his tasks with the writing-master; the third writes his highly wrought poetry in the common hand of a merchant's clerk, from early commercial avocations; the fourth has all that finished neatness which polishes his verses; while the fifth is a specimen of a full mind, not in the habit of correction or alteration; so that he appears to be printing down his thoughts without a solitary erasure. The handwriting of the first and third poets, not indicative of their character, we have accounted for; the others are admirable specimens of characteristic autographs.

Oldys, in one of his curious notes, was struck by the distinctness of character in the hand-writings of several of our kings. He observed nothing further than the mere fact, and did not extend his idea to the art of judging of the natural character by the writing. Oldys has described these hand-writings with the utmost correctness, as I have often verified. I shall add a few comments. "Henry VIII. wrote a strong hand, but as if he had seldom a good pen." The vehemence of his character conveyed itself into his writing; bold, hasty, and commanding. I have no doubt the assessor of the Pope's supremacy and its triumphant destroyer, split many a good quill.

"Edward VI. wrote a fair legible hand." We have this promising young prince's diary, written by his own hand; in all respects he was an assiduous pupil, and he had scarcely learned to write and to reign when we lost him.

"Queen Elizabeth writ an upright hand like the bastard Italian." She was indeed a most elegant calligrapher, whom Roger Ascham had taught all the elegancies of the pen. The French editor of the little autographical work I have noticed has given the autograph of her name, which she usually wrote in a very large tall character, and painfully elaborate. He accompanied it with one of the Scottish Mary, who at times wrote elegantly, though usually in uneven lines; when in haste and distress of mind, in several letters during her imprisonment which I have read, much the contrary. The French editor makes this observation: "Who could believe that these writings are of the same epoch? The first denotes asperity and ostentation; the second indicates simplicity, softness, and nobleness. The one is that of Elizabeth, queen of England, the other that of her cousin, Mary Stuart. The difference of these two hand-writings answers most evidently to that of their characters."

"James I. writ a poor ungainly character, all awry, and not in a straight line." James certainly wrote a slovenly scrawl, strongly indicative of that personal negligence which he carried into all the little things of life; and Buchanan, who made him an excellent scholar, may receive the disgrace of his pupil's ugly scribble, which sprawls about his careless and inelegant letters.

"Charles I. wrote a fair open Italian hand, and more correctly perhaps than any prince we ever had." Charles was the first of our monarchs who intended to have domiciliated taste in our kingdom, and it might have been conjectured from this unfortunate prince, who so finely discriminated the manners of the different painters, which are in fact their hand-writings, that he would not have been insensible to elegancies of the pen.

"Charles II wrote a little fair running hand, as if wrote in haste, or uneasy till he had done." Such was the writing to have been expected from this illustrious vagabond, who had much to write, often in odd situations, and could never get rid of his restlessness and vivacity.

"James II wrote a large fair hand." It is characterized by his phlegmatic temper, as an exact detailer of occurrences, and the matter of business genius of the writer.

"Queen Anne wrote a fair round hand;" that is, the writing she had been taught by her master, probably without any alteration of manner naturally suggested by herself; the copying hand of a common character, vances which self-love naturally resorts to for the purpose of making amends for its confessions.

Mademoiselle de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston, Duke of Orleans, (brother to Lewis XIII.) and of Marie de Bourbon Montpensier, was born in Paris, 1627. Her parents leaving France during her childhood, she was committed to the charge of her grandmother, the queen-regent, who appointed, as her governess, Madame de St. George, a woman of distinguished learning. To a taste for literature Mademoiselle added a singular passion for military exercises. During the civil dissension in France, in the disputes of the Fronde, the town of Orleans, belonging to the Duke, her father, was on the point of submitting to the party of the King. Mademoiselle, on this intelligence, immediately quitted Paris, and marching in person at the head of a small number of troops, forced the inhabitants to open their gates and join the Parliament, whose cause her father had espoused. Mademoiselle had probably been provoked to oppose the court in resentment for a recent mortification: suspected of a secret matrimonial negotiation with the archduke, she had been publicly reprimanded by her grandmother in the council chamber, whence she retired full of indignation, and meditating vengeance for the affront she had received.

Having returned to Paris after her martial exploit, she passed thence to Etampes; where, having reviewed the parliament troops and those of the Prince of Conde, she gave battle to marshal Turenne, who commanded the royal army. In this engagement, perhaps too unequal, she suffered a defeat. Disconcerted by this blow, she negotiated for assistance with Spain; and advancing at the head of 6000 Spaniards, encamped close to La Porte St. Antoine, one of the gates of Paris, defended by the forces of the King. At the head of her troops Mademoiselle ascended the Bastille, and, seizing the canon placed on the ramparts, turned them against the enemy, whom, having drove back, she entered the city in triumph.

Cardinal Mazarine, who knew the ambition of Mademoiselle to espouse a sovereign prince, said, on this occasion, in his bad French, 'Elle a tue son marie.' ('she has killed her husband'), a prediction which he took care should be verified.

Our heroine was at length obliged to resign her laurels, and submit to a stronger power. Banished by the King to her estate at St. Fargeau, she passed some years in discontent, disgraced at court, and involved in a contention with her father respecting her mother's property, a part of which she had been entitled to on her coming of age. These differences being at length accommodated, she returned to court, and was well received. Disappointed in her hope of marrying the Arch-duke, she rejected the Kings of Portugal and of England, with several other Princes, who solicited her alliance. At the age of forty-five she became attached to Mons. de Lauzun, Captain of the King's Garde de Corps, whom she was desirous to espouse, and obtained the consent of Louis XIV. to the marriage. Mademoiselle and her lover received the compliments of all France on this occasion. The contract was drawn up and magnificent preparations made for the nuptials, when the king, on the representations of the princes of the blood, who considered this alliance as humiliating, was induced to retract his consent, and to refuse his signature to the contract.

Mademoiselle was sensibly affected by the dissolution of the engagement and the failure of her hopes, while de Lauzun, who lost a princely fortune, loudly complained. It was the opinion of many that the lovers had concluded a secret marriage, when, a short time after, de Lauzun was precipitated from the favour of the king, and thrown into prison, where he remained ten years. His liberty was then obtained through the intercession and sacrifices of Mademoiselle; who purchased his freedom by the surrender of a large part of her estates to the Duke du Maine, natural son of Louis XIV, and of Mad. de Montespan. Mons. de Lauzun ill repaid his benefactress for her constancy and generosity. He assumed on his liberation the authority of a husband, and treated the princess with tyranny and hauteur. The affection of Mademoiselle for this ungenerous man enabled her for some time to endure his imperious manners, till, with the insolence and ingratitude of a vulgar mind, he exceeded the limits of forbearance, and converted her attachment into disgust. Returning one day from the chace—'Henriette de Bourbon,' exclaimed he, angrily, 'come and draw off my boots.' The unfortunate Henrietta, remonstrating on the impropriety and cruelty of his conduct, he made an effort to strike her with his foot. This insult was not to be borne: Mademoiselle, resuming, with the pride and spirit which belonged to her character, the privileges of her birth and rank, insisted on his withdrawing from her presence, and forbade him to see her again.

Justified by her birth, her fortunes, her connexions, and her talents, in the most aspiring views, the life of Henrietta de Bourbon exhibited a series of vexations, disappointments, and mortifications. She died in 1693, leaving memoirs of her own life and times, in six volumes, with other writings, principally on subjects of religion and morals, composed at an advanced period of life. Her portrait and character are drawn in the fashion of the times, by her own pen, with apparent truth and modesty.

'I could wish,' said she 'that I had been more indebted to nature and less to art: I am sensible that my defects are not few, and I purpose to speak of myself

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXI. HENRIETTA OF BOURBON; OTHERWISE STYLED MADEMOISELLE DE MONTPENSIER.

We take the account of this lady and her unusual marriage, from Miss Hays's "Female Biography," a work of considerable judgment and impartiality, not unworthy the attention of the most accomplished of the writer's sex. The reader will be amused at the close of the narrative with the portrait which the princess has drawn of herself. There are many such portraits in French memoirs, and many too almost as remarkable for their candour, as for the subtle contri-with a sincerity which, I trust, with my friends will in some degree palliate them. It would hurt me to be pitted, therefore I ask it not: raillery would be more agreeable to me, of which envy is often the source, and which is seldom used but against persons of merit. Called upon by my friends to draw my own character, I will begin with my exterior. My shape is good and easy; my aspect open; my neck rather handsome; good hands and arms, but not fine. My legs are straight, and my feet well made. My hair a fine ash colour; my face long; my nose large and aquiline; my mouth neither large nor small, but well proportioned, with lips of a good colour. My teeth, though not fine, are far from bad. My eyes are light blue, clear, and sparkling. My air stately, but not haughty. I dress negligently, but not slovenly, which I abhor: whether in diaphanous or magnificently apparelled I preserve the same air of consequence. Negligence of dress does not misbecome me; and I may venture to say, I disfigure the ornaments I put on, less than they embellish me. I am civil and familiar, but not more so than is consistent with commanding respect. I talk a great deal without using a foolish, vulgar, or uncouth expression. By never speaking on any subject I do not well understand, I avoid the error of great talkers, who, over-rating their own abilities, are apt to despise those of others. I confess I love praise; and seek eagerly occasions to acquire it; on this subject perhaps I am the most vulnerable to raillery. There is nothing on which I pique myself so much as on constancy in friendship; when I am so fortunate as to find persons who merit my esteem, I am a real and steady friend. Nothing can equal my fidelity towards those I have professed to love: would to God I had found in others the same sentiment! From this disposition I bear impatiently the levity of my acquaintance. To repose confidence in me gains above all things upon my regard: I consider confidence as the highest mark of esteem, and I am secret to excess. I am a dangerous enemy; I resent warmly, and do not easily pardon. This vindictive temper, joined to my influence and high station, has made my enemies tremble; but I possess also a noble and an upright mind, incapable of base or criminal actions. I am of a melancholy turn of mind, and prefer solid and serious books to lighter compositions, which soon weary me. My judgment of the merit of an author is perhaps not less just than that of those who boast more learning. I love the conversation of men of sense, and can endure without lassitude those who are less entertaining, since my rank imposes on them some constraint. Though not always amused, I am seldom offended. I discern and esteem all persons of merit, of whatever profession, but I greatly prefer military men. On the subject of war I converse with pleasure, for, with great personal courage, I have much ambition. My resolutions are suddenly taken and firmly kept. I feel so much indifference for some things in the world, so much contempt for others, and entertain so good an opinion of myself, that I would choose rather to pass the remainder of my life in solitude, than impose the least constraint on my humour, however advantageous it might be to my fortune. I love best to be alone. I have no great complaisance, though I expect a great deal. I love to provoke and irritate, though sometimes I can oblige. I am not fond of diversions, neither do I trouble myself to procure them for others. Of all instruments of music, I prefer the violin. I did love dancing, and danced well. I hate cards; love games of exercise; am a proficient in all kinds of needle-work; and am fond of riding on horseback. I am more sensible to grief than to joy, possibly from having had more acquaintance with the former, but it is difficult to distinguish with which I am affected; for, though no comedian, I am too much mistress of my looks and actions to discover to those about me more than I choose they should know. I am at all times self-possessed. The vexations and chagrin which I have suffered would have killed any other than myself; but God has been merciful and good in endowing me with sufficient strength to sustain the misery which he has allotted to me. Nothing fatigues, dejects, or discourages me. Though I sincerely wish to be so, I am not devout. Though indifferent to the world, I do not, I fear, sufficiently despise it, wholly to detach myself from it; since I have not enrolled myself among the number of those, who by quitting it, prove their contempt. Self-love is not requisite to become devout. I am naturally distrustful and suspicious. I love order even in the minutest article. I know not whether I am liberal, but I know well that I love magnificence and pomp, and give generously to men of merit, and to those whom I regard; but, as on these occasions I am guided by my fancy, I know not whether the term liberal would be properly applied to me, however I feel a pleasure in doing everything of this kind in the handsomest manner. I have no inclination for gallantry, nor do I possess any great tenderness of soul; I am less sensible to love than to friendship. I like to know what passes in the world, without the trouble of mixing with it. I have a great memory, and form a tolerably good judgment of most things. No one will, I hope, be so rash as to attribute to a defect of judgment the misfortunes I have suffered; were fortune guided by judgment or justice, she would certainly have treated me better."

This lady's confessions, though not free from contradiction, have an air of ingenuousness. Her love of "pomp and magnificence" was probably her real character: her indifference and contempt for the world the offspring of disappointment.

CRICKET, TENNIS, FIVES, AND BOWLING.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,

Your leading article on cricket the other day has fairly "turned me round,"—to use an expression of a faithful old servant of mine, when anything extraordinary assails him. I have no wish, however, to trouble you with anything I have to say; the Cacothætes scribendi which once raged within me when politics ran high, and the court was corrupt, and Jeffreys redivivus sat in the judgment seat, (none of these things exist now!) and certain evils befel a certain person and an uncompromising kinsman of his, whom the honest and brilliant Hazlitt called "a patriot without an eye to himself," has long ceased to trouble me; but if you are to go on at this rate, calling up one's sympathies in every imaginable way, reviving all one's old and most delightful recollections, and giving them the freshness and vigour of youth, why, you must take the consequences—that's all. You are only arrived at your eighth number (may you live to write and I to read a million), yet I protest you have written more provoking things than any man in England, since the vexatious close of the Indicator and Companion. You may well say that letters have showered upon you like April blossoms, and if you don't revoke your invitation to contributors contained in your second number, take care the blossoms don't smother you.

Sir, I am an old cricketer, and have been not a little delighted with your remarks on that noble game, and offer you my thanks for the greater publicity you have given to that admirable book, "The Young Cricketer's Tutor." This book ought to become national property, and the government should lose no time in seeing that a copy of it is put into the hands of every lad in Great Britain above ten years of age, and should recommend to parliament to grant a piece of ground in every town and village in the kingdom for the use of its inhabitants, expressly for cricket and other games. If there be one member of parliament who desires to live for ages in the minds of a grateful posterity, let him set about carrying a measure of this sort, and when accomplished, ten years would not elapse before this country would exhibit a very different race of men to those which are now found either in our manufacturing or agricultural districts.

To every cricket ground I would by all means attach a Fives Court and a Tennis Court. Both these games, notwithstanding the fascination which Miss Mitford and Messrs. Nyren and Clarke have thrown around the game of cricket, are more calculated to improve a man's digestion, drive the blue devils out of his head, rub a wrinkle out of his heart, and the rheumatism out of his bones, than even the noble game of cricket. You have said, that it is not in every one's power to become a cricketer—true; but it is in every one's power, who is able to stand on his legs, to play both the game of Fives and Tennis. The degree of skill, of course, will depend on the taste, activity, and practice of the party. Again, unless the cricket ground is tolerably dry, and the temperature of the atmosphere moderate, the pleasure of the game is materially lessened, to say nothing of the evil to be apprehended from cold. Now if a Fives or Tennis Court be probably laid down, in ten minutes after a shower of rain it is fit to play on, and barring a deep snow, I know of nothing which need prevent these games being played from January to December; whereas, the finest county in England will hardly admit of cricket being played more than six months in the year, say from May to October. What is a man like myself, and I am afraid I am one of a large class in this country, who has a family to provide for, whose business is nearly profitless, subject as I am to "all the skye influences," and hypochondriacal withal, what, I say, am I to do for vigorous exercise from October to May? Shall I be able with a game of cricket, say twice a week during the summer months, to get a sufficient stock of physical health for my occupation during the six winter months, when the country no longer affords its delicious pleasures? I have never yet been able to do it; and the health and spirits I now enjoy I attribute more to the manly invigorating exercise of Fives and Tennis, than either to cricket or horse exercise.

If these remarks are worthy of appearing in your most interesting Journal, insert them, and you will gratify one of your oldest acquaintances.

Birmingham, May 26, 1834.

* * * We heartily agree in these matters with our correspondent, who has gratified us much by his friendly letter, and made us feel the old acquaintance-ship, though we have not the pleasure of knowing who he is. He will not object to our adding a word in favour of the now despised, but once fashionable game of bowls,—bowls, the pastime of the wits of the court of Charles the Second, and the nobler spirits of his father's court, and of Cromwell's,—now reduced to the exclusive patronage of the frequenters of public houses; and very lucky and sensible they are in retaining it. It is a game that may be practised, in all weathers, rain or shine, under cover or out of it, and by all sorts of people, robust or delicate; for even the weakest, who could not stoop, might have the bowl fetched to them; and in a little time they would feel their strength returning. We have seen the beautiful bowling-greens still existing in the venerable old grounds of the most celebrated English families, and have mourned to think how melancholy they looked in their forlornness, and how much melancholy they might have prevented, had the frivolous hand of fashion been taught to know better than to despoil them. But we must have a separate "article" on this subject, and recommend H. to think of it meantime, and prepare (we hope) to second our endeavours in its behalf. We agree with him as to the merits of tennis and fives, and all other manly games; but bowls has this advantage over most of them, that it can be played in almost any place, and suits people of all ages, sizes, and conditions.

KENTUCKY AND THE SPORTS THERE.

THESE are the rough sports of a roughly formed settlement. And livelier ones remain untold, such as Mr. Audubon (for it is from him we quote) does not think it might have been equally in keeping to detail to his "kind readers;" to wit, such as squeezing men's eyes out, biting off their noses, and other small evidences of a robust and primitive state of the social compact, and of "roughing it" through the world.

Kentucky (says Mr. A.) was formerly attached to Virginia, but in those days the Indians looked upon that portion of the Western wilds as their own, and abandoned the district only when forced to do so, moving with disconsolate hearts further into the recesses of the unexplored forests. Doubtless, the richness of its soil, and the beauty of its borders, situated as they are along one of the most beautiful rivers in the world, contributed as much to attract the old Virginians, as the desire so generally experienced in America, of spreading over the uncultivated tracts, and bringing into cultivation lands that have for unknown ages teemed with the wild luxuriance of untamed nature. The conquest of Kentucky was not performed without many difficulties. The warfare that long existed between the intruders and the redskins was sanguinary and protracted; but the former at length made good their footing, and the latter drew off their shattered bands, dismayed by the mental superiority and indomitable courage of the white men.

This region was probably discovered by a daring hunter, the renowned Daniel Boone. The richness of the soil, its magnificent forests, its numberless navigable streams, its salt springs and licks, its saltpetre caves, its coal strata, and the vast herds of buffalo and deer that browsed on its hills and amidst its charming valleys, afforded ample inducement to the new settlers, who pushed forward with a spirit far above that of the most undaunted tribes, which for ages had been the sole possessors of the soil.

The Virginians thronged towards the Ohio. An axe, a couple of horses, and a heavy rifle, with store of ammunition, were all that were considered necessary for the equipment of the man, who, with his family, removed to the new state, assured that, in that land of exuberant fertility, he could not fail to provide amply for all his wants. To have witnessed the industry and perseverance of these emigrants must at once have proved the vigour of their minds. Regardless of the fatigue attending every movement which they made, they pushed through an unexplored region of dark and tangled forests, guiding themselves by the sun alone, and reposing at night on the bare ground. Numberless streams they had to cross on rafts with their wives and children, their cattle and their luggage, often drifting to considerable distances before they could effect a landing on the opposite shores. Their cattle would often stay amid the rich pasturage of these shores, and occasion a delay of several days. To these troubles add the constantly impending danger of being murdered, while asleep in their encampment, by the prowling and ruthless Indians, while they had before them a distance of hundreds of miles to be traversed, before they could reach certain places of rendezvous called stations. To encounter difficulties like these must have required energies of no ordinary kind; and the reward which these veteran settlers enjoy was doubtless well merited.

Some removed from the Atlantic shores to those of the Ohio in more comfort and security. They had their waggons, their negroes, and their families. Their way was cut through the woods by their own axemen, the day before their advance; and when night overtook them, the hunters attached to the party came to the place pitched upon for the encamping, loaded with the dainties of which the forest yielded an abundant supply, the blazing light of a huge fire guiding their steps as they approached, and the sound of merriment that saluted their ears assuring them all was well. The flesh of the buffalo, the bear, and the deer, soon hung in large and delicious steaks, in front of the embers; the cakes already prepared were deposited in their proper places, and under the rich dripping of the juicy roast, were quickly baked. The waggons contained the bedding, and whilst the horses which had drawn them were turned loose to feed on the luxuriant undergrowth of the woods, some perhaps hopped, but the greater number merely with a light bell hung to their necks, to guide their owners in the morning to the spot where they might have rambled, the party were enjoying themselves after the fatigues of the day.

In anticipation all is pleasure; and these migrating bands feasted in joyous society, unapprehensive of any greater difficulties than those to be encountered in forcing their way through the pathless woods to the land of abundance; and though it took months to accomplish the journey, and a skirmish now and then took place between them and the Indians, who sometimes crept unperceived into their very camp, still did the Virginians cheerfully proceed towards the western horizon, until the various groups all reached the Ohio, when, struck with the beauty of that magnificent stream, they at once commenced the task of clearing land, for the purpose of establishing a permanent residence.

Others, perhaps encumbered with too much luggage, preferred descending the stream. They prepared arks, pierced with port-holes, and glided on the gentle current, more annoyed, however, than those who marched by land, by the attacks of the Indians, who watched their motions. Many travellers have described these boats, formerly called arks, but now named flat-boats. But have they told you, kind reader, that in those days, a boat thirty or forty feet in length, by ten or twelve in breadth, was considered a stupendous fabric; that this boat contained men, women, and children, huddled together, with horses, cattle, hogs, and poultry for their companions, while the remaining portion was crammed with vegetables and packages of seeds? The roof or deck of the boat was not unlike a farm-yard, being covered with hay, ploughs, carts, waggons, and various agricultural implements, together with numerous others, among which the spinning-wheels of the matrons were conspicuous. Even the sides of the floating mass were loaded with the wheels of the different vehicles, which themselves lay on the roof. Have they told you that these boats contained the little all of each family of venturous emigrants, who, fearful of being discovered by the Indians under night moved in darkness, groping their way from one part to another of these floating habitations, denying themselves the comfort of fire or light, lest the foe that watched them from the shore should rush upon them and destroy them? Have they told you that this boat was used, after the tedious voyage was ended, as the first dwelling of these new settlers? No, kind reader, such things have not been related to you before. The travellers who have visited our country have had other objects in view.

I shall not describe the many massacres which took place among the different parties of white and red men, as the former moved down the Ohio; because I have never been very fond of battles, and indeed have always wished the world were more peaceably inclined than it is; and shall merely add, that in one way or other, Kentucky was wrested from the original owners of the soil. Let us, therefore, turn our attention to the sports still enjoyed in that happy portion of the United States.

We have individuals in Kentucky, kind reader, that even there are considered wonderful adepts in the management of the rifle. To drive a nail is a common feat, not more thought of by the Kentuckians than to cut off a wild turkey's head at a distance of a hundred yards. Others will bark off squirrels one after another, until satisfied with the number procured. Some, less intent on destroying game, may be seen under night snuffing a candle at the distance of fifty yards, off hand, without extinguishing it. I have been told that some have proved so expert and cool, as to make choice of the eye of a foe at a wonderful distance, boasting beforehand of the sureness of their piece, which has afterwards been fully proved when the enemy's head has been examined.

Having resided some years in Kentucky, and having more than once been witness of rifle sports, I shall present you with the result of my observation, leaving you to judge how far rifle-shooting is understood in that State.

Several individuals who conceive themselves expert in the management of the gun, are often seen to meet for the purpose of displaying their skill, and betting a trifling sum, put up a target, in the centre of which a common sized nail is hammered for about two-thirds of its length. The marksmen make choice of what they consider a proper distance, which may be forty paces. Each man cleans the interior of his tube, which is called wiping; it, and places a ball in the palm of his hand, pouring as much powder from his horn upon it as will cover it. This quantity is supposed to be sufficient for any distance within a hundred yards. A shot which comes very close to the nail is considered as that of an indifferent marksman; the bending of the nail is of course somewhat better; but nothing less than hitting it right on the head is satisfactory. Well, kind reader, one out of three shots generally hits the nail, and should the shooters amount to half-a-dozen, two nails are frequently needed before each can have a shot. Those who drive the nail have a further trial amongst themselves, and the two best shots out of these generally settle the affair, when all the sportsmen adjoin to some house, and spend an hour or two in friendly intercourse, appointing, before they part, a day for another trial. This is technically termed Driving the Nail.

Barking off squirrels is delightful sport, and in my opinion requires a greater degree of accuracy than any other. I first witnessed this manner of procuring squirrels whilst near the town of Frankfort. The performer was the celebrated Daniel Boon. We walked out together, and followed the rocky margins of the Kentucky River, until we reached a piece of flat land thickly covered with black-walnuts, oaks, and hickories. As the general mast was a good one that year, squirrels were seen gambolling on every tree round us. My companion, a stout, hale, and athletic man, dressed in a home-spun hunting shirt, bare-legged and moccasined, carried a long and heavy rifle, which, as he was loading it, he said had proved efficient in all his former undertakings, and which he hoped would not fail on this occasion, as he felt proud to shew me his skill. The gun was wiped, the powder measured, the ball patched with six-hundred-thread linen, and the charge sent home with a hickory rod. We moved not a step from the place, for the squirrels were so numerous that it was unnecessary to go after them. Boon pointed to one of these animals which had observed us, and was crouched on a branch about fifty paces distant, and bade me mark well the spot where the ball should hit. He raised his piece gradually, until the bead, (that being the name given by the Kentuckians to the sight) of the barrel was brought to a line with the spot which he intended to hit. The whip-like report resounded through the woods and along the hills in repeated echoes. Judge of my surprise when I perceived that the ball had hit the piece of the bark immediately beneath the squirrel, and shivered into splinters, the concussion produced by which had killed the animal, and sent it whirling through the air, as if it had been blown up by the explosion of a powder magazine. Boon kept up his firing, and before many hours had elapsed, we had procured as many squirrels as we wished; for you must know, kind reader, that to load a rifle requires only a moment, and that if it is wiped once after each shot it will do duty for hours. Since that first interview with our veteran Boon, I have seen many other individuals perform the same feat.

The snuffing of a candle with a ball I first had an opportunity of seeing near the banks of Green River, not far from a large pigeon-roost, to which I had previously made a visit. I heard many reports of guns during the early part of a dark night, and knowing them to be those of rifles, I went towards the spot to ascertain the cause. On reaching the place, I was welcomed by a dozen of tall, stout men, who told me they were exercising, for the purpose of enabling them to shoot under night at the reflected light from the eyes of a deer or wolf, by torchlight, of which I shall give you an account somewhere else. A fire was blazing near, the smoke of which rose curling among the thick foliage of the trees. At a distance, which rendered it scarcely distinguishable, stood a burning candle, as if intended for an offering to the goddess of night, but which in reality was only fifty yards from the spot on which we all stood. One man was within a few yards of it, to watch the effects of the shots, as well as to light the candle should it chance to go out, or to replace it should the shot cut it across. Each marksman shot in his turn. Some never hit either the snuff or the candle, and were congratulated with a loud laugh; while others actually snuffed the candle without putting it out, and were recompensed for their dexterity by numerous hurrahs. One of them, who was particularly expert, was very fortunate, and snuffed the candle, whilst all the other shots either put out the candle, or cut it immediately under the light.

Of the feats performed by the Kentuckians with the rifle I could say more than might be expedient on the present occasion. In every thinly-peopled portion of the state, it is rare to meet one without a gun of that description, as well as a tomahawk. By way of recreation, they often cut off a piece of the bark of a tree, make a target of it, using a little powder wetted with water or saliva, for the bull's eye, and shoot into the mark all the balls they have about them, picking them out of the wood again.

After what I have said, you may easily imagine with what ease a Kentuckian procures game, or dispatches an enemy, more especially when I tell you that every one in the state is accustomed to handle the rifle from the time when he is first able to shoulder it until the close of his career. That murderous weapon is the means of procuring their subsistence during all their wild and extensive rambles, and is the source of their principal sports and pleasures.

TRAGICAL DISAPPEARANCES FROM LIGHT AND LIFE.

THE following concentrated heap of tragical circumstances,—much melancholy in a little compass—is from the book mentioned in our last, entitled “Six Weeks on the Loire.” It begins with frightful private evidences of public tyranny, and ends with some tragedies of a different sort, unintentional, unmalignant, and relieved by the very youth and gentleness of the parties. We never met with a more complete blossom of tragedy (if we may so term it) than the account of the poor girl who perished in the height of her health and spirits while leaping over an unseen abyss to catch at an almond tree.

Chinon is on the right bank of the Vienne, and is sheltered between craggy hills; on the top of the loftiest of which, are the remains of the once formidable castle, which for a thousand years held the surrounding country in awe. It was the favourite residence of Henry the Second of England, and the scene of his last moments in 1189, when, broken hearted by the undutiful conduct of his children, he left the world with a malediction on them upon his lips. And here, ten years afterwards, his son, the lion-hearted Richard, closed his valiant career, and his giant-like ambition in the narrow precincts of the grave. This castle was the chosen abode of Charles the Seventh. The apartments he inhabited are still in tolerable preservation, as is also the room in which Joan of Arc was introduced into his presence, and selecting him, in his assumed disguise, from the nobles by whom he was surrounded, declared to him her divine mission. Here likewise it was that his unnatural son, Louis the Eleventh, whilst yet Dauphin, dared to propose the assassination of his parent to the Comte de Chabannes, the favourite minister, who had virtue enough to shrink from the horrible crime, and revealed the intention to his royal master. The dismal “oubliettes” may still be traced, close behind the fire-place, in the principal sitting-room; so that the haughty prince might be stretching his legs over the fire, with the utmost nonchalance, at the moment that the wretch who had offended him, might be precipitated, at his very side, into this horrid grave. Alas! that history should have recorded this to have actually been the case, with that mirror of chivalrous honour, Francis the First, in company with one of his mistresses; but having seen such incontrovertible proof of the monstrous cruelty of the ages of despotism, I can now believe almost anything that is told of them; and amongst the rest the account of a French writer, which, before, I thought only adapted for the pages of a romance.

“The chamber which this monarch occupied,” says he, speaking of Louis the Eleventh, at the Chateau des Loches, “was exactly over the frightful dungeons in which the unfortunates, cast in by his orders, languished. What reflections could a king make, thus taking up his abode above the horrible vaults from which the last sighs of his expiring victims were breathed. What hope of pardon for these despairing wretches, when he alone who had the power of granting it, could thus unfeelingly repose over the spot where they were suffering! A considerable time after the death of Louis the Eleventh, a captain of the name of Pontbriant, governor of the chateau, discovered an iron door which he caused to be opened, and traced by the light of flambeaus, the subterranean passages, the entrance to which its purport was to close. After advancing a little way, he perceived a second iron door which was opened, as the first; he then penetrated into a vast dungeon, at the extremity of which he beheld, exactly under the apartments of Louis the Eleventh, a man sitting on a stone bench, leaning his head on his hand. No doubt the unhappy wretch had died in this position of famine and despair! There was nothing near him excepting some linen in a small trunk. Pontbriant approached and touched him; but only a hideous skeleton, of large proportion, remained beneath his hand, at the pressure of which, slight as it must have been, the flesh and garments had instantly fallen to the earth a heap of dust!”—It is natural enough that tyrants should be cowards: the castle of Chinon, like most of the same period, has several subterranean passages, to favour escape in case of any sudden attack. One, in the corner of the king's dormitory, ran not only to the river, but under the bed of it to a chateau on the other side, within sight of the castle; and thence to another; it is said at twelve miles distance. What a picture might the imagination draw of a blood-stained, conscience-stricken monarch, thus flying by torch-light through the very bowels of the earth; fear leading the way—hate pursuing him! whilst above, in the blessed sunshine and pure breezes of heaven, the shepherd throws himself on the enamelled turf ignorant alike of the troubles and crimes of the great. But enough of horrors! It is only the powerful impression objects so new to me, in England happily unseen, unthought of, made upon my fancy, that can excuse me to myself, for having dwelt upon them so long. How different, how peaceful now the scene around! From the Tour d'Argenton, once communicating by a secret passage to the Maison Roberdeau, where the beautiful Agnes Sorel resided when Charles the Seventh was at the castle, from this tower we overlook the windings of the clear Vienne, the verdant banks of the Loire, the promontory of Landes, and the distant castle of Saumur, with a vast extent of country, all uniting in abundance and security. The interior of the quadrangle is laid out in garden grounds, watered by a well two hundred and forty-eight feet deep. This well was eight years ago, the scene of a most calamitous accident: the mouth of it was by most unpardonable negligence left open, with only a temporary covering of straw over it; so much worse than nothing, as it hid the appearance of danger. Hanging over the aperture was an almond tree, which, luxuriant in blossom, caught the attention of a young lady, the boast of La Touraine for her beauty, and the only child of wealthy parents, who with their daughter, and a few friends had come from some distance on an excursion of pleasure, to explore the remains of the castle—her eyes fixed on the fragrant flower above her head, she thought not of the cavity beneath, she sprang forward in youthful hilarity, to catch the branch—her foot touched the straw, in an instant she disappeared, and was no more! Thus, without a moments warning of her fate, realising in days of peace and refinement, the barbarous death of the "oubliettes" in the darkest ages of cruelty.

This sad recital reminded me of a similar misfortune in England, within the same period, which bereaved a professional gentleman and his wife of their only daughter, in the bloom of youth and full of charms and talents. It was in the romantic precincts of Bolton Abbey in Yorkshire, that he went with her affianced lover and a party of young friends, to enjoy the wild beauties of those unspoiled scenes of nature. At the well-known spot called the Strid, where the river wharf rushes between a cleft rock not more than six or eight feet in width, the young lady stopped an instant to look down the abyss, her companions turned round, they saw her not. It was supposed that giddy with the sight, she had fallen forward, and was engulfed by the deep and fearful current; as the youthful heir of Egremont had been, seven hundred years before; drawn into it by the starting back of his greyhound, with whom he had attempted to leap the narrow space which was to serve him as the boundary between himself and eternity.

MORE THOUGHTS "ON A STONE."

(For the London Journal.)

"Honoured therefore be thou, thou small pebble lying in the lane; and whenever any one looks at thee, may he think of the beautiful and noble world he lives in, and all of which it is capable."—London Journal, page 10.

AND is not the subject exhausted? has not the poet, the philanthropist, the lover of his species, said all that can be said upon a stone? Gentle reader, bear with me, and I will shew thee that this misshapen mass, this mere flint, is an inexhaustible source of interest to the contemplative mind. Well might our immortal Shakspeare talk of "Sermons in stones," and Lavater exclaim that "Every grain of sand is an immensity," and the Author of Contemplations of Nature remark, that "There is no picking up a pebble by the brook-side without finding all nature in connexion with it." I shall confine my remarks to a flint pebble, as being the kind of stone familiar to every one. The flint which I now hold in my hand was picked up in yonder torrent that is dashing down the side of the hill, and winding its way through that beautiful valley, and over those

Rocks and mounds confus'dly hurl'd,
The fragments of an earlier world, which partially filling up the chasm, and obstructing the rushing waters, give rise to those gentle murmurings which are so inexpressibly soothing and delightful to the soul.

Upon examining this stone, I perceive that it is but a fragment of a much larger mass; and, as its surface is smooth and rounded, the angles being worn off by attrition, it has manifestly been transported from a distance. I follow the stream to its source near the summit of the hill, and find that the waters issue from a bed of gravel and stones which forms the eminence upon which I now stand, being nearly 600 feet above the level of the British Channel, which is almost a mile distant. From this bed of flints our specimen has evidently been removed by the spring, and carried down to the spot where it first attracted our notice: but we are yet very far from having ascertained its origin. The bed of stones on the summit of this hill is clearly but an accumulation of water-worn materials—an ancient sea-beach, consisting of chalk-flints that have been detached from their parent bed, and broken, and mounded, and heaped together. We are certain of this, because we know that flints cannot grow; that they must be formed in hollows or fissures of other stones; and upon inspecting our specimen more minutely, we are certain not only that such was the case, but also that it was formed in chalk, for it contains impressions of shells and corals, that are found only in that rock. Here too, another wonderful fact presents itself: this flint, now so hard and unyielding, was once in a state of softness or fluidity, for we have the most delicate markings of the sea-hedgehog (echinite) impressed on its surface; and, here too, a fragile shell covered with spines partially imbedded in it; nay more, upon breaking off one end, we perceive that a sponge is enveloped in the substance of the flint, as well as several minute corals, with here and there scales of fishes! What a "Medal of Creation" is here! what a page of Nature's volume to interpret! what startling reflections crowd upon the mind!—To avoid confusion, we must reverse the order of our enquiry, and first contemplate the formation of the flint in its parent bed. The chalk, that beautiful white stone, which, as an American friend, who saw it for the first time observed, is so like an artificial production, abounds in sea-shells, corals, the remains of fishes, crabs, lobsters, and reptiles, all of which differ essentially from the living species, although a few of them resemble in some particulars certain shells and corals of the seas of hot climates. These remains are found in so perfect a state, the shells with all their spines and delicate processes, and the fishes with their forms so entire, that no doubt can be entertained that they were not only surrounded by the chalk while living in their native seas, but also that they were entombed in their stony sepulchres suddenly, and while the chalk was in the state of liquid plaster of Paris. Now the flint occurs in the chalk in various forms: sometimes in nodules or irregularly formed globular masses; sometimes in continuous layers or veins, either horizontal or oblique; the former have generally shells, corals, or other zoophytes as a nucleus, as in the specimens before us: while the latter occupy fissures in the chalk rock. The chalk is stratified; that is, it is separated into layers, as if a certain quantity had been poured out, and had sunk to the bottom of the sea, enveloping the animals that fell in its way, and this layer had consolidated before a fresh mass was superposed. There is conclusive evidence that the flint and chalk were dissolved in this same liquid, and thrown down together, the two substances separating (upon well known chemical principles) as they became solid, the organic bodies serving as nuclei, to which the siliceous particles attached themselves: hence we often find a shell or a fish partly imbedded in chalk, and partly in flint. We may further add, that we know the chalk (at least of the south of England,) was not only formed in a sea, but at the bottom of a very deep sea; for the ammonites or snake-stones which, like the recent nautili, were inhabitants of deep waters, abound in it. These shells, which are only known in a fossil state, were very abundant in the ancient seas of our globe: those of Whitby are well known.

Thus the nuns of Whitby told,
How a thousand snakes each one,
Was chang'd into a coil of stone,
When holy Hilda pray'd:
Themselves within their sacred bound,
Their stony folds had often found.

Sir W. Scott.

Our flint, then, we see, was once fluid, and being poured out (probably in thermal waters) into a deep ocean inhabited by myriads of beings, some of which are not known to exist, became consolidated and surrounded by the chalk, entangling the shells, corals, and other remains which are now embedded in it. Thus much for its origin;—how came it dislodged from its rocky envelopment, cast up from the depths of the ocean, and deposited upon yonder mountain? If we stroll along the sea-shore, we shall solve some of these inquiries, for—

There is a language by the lonely shore,
There is a society where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar!

The incessant dashing of the waves against the base of the chalk cliffs, undermines the rock, and huge masses are constantly giving way and falling into the waters: the chalk becomes softened, and finally transported to the tranquil depths of the ocean, to form new deposits; and the flints being detached are broken and rolled by attrition into the state of brack and gravel, and ultimately of sand. But this could not take place if the chalk were at the bottom of the deep sea where it was originally deposited: it is therefore manifest that the bed of the chalk ocean has been broken up, and great portions of it elevated to the situations which they now occupy, at some remote period of the earth's history; and in the like manner has the ancient sea-beach been lifted up to its present elevation of several hundred feet above the level of the sea. Every part of the earth's surface presents incontrovertible proofs that the elevation of the bottom of the deep in some places, and the subsidence of the dry land in others, has been and is still going on; and that in truth this mutability of the surface is the effect of one of those laws which the Author of the Universe has impressed on matter, and thus rendered it capable of eternal renovation.

Art, Empire, Earth itself, to change are doom'd;
Earthquakes have rais'd to heaven the humble vale
And gulfs the mountain's mighty mass entomb'd,
And where the Atlantic rolls wide continents have bloom'd.

We conclude these remarks with the following magnificent lines of Lord Byron, which embody the startling fact, that inquiries of this kind have established,—namely, that if the character of immutability be applicable to any thing in this world, it is to the ocean, and not to the land!

Thy shores are empires, changed in all save thee—
Assyria, Greece, Rome, Carthage, what are they?
Thy waters washed them while they yet were free,
And many a tyrant since their shores obey,
The stranger, slave, and savage: their decay
Has dried up realms to deserts; not so thou,
Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow—
Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now!

MR. MORIER'S NEW NOVEL, "AYESHA, THE MAID OF KARS."

THOUGH the plot of this novel is explained in the following abstract, it is not told; the details of it are not anticipated. The curiosity of the reader, therefore, is still kept fresh for a thorough perusal—nay, we trust, is additionally excited.

Lord Osmond, the heir of a noble English family, is about to return home after long travelling and residing in the East. Perfectly familiar with Oriental customs, and wearing the costume of the country, he is hardly to be distinguished from a veritable Osmanli. His personal attendants are Anastasio, or, more familiarly, Stasso, and Mustafa, Tatar, or courier. Arriving at Kars, his horse falls with him, and the accident draws a compassionate exclamation from a beautiful Turkish girl, who enters the house next door to the Armenian's, with whom he is to lodge. He eventually obtains an interview with her, and a mutual attachment arises. Their intercourse is discovered, and he is lodged in prison. From prison he escapes by the aid of a Yezidi, an officer of Kara Bey. After his departure his effects are seized by the Pacha of Kars, and overhauled in full divan.

"Many were the mistakes which occurred." * * * They pondered deeply over every article; they turned the books upside down, they split the mercury from the artificial horizon, broke the thermometers, displaced the barometer, scattered the mathematical instruments about, so that they never could be re-inserted in the case. A small ivory box attracted their attention; it was so prettily turned, so neat, and so ornamental, that, like children quarrelling for a toy, each of them longed to possess it. At length it was ceded to the Mufti. This sapient personage had enjoyed the pleasure of laughing at others, but as yet had not been laughed at himself. Twisting the box in all directions, at length he unscrewed it, much to his satisfaction, and seeing a small tube within, surrounded by a bundle of diminutive sticks, he concluded this must be the Frank's inkstand—the liquid in the tube being the ink, the sticks the pens. He was not long in inserting one of the sticks into the tube; he drew it out, and on a sudden instantaneous light burst forth. Who can describe the terror of the Turk? He threw the whole from him, as if he had discovered that he had been dandling the shaitan in person. "Ai Allah!" he exclaimed with eyes starting from his head, his mouth open, his hand clinging to the cushions, his whole body thrown back:—"Allah protect me! Allah, Allah, there is but one Allah!" he exclaimed in terror, looking at the little box and the little sticks, strewn on the ground before him, with an expression of fear that sufficiently spoke his apprehension that it contained some devilry, which might burst out and overwhelm him with destruction. Nor were the surrounding Turks slow in catching his feelings; they had seen the ignition, and partaken of the shock. Every one drew back from the box and its contents, and made a circle round it: looking at it in silence, and waiting the result with terror, low "Allah, Allah!" broke from the audience, and few were inclined to laugh. At length, seeing that it remained stationary, the ludicrous situation of the Mufti began to draw attention, and as he was an object of general dislike, every one who could do so with safety, indulged in laughing at him. The grave Suliman, who had seen more of Franks than the others, at length ventured to take up the box, though with great wariness; he was entreated, in the name of the Prophet! to put it down again by the Pasha, who then ordered Bogos, the Armenian, to take up the whole machine, sticks and all, and at his peril instantly to go and throw it into the river; swearing by the Koran and by all the Imams, that if the devil ever appeared amongst them again, he would put not only him, but every Armenian and Christian in Kars, to death.

"The Yezidies, or worshipers of Satan, as they are frequently called, are one of the numerous sects which were formed in Mesopotamia among the Musselmans after the death of their prophet, and extended themselves more particularly among that ancient people, the Kurds. They constitute a curious chapter in the history of man. Their founder was Sheikh Yezid, the declared enemy of the family of Ali. The doctrine they profess is a mixture of Manicheism, Mahomedanism, and the religion of the ancient Persians. It is preserved by oral tradition, reading and writing not being allowed among them.

"By the true believers they are looked upon as accursed; their names are synonymous with blasphemers, barbarians, and men of blood. Owing to the want of written records, it is very difficult to procure any accurate information concerning them, as they preserve great secrecy in matters of religion. The general report is, that the first principal of the Yezidies is to ensure the friendship of the Devil, and to defend his interest by the sword. They never mention his name, and even adopt all sorts of circumlocution rather than pronounce any word or sound which expresses it. Whoever approaches their habitations must be careful not to pronounce the word Shaitan and Lahnet—devil and accursed, for fear of being ill treated, or even put to death. The evil spirit has no precise name in their language. They designate him as the Sheikh Mara, or the great chief. They admit the prophets and the saints revered by Christians, and respect the monasteries bearing their names, situated within their territories. They believe that all such holy personages, when they lived on the earth, were more or less distinguished according as the Devil was pleased to notice them. In a word, they affirm that it is God who ordains; but that he delivers over the execution of his orders to the Devil. In the morning, as soon as the sun appears, they fall on their knees, their feet being naked, with their faces towards that luminary, and worship him touching the ground with their foreheads; and this they do in all secrecy. They keep no fasts, and say no prayers; and to justify this omission, they assert that their Sheikh Yezid, has in his own person made sufficient atonement until the end of the world, that he received a positive assurance of this in the revelation made to him, and that therefore it is prohibited to them to learn to read and write. Nevertheless every chief of a tribe, and all large villages, pay a Mahomedan scribe to read any letters which may be received from Turks and men in authority. Whatever regards their own immediate concerns is always performed by word of mouth, conveyed by messengers of their own sect.

"Without prayers, without fasts without rites, they have no religious festivals, except one on the 10th of August, when they assemble in great numbers in the neighbourhood of Sheikh Adi. At that time many Yezidies come from the most distant points; the festival lasts all that day and the night following; and during their passage to the place of congregation they do not scruple to rob and plunder. Married women go in numbers to the surrounding villages; and on that night, it is said, after having eaten and drunk their fill, the lights are extinguished and nothing more is said until the morning. They eat every thing without discrimination, except lettuce and pumpkins; they only bake barley bread. They use indiscriminately the same form of oaths as Turks, Christians, and Jews, but their great oath is 'By the standard of Yezid.'

"The Yezidies recognise for the chief of their religion the Sheikh who governs the tribe, to whom is confided the care of the tomb of Adi, the restorer of their sect. This tomb is in the jurisdiction of the governor of Amadiyah. The chief of this tribe must always be chosen from among the descendants of Yezid. The respect which is paid him by his adherents is such that they are charmed if they can obtain one of his old shirts as a winding sheet; they think they shall be well off in the next world with such an appendage. Some zealots will even give forty piastres for such a relic—a remnant suffices, if they cannot procure a whole shirt. When he wishes to confer a peculiar favour, he sends an old shirt as a present. The Yezidies convey to him secretly a portion of their robbery and plunder, by way of indemnification for the hospitality he exercises towards the individuals of his own sect.

"The chief of the Yezidies always keeps near him another personage, who is called Kotchek, and without whose advice he does not venture to do anything. This man is looked upon as the oracle of the chief, because he is said to enjoy the privilege of being the immediate recipient of the devil's communications. When any Yezidi is in doubt whether he should engage in an important affair or not, he seeks the advice of the Kotchek, which, however, is not given to him without consideration. Before the Kotchek affords his advice in order to give the utmost weight to his answer, he extends himself at full length on the ground, and covering himself over, he either sleeps, or pretends to sleep, after which he communicates what has been revealed to him, and the decision is made. Sometimes he takes a long while to consider.

"The Yezidies, as a race, are one of the most cruel and sanguinary that are known in Asia; for it is generally reported of them that in war, particularly in their petty differences with the Turks, whenever they make prisoners, they give no quarter, but put every one to death without discrimination. At the same time they are the greatest moral dastards and cowards, because, according as their interest may impel them, they do not hesitate to call them Mahomedans, Christians, or Jews, as may best suit their purpose at the moment. They pretend to hold in great veneration the Koran, the Gospel, the books of Moses, and the Psalms; and although they may be convicted of being Yezidies, yet they swear through thick and thin that they are not, and, for the time being, abjure real faith."

Cara Bey, with whom Osmond takes refuge from the authority of Kars, is an influential chief of this barbarous people; and a sort of epitome of their qualities. Osmond finds him reclining upon cushions spread upon the ground. "His countenance seemed as if the rallying point of every evil passion; he looked the very personification of wickedness. He was rather inclined to be fat and bloated; but his cheeks were pale and livid, his forehead of a marble whiteness; whilst the lower part of the face was dark and blue. The nose was strongly arched, the mouth drawn down and full, with two strong lines on either side, and the cheek bones broad—but it was the eyes which gave the look of the demon to the whole. Their brilliancy was almost superhuman; it might be said, 'they flashed intolerable day;' they shone through the shade of an overhanging brow, like torches within a cavern. There was an obliquity in their look which produced deformity and gave a cast of villainy to their expression—had they been well matched, they would have been accounted beautiful. And, withal, the settled tone of the features was a fixed smile. He was remarkable for a scowl on the brow, and a smile on the lip—a smile denoting contempt of everything good, which did not vanish even at the sight of inflicted tortures and agonizing death. Such was the man before whom Osmond stood, and this was Cara Bey. In his person he was tall and muscular, and the breadth of his shoulders, and the deepness of his chest, spoke for his strength."

Osmond is compelled by Cara Bey to accompany him in an expedition against a neighbouring Russian garrison; where he is chiefly instrumental in capturing Ivanovitch, a young Russian officer. On their return to the castle, Osmond is suddenly and unexpectedly confined in an empty apartment. In the same room is a dry well, down which Ivanovitch is lowered. Osmond, to his great horror, hears that Cara Bey is about to abduct Ayesha, and poison himself in a pilau. When the ruffian returns from Kars with his prize, the rich pilau is sent. Osmond's friend, Hassan, who had brought him to the castle, sends him a key in the poisoned dish, which is to effect his deliverance. Instead of leaving the castle himself, he affords Ivanovitch the means of egress and ingress, by means of this key, and the officer returns with a party of soldiers, and takes possession of Cara Bey's person and castle. With their prisoners they depart for the Russian encampment, where the criminal is branded and set free. Osmond and his friends embark for Constantinople. Their bark is peculiar: it is called "a saique, was square rigged, and had two masts and a bowsprit. She could hoist two sails upon each, and one on the bowsprit; occasionally she could also display a trinquet over the mainsail; but the usual practice is only to hoist one sail on either mast. The masts were secured by backstays, but were without shrouds, the only method of ascending being by a small ladder up the sides. There were two cabins astern, one of which was occupied by Osmond, the other by Ayesha, her mother, and Mariam. Of the cabins constructed on the fore-castle, was made over to Stasso and Mustafa, and the remainder were taken up by passengers. On the poop, close to the mizen, was erected a small wooden kiosk, only carpeted and cushioned, which was the peculiar property of the Reis, or captain. What we call a quarter gallery, was a sort of circular cage, which hooked on at pleasure on any exterior part of the ship. Altogether, she was as rude a specimen of a vessel as could be seen in modern times, and the only wonder was how she was ever got where she now floated."

"Osmond was anxious not to be detained, but he had to do with men to whom the meaning of the words, 'being in a hurry,' was unknown;" "The only answer which he could ever obtain from the captain was, 'Yavash, yavash,—slowly, slow,—or 'Bakalun,—we shall see,—or 'Inshallah,—if it pleases God!' He was an old weather beaten personage, with red cheeks and a white beard, whose legs had grown quite arched from being constantly seated tailor-like on the deck, and whose eyes had sunk deep into his head from gazing at the weather. Though Osmond insisted that the wind was now as fair as it could blow, all the answer he got was, 'Let us see how it will be to-morrow.' With such a person, all that could be done was to adopt the Persian's philosophy—to spread the carpet of hope, and smoke the pipe of expectation."

"Oghour Allah—a good passage to you, Omar Reis," (for that was the captain's name,) said Osmond, accosting him with that familiarity of manner which is most likely to win a sailor.

"May Allah give us success, friend!" answered he, "Please heaven, we shall get on well."

"Inshallah!" answered Osmond.

"Inshallah!" repeated the Reis.

"Are we likely to have a good passage?" inquired Osmond.

"What can I say?" answered the other. Kismet—fate! We are in God's hands. The wind is fair, please God it will last."

"Whither are you steering now?" inquired Osmond, finding that they were out of sight of land.

"To Sinope, Inshallah!" said the old man, extending his hand right a-head.

"By what point are you steering?"

"By what point?" inquired Omar; "what do I know? by the way I have always gone. Don't I know that there lies Trebisond?" pointing with his left hand on the larboard beam; "and don't I know that Caffa is there?" pointing with his right hand. "Besides, have I not my compass?"

"Ah, the compass! do you ever steer by compass?" said Osmond. "Evallah!—To be sure!" said the old man, in great exultation, expecting to surprise the Frank by his knowledge; then, calling for the compass which was kept in a square box, he placed them before them, and pointed to the fleur-de-lis on the index, "There, that is north; here is south: on this side is east, and on that west. This is the direction of the blessed Mecca. We—praise be to the Prophet!—we know many things!"

"But have you no chart?"

"We have no chart," said the old man.

"Then what is the use of a compass?" replied Osmond.

"Of what use is it?" said Omar. "I have always done very well without a chart; my father did very well before me; and my grandfather before him. After that, what can you want more? Give me only wind—I want nothing more; after all that is the father and mother of sailors; charts are bosh—nothing!"

"But were you to meet with a fortuna—a tempest, what would you do then? you ought to know where you are."

"Inshallah!" said the Reis, with a sigh, "we shall have no fortuna! Allah buyuk der!—God is great!"

"Are the gales violent in this sea?" asked Osmond.

"What can I say?" said Omar, evidently wishing to waive the subject, pulling his jacket over his breast, and looking miserable at the very thought. "Inshallah! we shall have no gale! Allah kerim der!—God is merciful!" he repeated several times, with great seriousness, at the same time shaking his head, and throwing his eyes up to heaven. "Inshallah! fortuna yok!—we shall have no tempest!"

The captain is deceived by his hopes; they have a tempest, and his despair is almost as inactive as his hopefulness. The vessel is saved by the exertions of Osmond. During the storm he discovers that Cara Bey is on board; and with difficulty saves him from the superstitious crew, who conceive that the impious Yezidi is the cause of the dangers with which they have been visited. Arrived at Constantinople, Cara Bey persuades Zabetta, Ayesha's mother, with the promised bribe of making a fine lady of her, to accuse Osmond of having run away with two Turkish women. Osmond is accordingly made the victim of the artful Greek woman's ingratitude. He undergoes a summary trial, and is removed to the Isle of Rhodes. Ayesha is thus left exposed to the machinations of Cara Bey, who out of revenge, tries to get her into the Sultan's harem. His plans are frustrated by Wortley, a friend of Osmond's who finds a sister in Ayesha. Zabetta, before her marriage with her Turkish husband, had been in the service of an English family, and had escaped with the child, which she had made to pass for her own. Wortley conveys his sister to England, where they are joined by Osmond; not, however, before he had witnessed the execution of his inveterate enemy, Cara Bey; who had been conveyed to Rhodes by the same conveyance that brought the order for Osmond's release. His last act was an attempt to assassinate his generous foe.

The Maid of Kars is a highly interesting romance, and exceeding graphic, but its effect is something deteriorated by the too great a degree of perfection awarded to the hero. He is too much of a Sir Charles Grandison in Turkey,—too infallible both in mind and muscle.

TABLE TALK.

Mrs. Siddons when a child.—In the memoranda which she has left me, Mrs. Siddons says nothing of her juvenile days, but I remember her telling an anecdote of her infancy which strongly illustrated her confidence in the efficacy of prayer, or rather of the Prayer-Book. One day, her mother had promised to take her out the following, to a pleasure party in the neighbourhood, and she was to wear a new pink dress, which became her exceedingly. But whether the party was to hold, and the pink apparel to be worn, was to depend on the weather to-morrow morning. On going to bed, she took with her her Prayer-Book, opened, as she supposed, at the prayer for fine weather, and she fell asleep with the book folded in her little arms. At day-break she found that she had been holding the prayer for rain to her breast, and that the rain, as if heaven had taken her at her word, was pelting at the windows. But she went to bed again with the book opened at the right place, and she found the mistake quite remedied; for the morning was as pink and beautiful as the dress she was to wear.—Campbell's Life of Mrs. Siddons, (just published.)

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A Happy Mother," and "Errors of Education," will have all due attention paid them. The result in our next.

A letter will be sent to the gentleman who favoured us with a letter and manuscript from Holloway, and to the other to whom we are indebted for the sight of the two books, and for the letter about the Countess of Exeter's story (not Plymouth, we believe). We allude to the well known Romance of Real Life, the marriage of a farmer's daughter by an Earl in disguise, which has been celebrated among others by the verses of Mr. Moore, and the eloquent envy of Hazlitt.

The lines of J. A. O. have much vivacity, and shew stuff in him that is worth working. But satire is not within the plan of our Journal.

We are much perplexed to know what to do with many of the longer copies of verses sent us; for if we insert one, we seem bound to insert all of equal merit, otherwise the feelings of the authors are hurt. We must take the liberty of making occasional extracts; and the writers, for the reason we state, will pardon our doing no more. Among others we have been looking for a corner for some of the lines of R. W. whom we had not overlooked, though we thought so, and though his irritation (which was quite excusable under his good nature, we suspect, will like to stand to.

We are considering what to do with a variety of publications connected with Music and the Fine Arts, the necessity for being in advance with our Journal precluding the first plan acted upon. We shall try hard to find a corner for them some how.

Many thanks to R. B. H. and to a variety of other correspondents, whom we cannot specify in this number.

LITERARY CRITICISMS.

"These beautiful miniature volumes claim our unqualified praise. Their descriptions and indications are all that we need from such a medium of information; and their innumerable wood-cuts, so far as we can discover, are quite as efficient illustrations of what they are drawn from as the most elaborate and costly engravings."—Court Journal.

"Four hundred and twenty such views as these are in themselves a treasure, and delightful for home recollections."—Athenaeum.

"These elegant little volumes comprise the results of a tour round the whole of the Southern Coast of England. Of their kind we know of nothing to compare with them; and if the large sum (not less we are assured, than six thousand pounds) which has been expended on them, do not command a corresponding degree of public patronage to the spirited exertions of the proprietor, the public deserves to be its own guide for the future."—Atlas.

THE SUBJECT OF BREAKFAST CONTINUED.—TEA-DRINKING.

A breakfast-table in the morning, clean and white with its table-cloth, coloured with the cups and saucers, and glittering with the tea-pot,—is it not a cheerful object, reader? And are you not always glad to see it?

We know not any inanimate sight more pleasant, unless it be a very fine painting, or a whole abode snugly pitched; and even then, one of the best things to fancy in it, is the morning meal.

The yellow or mellow-coloured butter, (which softens the effect of the other hues), the milk, the bread, the sugar,—all have a simple, temperate look, very relishing however to a hungry man. Perhaps the morning is sunny; at any rate the day is a new one, and the hour its freshest; we have been invigorated by sleep; the sound of the shaken canister prepares us for the fragrant beverage that is coming; in a few minutes it is poured out; we quaff the odorous refreshment, perhaps chatting with dear kindred, or loving and laughing with the “morning faces” of children,—or if alone, reading one of the volumes mentioned in our last, and taking tea, book, and bread-and-butter all at once,—no “inelegant” pleasure, as Sir Walter Scott saith of the eating of tarts.*

Dear reader, male or female (very dear, if the latter), do you know how to make good tea? Because if you do not (and we have known many otherwise accomplished persons fail in that desideratum) here is a recipe for you, furnished by a mistress of the art:—

In the first place, the tea-pot is found by experience to be best, when it is made of metal. But whether metal or ware, take care that it be thoroughly clean, and the water thoroughly boiling. There should not be a leaf of the stale tea left from the last meal. The tests of boiling are various with different people; but there can be no uncertainty, if the steam come out of the lid of the kettle; and it is best therefore to be sure of that evidence. No good tea can be depended upon from an urn, because an urn cannot be kept boiling; and water should never be put upon the tea but in a thoroughly and immediately boiling state. If it has done boiling, it should be made to boil again. Boiling, proportion, and attention, are the three magic words of tea-making. The water should also be soft, hard water being sure to spoil the best tea; and it is advisable to prepare the tea-pot against a chill, by letting a small quantity of hot water stand in it before you begin; emptying it out, of course, when you do so. These premises being taken care of, excellent tea may be made for one person by putting into the pot three tea-spoons full, and as much water as will cover the quantity. Let this stand five minutes, and then add as much more as will twice fill the cup you are going to use. Leave this additional water another five minutes, and then, first putting the sugar and milk into the cup, pour out the tea; making sure to put in another cup of boiling water directly.

Of tea made for a party, a spoonful for each and one over must be used, taking care never to drain the tea-pot, and always to add the requisite quantity of boiling water as just mentioned.

The most exquisite tea is not perhaps the wholesomest. The more green there is in it, certainly the less wholesome it is; though green adds to the palatableness. And drinking tea very hot is a pernicious custom.

Green tea and hot tea make up the two causes which produce perhaps all the injurious results attributed to tea-drinking. Their united effects, in particular, are sometimes formidable to the “nerves,” and to persons liable to be kept awake at night. Excellent tea may be made, by judicious management, of black tea alone; and this is unquestionably the most wholesome.

Now have a cup of tea thus well made, and you will find it a very different thing from the insipid dilution which some call tea, watery at the edges, and transparent half way down; or the syrup into which some convert their tea, who are no tea-drinkers, but should take treacle for their breakfast; or the mere strength of tea, without any due qualification from other materials,—a thing no better than melted tea-leaves, or than those which it is said were actually served up at dinner, like greens, when tea was first got hold of by people in remote country parts, who had not heard of the way of using it,—a dish of acrid bitterness. In tea, properly so called, you should slightly taste the sugar, be sensible of a balmy softness in the milk, and enjoy at once a solidity, a delicacy, a relish, and a fragrance in the tea. Thus compounded, it is at once a refreshment and an elegance, and we believe, the most innocent of cordials; for we think we can say from experience, that when tea does harm, it is either from the unmitigated strength just mentioned, or from its being taken too hot,—a common and most pernicious custom. The inside of a man, dear people, is not a kitchen copper.

But good tea, many of you may say, is dear. Tea of all sorts is a great deal too dear; but we have known very costly tea turn out poor in the drinking, and comparatively poor tea become precious. Out of very bad tea it is perhaps impossible to make a good cup; but skill and patience are famous for converting ordinary materials into something valuable. And it should be added, that it is better to have one cup of good tea, than half-a-dozen of bad. Nevertheless we are not for despising the worst of all, if the drinker finds any kind of refreshment in it, and can procure no better. The very names of tea and tea-time are worth something.

And this brings us to an association of ideas, which, however common with us at the breakfast-table, and doubtless with hundreds of other people, we never experience without finding them amusing. We allude to China and the Chinese. The very word tea, so petty, so infantine, so winking-eyed, so expressive somehow or other of something inexpressibly minute, and satisfied with a little (tee !), resembles the idea one has (perhaps a very mistaken one) of that extraordinary people, of whom Europeans know little or nothing, except that they sell us this preparation, bow back again our ambassadors, have a language consisting only of a few hundred words, gave us China-ware and the strange pictures on our tea-cups, made a certain progress in civilization long before we did, mysteriously stopped at it and would go no further, and if numbers, and the customs of “venerable ancestors” are to carry the day, are at once the most populous and the most respectable nation on the face of the earth. As a population, they certainly are a most enormous and wonderful body; but as individuals, their ceremonies, their trifling edicts, their jealousy of foreigners, and their tea-cup representations of themselves (which are the only ones particularly known) impress us irresistibly with a fancy, that they are a people all toddling, little-eyed, little-footed, little-bearded, little-minded, quaint, over-weening, pig-tailed, bald-headed, cone-capped or pagoda-hatted, having childish houses and temples with bells at every corner and story, and shuffling about in blue landscapes, over “nine-inch bridges,” with little mysteries of bell-hung whips in their hands,—a boat, or a house, or a tree made of a pattern, being over their heads or underneath them (as the case may happen), and a bird, as large as the boat, always having a circular white space to fly in. Such are the Chinese of the tea-cups and the grocer’s windows, and partly of their own novels too, in which every thing seems as little as their eyes,—little odes, little wine-parties, and a series of little satisfactions. However, it must be owned, that from these novels one gradually acquires a notion that there is a great deal more good sense and even good poetry among them, than one had fancied from the accounts of embassies and the autobiographical paintings on the China-ware; and this is the most probable supposition. An ancient and great nation, as civilized as they, is not likely to be so much behind-hand with us in the art of living, as our self-complacency leads us to imagine. If their contempt of us amounts to the barbarous, perhaps there is a greater share of barbarism than we suspect, in our scorn of them.

At all events, it becomes us to be grateful for their tea. What a curious thing it was, that all of a sudden, the remotest nation of the East, otherwise unknown and foreign to all our habits, should convey to us a domestic custom, which changed the face of our morning refreshments; and that instead of ale and meat, or wine, all the polite part of England should be drinking a Chinese infusion, and setting up earthen-ware in their houses, painted with preposterous scenery. We shall not speak contemptuously, for our parts, of any such changes in the history of a nation’s habits, any more than of the changes of the wind, which now comes from the west, and now from the east, doubtless for some good purpose. It may be noted, that the introduction of tea-drinking followed the diffusion of books among us, and the growth of more sedentary modes of life. The breakfasters upon cold beef and “cool tankards,” were an active, horse-riding generation. Tea-drinking times are more domestic, given to reading, and are riders in carriages, or manufacturers at the loom or the steam-engine. It may be taken as an axiom,—the more sedentary, the more tea-drinking. The conjunction is not the best in the world; but it is natural, till something better be found. Tea-drinking is better than dram-drinking, a practice which, if our memory does not deceive us, was creeping in among the politest and even the fairest circles, during the transition from ales to teas. When the late Mr. Hazlitt, by an effort worthy of him, suddenly left off the stiff glasses of brandy and water, by which he had been tempted to prop up his disappointments, or rather to loosen his tongue at the pleasant hour of supper, he took to tea-drinking, and it must be owned, was latterly tempted to make himself as much amends as he could for his loss of excitement, in the quantity he allowed himself; but it left his mind free to exercise its powers,—it “kept,” as Waller beautifully says of it, not, to be sure, the quantity, but the tea itself, compared with the other drink. The prince of tea-drinkers was Dr. Johnson, one of the most sedentary of men, and the most unhealthy. It is to be feared his quantity suited him still worse; though the cups, of which we hear such multitudinous stories about him, were very small in his time. It was he that wrote, or rather effused, the humorous request for tea, in ridicule of the style of the old ballads (things, be it said without irreverence, which he did not understand so well as “his cups.”) The verses were extempore, and addressed to Mrs. Thrale:—

“The palace of the soul serene;”

‘And now, I pray thee, Hetty dear,
That thou wilt give to me,
With cream and sugar softened well,
Another dish of tea.

* In his Life of Dryden. Original edition, p. 86. “Even for some time after his connection with the theatre, we learn, from a contemporary, that his dress was plain at least, if not mean, and his pleasures moderate, though not inelegant. ‘I remember,’ says a correspondent of the Gentleman’s Magazine for 1748, ‘plain John Dryden, before he paid his court with success to the great, in one uniform clothing of Norwich-drugget. I have sat late with him and Madam Reeve at the Mulberry-gardens, when our author advanced to a sword and a Chateaux wig.’”

But hear, alas! this mournful truth,
Nor hear it with a frown,—
Thou canst not make the tea so fast,
As I can gulp it down.

Now this is among the pleasures of reading and reflecting men over their breakfast, or on any other occasion. The sight of what is a tiresome nothing to others, shall suggest to them a hundred agreeable recollections and speculations. There is a tea-cup, for example. "Well, what is a tea-cup!" a simpleton might cry;—"it holds my tea—that's all." Yes, that's all to you and your poverty-stricken brain; we hope you are rich and prosperous, to make up for it as well as you can. But to the right tea-drinker, the cup, we see, contains not only recollections of eminent brethren of the bohea, but the whole Chinese nation with all its history, Lord Macartney included; nay, for that matter, Ariosto and his beautiful story of Angelica and Medoro; for Angelica was a Chinese; and then collaterally come in, the Chinese neighbours and conquerors from Tartary, with Chaucer's —Story of Carubscan bold, and the travels of Marco Polo and others, and the Jesuit missionaries, and the Japanese with our friend Golownin, and the Loo Choo people, and Confucius; whom Voltaire (to shew his learning) delights to call by his proper native appellation of Kong-foo-tsee (reminding us of Congo tea), and then we have the Chinese Tales, and Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, and Goldsmith brings you back to Johnson again and the tea-drinkings of old times, and then we have the Rape of the Lock before us with Belinda at breakfast, and Lady Wortley Montague's tea-table eclogue, and the domestic pictures in the Tatler and Spectator, with the passions existing in those times for china-ware, and Horace Walpole who was an old woman in that respect, and, in short, a thousand other memories, grave and gay, poetical and prosaical, all ready to wait upon any body who chooses to read books, like spirits at the command of the book-readers of old, who for the advantages they had over the rest of the world, got the title of Magicians.

Yea, pleasant and rich is thy sight; little tea-cup (large though, at breakfast) round, smooth, and coloured;—composed of delicate earth,—like the earth, producing flowers, and birds, and men; and containing within thee thy Lilliputian ocean, which we, after sending our fancy sailing over it, past islands of foam called "sixpences," and mysterious bubbles from below, will, giant-like, engulf,—

But hold—there's a fly in.

Now why could not this inconsiderate monster of the air be content with the whole space of the heavens round about him, but he must needs plunge into this scalding pool? Did he scent the sugar? or was it a fascination of terror from the heat? "Hadst thou my three kingdoms to range in," said James the First to a fly, "and yet must needs get into my eye?" It was a good-natured speech, and a natural. It shews that the monarch did his best to get the fly out again; at least we hope so; and therefore we follow the royal example in extricating the little winged wretch, who has struggled hard with his unavailing pinions, and become drenched and lax with the soaking.

He is on the dry clean cloth. Is he dead? No:—the tea was not so hot as we supposed it:—see, he gives a heave of himself forward; then endeavours to drag a leg up, then another, then stops, and sinks down, saturated and overborne with wateriness; and assuredly, from the inmost soul of him, he sighs (if flies sigh,—which we think they must do sometimes, after attempting in vain, for half an hour, to get through a pane of glass). However, his sigh is as much mixed into joy, as fright and astonishment and a horrible hot bath can let it be; and the heat has not been too much for him; a similar case would have been worse for one of us, with our fleshy bodies,—for see; after dragging himself along the dry cloth, he is fairly on his legs; he smoothes himself, like a cat, first one side then the other, only with his legs instead of his tongue; then rubs the legs together, partly to disengage them of their burthen, and partly as if he congratulated himself on his escape; and now, finally, opening his wings (beautiful privilege! for all wings, except the bat's, seem beautiful, and a privilege, and fit for envy) he is off again into the air, as if nothing had happened.

He may forget it, being an inconsiderate and giddy fly; but it is to us, be it remembered by our conscience, that he owes all which he is hereafter to enjoy. His suction of sugar, his flights, his dances on the window, his children, yea, the whole House of Fly, as far as it depends on him their ancestor, will be owing to us. We have been his providence, his guardian angel, the invisible being that rescued him without his knowing it. What shall we add, reader? Wilt thou laugh, or look placid and content,—humble, and yet in some sort proud withal, and not consider it as an unbecoming meeting of ideas in these our most mixed and reflective papers,—if we argue from rescued flies to rescued human beings, and take occasion to hope, that in the midst of the struggling endeavours of such of us as have to wrestle with fault or misfortune, invisible pity may look down with a helping eye upon ourselves, and that what it is humane to do in the man, it is divine to do in that which made humanity.

(To be concluded in our next.)

TEA, COFFEE, AND CHOCOLATE.

[Extracted, by way of Appendix to our first article, from Mr. D'Irasci's Curiousities of Literature.]

It is said, that the frozen Norwegians, on the first sight of roses, dared not touch what they conceived were trees budding with fire; and the natives of Virginia, the first time they seized on a quantity of gunpowder, which belonged to the English colony, sowed it for grain, expecting to receive a plentiful crop of combustion by the next harvest to blow away the whole colony.

In our recollection, strange imaginations impeded the first period of vaccination; when some families terrified by the warning of a physician, conceived their race would end in a species of Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

(Half-cow men, and half-men cows.)

We smile at the simplicity of the men of nature, for their mistaken notions at their first introduction among them of exotic novelties; and yet even in civilized Europe, how long a time those whose profession, or whose reputation, regulate public opinion, are influenced by vulgar prejudices, often disguised under the imposing form of science! and when their ludicrous absurdities and obstinate prejudices enter into the matters of history, it is then we discover that they were only imposing on themselves and others.

It is hardly credible that on the first introduction of the Chinese leaf, which now affords our daily refreshment; or the American leaf, whose sedative fumes made it so long a universal favourite; or the Arabian berry whose aroma exhilarates its European votaries; that the use of these harmless novelties should have spread consternation among the nations of Europe, and have been anathematized by the terrors and the fictions of some of the learned. Yet this seems to have happened. Patin, who wrote so furiously against the introduction of antimony, spread the same alarm at the use of tea, which he calls "l'impertinente nouveauté du Siècle." In Germany, Hanneman considered tea-dealers as immoral members of society, lying in wait for men's purses and lives; and Dr. Duncan, in his treatise on hot liquors, suspected that the virtues attributed to tea were merely to encourage the importation.

Many virulent pamphlets were published against the use of this shrub, from various motives. In 1670, a Dutch writer says it was ridiculed in Holland under the name of hay-water. "The progress of this famous plant," says an ingenious writer, "has been something like the progress of truth; suspected at first, though very palatable to those who had courage to taste it; resisted as it encroached; abused as its popularity seemed to spread; and establishing its triumph at last, in cheering the whole land from the palace to the cottage, only by the slow and resistless efforts of time and its own virtues."

The history of the tea-shrub, by Dr. Lettsom, usually referred to on this subject, I consider little more than a plagiarism on Dr. Short's learned and curious dissertation on Tea, 1730, 4to. Lettsom has superadded the solemn trifling of his moral and medical advice.

These now common beverages are all of recent origin in Europe; neither the ancients, nor those of the middle ages, tasted of this luxury. The first accounts we find of the use of this shrub, are the casual notices of travellers, who seemed to have tasted it, and sometimes not to have liked it: a Russian Ambassador in 1639, who resided at the court of the Mogul, declined accepting a large present of tea for the Czar, "as it would only encumber him with a commodity for which he had no use." The appearance of "a black water," and an acrid taste seems not to have recommended it to the German Olearius in 1633. Dr. Short has recorded an anecdote of a stratagem of the Dutch in their second voyage to China, by which they at first obtained their tea without disbursing money; they carried from home great store of dried sage; and bartered it with the Chinese for tea, and received three or four pounds of tea for one of sage; but at length the Dutch could not export sufficient quantity of sage to supply their demand. This fact, however, proves how deeply the imagination is concerned with our palate; for the Chinese, affected by the exotic novelty, considered our sage to be more precious than their tea.

The first introduction of tea into Europe is not ascertained: according to the common accounts it came into England from Holland in 1666, when Lord Arlington and Lord Ossory brought over a small quantity, the custom of drinking tea then became fashionable, and a pound weight sold for sixty shillings. This account, however, is by no means satisfactory. I have heard of Oliver Cromwell's tea-pot in the possession of a collector, and this will derange the chronology of those writers who are perpetually copying the researches of others, without confirming or correcting them.

Amidst the rival contests of the Dutch and the English East India Companies, the honour of introducing its use into Europe may be claimed by both. Dr. Short conjectures that tea might have been known in England as far back as the reign of James the First, for the first fleet set out in 1600: but had the use of this shrub been known, the novelty had been chronicled among our dramatic writers, whose works are the annals of our prevalent tastes and humours. It is rather extraordinary that our East India Company should not have discovered the use of this shrub in their early adventures; yet it certainly was not known in England so late as in 1641, for in a scarce "Treatise of Warm Beer," where the title indicates the author's design to recommend hot instead of cold drinks, he refers to tea only by quoting the Jesuit Maffei's account; "that they of China do for the most part drink the strained liquor of an herb called Chia, hot." The word Chia is the Portuguese term for tea retained to this day, which they borrowed from the Japanese; while our intercourse with the Chinese made us no doubt adopt their term Tea, now prevalent throughout Europe, with the exception of the Portuguese. The Chinese origin is still preserved in the term Bohea, tea which comes from the country of Vochi; and that of Hyson was the name of the most considerable Chinese then concerned in the trade.

The best account of the early use and the prices of tea in England, appears in the hand bill of one who may be called our first tea-maker. This curious hand-bill bears no date, but as Hanway ascertained that the price was sixty shillings, in 1600, his bill must have been dispersed about that period.

Thomas Garway, in Exchange-alley, tobaccoist and coffee-man, was the first who sold and retailed tea, recommending it for the cure of all disorders. The following shop-bill is more curious than any historical account we have:—

"Tea in England hath been sold in the leaf for six pounds, and sometimes for ten pounds the pound weight, and in respect of its former scarceness and dearness it hath been only used as a regalia in high treatments and entertainments and presents thereof to princes and grandes till the year 1657. The said Garway did purchase a quantity thereof, and first publicly sold the said tea in leaf or drink, made according to the directions of the most knowing merchants into those Eastern countries. On the knowledge of the said Garway's continued care and industry in obtaining the best tea, and making drink thereof, very many noblemen, physicians, merchants, &c. have ever since sent to him for the said leaf, and daily resort to his house to drink the drink thereof. He sells tea from 16s. to 50s. a pound."

Probably tea was not in general use domestically so late as in 1687; for in the Diary of Henry, Earl of Clarendon, he registers that "Pierre Couplet supped with me, and after supper we had tea, which he said was really as good as any he had drunk in China." Had his Lordship been in the general habit of drinking tea, he had not probably made it a subject for his diary.

While the honour of introducing tea may be disputed between the English and the Dutch, that of coffee remains between the English and the French. Yet an Italian intended to have occupied the place of honour; that admirable traveller Pietro della Valle, writing from Constantinople, 1615, to a Roman, his fellow-countryman, informing him that he should teach Europe in what manner the Turks took what he calls "Cakus," or as the word is written in an Arab and English pamphlet, printed at Oxford, 1659, on the "Nature of the Drink Kauki, or Coffee." As this celebrated traveller lived to 1653, it may excite surprise that the first cup of coffee was not drank at Rome; this remains for the discovery of some member of the "Arcadian Society." Our own Purchas, at the time that Valle wrote, was also "a pilgrim," and well knew what was "Coffa," which, "they drank as hot as they can endure it; it is as black as soot, and tastes not much unlike it; good they say for digestion and mirth."

It appears by Le Grand's "Vie privée des Français," that the celebrated Thevenot, in 1658, gave coffee after dinner; but it was considered as the whim of a traveller; neither the thing itself, nor its appearance was inviting; it was probably attributed by the gay to the humour of a vain philosophical traveller. But ten years afterwards a Turkish ambassador at Paris made the beverage highly fashionable. The elegance of the equipage recommended it to the eye, and charmed the women: the brilliant porcelain cups in which it was poured; the napkins fringed with gold, and the Turkish slaves on their knees presenting it to the ladies, seated on the ground on cushions, turned the heads of the Parisian dames. This elegant introduction made the exotic beverage a subject of conversation, and in 1673, an Armenian at Paris, at the fair-time, opened a coffee-house. But the custom still prevailed to sell beer and wine, and to smoke and mix with indifferent company in their first imperfect coffee-houses. A Florentine, one Procope, celebrated in his day as the arbiter of taste in this department, instructed by the error of the Armenian, invented a superior establishment, and introduced ices; he embellished his apartment; and those who had avoided the offensive coffee-houses, repaired to Procope's; where literary men, artists, and wits resorted, to inhale the fresh and fragrant steam. Le Grand says, that this establishment holds a distinguished place in the literary history of the times. It was at the coffee-house of Du Laurent that Saurin, La Motte, Danchet, Boindia, Rousseau, &c. met; but the mild streams of the aromatic berry could not mollify the acerbity of so many rivals, and the witty malignity of Rousseau gave birth to those famous couplets on all the coffee-drinkers, which occasioned his misfortune, and his banishment.

Such is the history of the first use of coffee and its houses at Paris. We had the use, however, before even the time of Thevenot; for an English Turkish merchant brought a Greek servant in 1652, who, knowing how to roast and make it, opened a house to sell it publicly. I have also discovered his hand bill, in which he sets forth, "The virtue of the coffee-drink, first publickly made and sold in England by Pasqua Rosee, in St. Michael's Alley, Cornhill, at the sign of his own head."

For about twenty years after the introduction of coffee in this kingdom, we find a continued series of invectives against its adoption, both for medicinal and domestic purposes. The use of coffee, indeed, seems to have excited more notice, and to have had a greater influence on the manners of the people, than that of tea. It seems at first to have been more universally used, and is still on the continent: and its use is connected with a resort for the idle and the curious: the history of coffee-houses, ere the invention of clubs, was that of the manners, the morals, and the politics of a people. Even in its native country, the government discovered that extraordinary fact, and the use of the Arabian berry was more than once forbidden where it grows; for Ellis, in his "History of Coffee," 1774, refers to the Arabian MS. in the King of France's library, which shews that coffee-houses in Asia were sometimes suppressed. The same fate happened on its introduction into England.

Among a number of poetical satires against the use of coffee, I find a curious exhibition, according to the exaggerated notions of that day, in "A Cup of Coffee, or Coffee in its colours," 1663. The writer, like others of his contemporaries, wonders at the odd taste which could make coffee a substitute for Canary.

"For men and Christian to turn Turks and think
To excuse the crime, because 'tis in their drink!
Pure English apes! ye may, for aught I know,
Would it but mode—learn to eat spiders too.*
Should any of your grandire's ghosts appear
In your wax-candle circles and best hear
The same of coffee so much called upon;
Then see it drunk like scalding Phlegmation;
Would they not startle, think ye, all agreed
'Twas conjuration both in word and deed;
Or Catiline's conspirators, as they stood
Sending their nates in draughts of blackest blood,
The merriest ghost of all your sins would say,
Your wine's much worse since his last yesterday.
He'd wonder how the club had given a hop
O'er tavern base into a farmer's shop.
Where he'd suppose, both by the smoke and stench,
Each man a horse, and each horse at his drench.
"Sure you're no poets, nor their friends, for now
Should Jonson's strenuous spirit, or the rare
Beaumont and Fletcher's in your sound appear,
They would not find the air perfum'd with one
Castalian drop, nor dew of Helicon;
When they but men would speak as the Gods do
They drank pure nectar as the Gods drink too,
Sublimed with rich canary,—say shall then
These less than coffee's self, these coffee men;
These sons of nothing that can hardly make
Their breath, for laughing how the jest does take,
Yet grin, and give ye for the vine's pure blood
A Anticham potion, not yet understood,
Grop of soot, or essence of old shoes,
Dashed with diurnals and the books of news."

Other complaints arose from the mixture of the company in the first coffee-houses. In "a broadside against coffee, or the marriage of the Turk," 1672, the writer indicates the growth of the fashion:—

Confusion huddles all into one scene,
Like Noah's ark, the clean and the unclean;
For now, alas! the drench has credit got,
And he's no gentleman who drinks it not.
That such a dwarf should rise to such a stature!
But custom is but a remove from nature.

In "the women's petition against coffee," 1674, they complained that "it made men as unfriendly as the deserts whence that unhappy berry is said to be brought;

* This witty poet was not without a degree of precision; the January of eating spiders has never indeed become "modish," but Messrs. Lalande, the French astronomer, and one or two humble imitators of the modern philosopher, have shewn this triumph over vulgar prejudices, and were epicures of this stamp.

that the offspring of our mighty ancestors would dwindle into a succession of apes and pigmies; and on a domestic message, a husband would stop by the way to drink a couple of cups of coffee." It was now sold in convenient penny-worths; for in another poem in praise of a coffee-house, for the variety of information obtained there, it is called "a penny university."

Amidst these contests of popular prejudices, between the lovers of forsaken canary, and the terrors of our females at the barrenness of an Arabian desert, which lasted for twenty years, at length the custom was universally established; nor were there wanting some reflecting minds desirous of introducing the use of this liquid among the labouring classes of society, to wean them from strong liquors. Howel, in noticing that curious philosophical traveller, Sir Henry Blount's "Organon Salutis," 1669, observed that this "coffa drink hath caused a great sobriety among all nations; formerly apprentices, clerks, &c., used to take their morning draughts in ale, beer, or wine, which often made them unfit for business. Now they play the good fellows in this wakeful and civil drink. The worthy gentleman, Sir James Muddiford, who introduced the practice hereof first in London, deserves much respect of the whole nation." Here it appears, what is most probable, that the use of this berry was introduced by other Turkish merchants, besides Edwards and his servant Pasqua. But the custom of drinking coffee, among the labouring classes, does not appear to have lasted; and when it was recently even the cheapest beverage, the popular prejudices prevailed against it, and ran in favour of tea. The contrary practice prevails on the continent, where beggars are viewed making their coffee in the street. I remember seeing the large body of shipwrights at Helvoetsluys, summoned by a bell to take their regular refreshment of coffee; and the fleets of Holland were not then built by arms less robust than the fleets of Britain.*

The frequenting of coffee-houses is a custom which has declined within our recollection, since institutions of a higher character, and society itself, has so much improved within late years. These were, however, the common assemblies of all classes of society. The mercantile man, the man of letters, and the man of fashion, had their appropriate coffee-houses. The Tatler dates from either to convey a character of his subject. In the reign of Charles II. 1675, a proclamation for some time shut them all up, having become the rendezvous of the politicians of that day. Roger North has given, in his examination, a full account of this bold stroke: it was not done without some apparent respect to the British constitution, the court affecting not to act against law, for the judges were summoned to a consultation, when, it seems, the five who met did not agree in opinion. But a decision was contrived that "the retailing of coffee and tea might be an innocent trade; but as it was said to nourish sedition, spread lies, and scandalize great men, it might also be a common nuisance." A general discontent in consequence, as North acknowledges, took place, and emboldened the merchants and retailers of coffee and tea to petition, and permission was soon granted to open the houses to a certain period, under a severe admonition that the masters should prevent all scandalous papers, books, and libels, from being read in them, and hinder every person from spreading scandalous reports against the government. It must be confessed, all this must have frequently puzzled the coffee-house master to decide what was scandalous, what book was fit to be licensed to be read, and what political intelligence might be allowed to be communicated. The object of the government was, probably to intimidate, rather than to persecute, at that moment.

Chocolate the Spaniards brought from Mexico, where it was denominated Chocoatliti; it was a coarse mixture of ground cacao and Indian corn with recau; but the Spaniards liking its nourishment, improved it into a richer compound, with sugar, vanilla, and other aromatics. The immoderate use of chocolate, in the 17th century, was considered as so violent an inflamer of the passions that Joan. Fran. Rauch, published a treatise against it, and enforced the necessity of forbidding the monks to drink it; and adds, that if such an interdiction had existed, that scandal with which that holy order had been branded might have proved more groundless. This Disputatio medico dietetica de aere et aculeantia, nonum de potu, Vienna, 1634, is a rare asie among the collectors. This attack on the monks as well as on Chocolate, is said to be the cause of its scarcity; for we are told that they were so diligent in suppressing this treatise, that it is supposed not a dozen copies exist. We had chocolate-houses in London long after coffee-houses; they seemed to have associated something more elegant and refined in their new terms than when the other had become common.—Roger North thus inveighs against them: "The use of coffee-houses seems much improved by a new invention, called chocolate houses, for the benefit of rooks and cullies of quality, where gaming is added to all the rest, and the summons of W— seldom fails; as if the devil had erected a new university, and those were the colleges of its professors, as well as his schools of discipline." Roger North, a high tory, and attorney-general to James the Second, observed, however, that these rendezvous were often not entirely composed of those "factions gentry he so much dreaded;" for he says, "This way of passing time might have been stopped at before people had possessed themselves of some convenience from them of meeting for short despatches, and passing evenings with small expenses." And old Aubrey, the small Boswell of his day, attributes his general acquaintance to the "modern advantage of coffee-houses in this great city, before which men knew not how to be acquainted, but with their relations and societies;" a curious statement, which proves the moral connexion with society of all sedentary recreations, which induce the herding spirit.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 9th to Tuesday the 15th of July.

FIELD-PATHS.

THE days are now (or ought to be) at their finest,—a little too hot sometimes, but there is seldom too much heat in an English summer, especially for healthy people or any genuine lovers of nature. It is true, we are all apt, occasionally, to complain of heat,—to say that it is "too hot"—"dreadfully hot," &c. &c. and make use of other unthinking and ungrateful phrases; which only means, if we would reflect a little, that we do not meet the hot weather as we ought, nor seek its proper alleviations, in reasonable exercise that strengthens us, and in the enjoyment of the freshest times of day out of doors, and natural shady places. When it is cold, we long for the sun; and when the sun comes, we long for the cold; forgetting that we may turn both to excellent account by preparing for them like proper masculine men, and womanly (that is to say, gentle and joy-making) women. Come then, let us take one of the most delightful of all walks,—that in a field, through the old field path,—with our eloquent friend Mr. Howitt. There is one of his stiles before us, in the next meadow yonder, on which we will sit awhile; and then we will vary our walk by the wood-side, along one of those rich receptacles of wild-flowers, bushes, and magnificent dock-leaves, contemptuously called ditches; where perhaps we shall have the pleasure of hearing a running-brook.

Field paths (says Mr. Howitt) are at this season particularly attractive. I love our real old English footpaths. I love those rustic and picturesque stiles opening their pleasant escapes from frequented places and dusty highways into the solitudes of nature. It is delightful to catch a glimpse of one on the old village green; under the old elder tree by some ancient cottage, or half-hidden by the overhanging boughs of a wood. I love to see the smooth, dry track, winding away in easy curves, along some green slope to the church-yard—to the forest-grange, or to the embowered cottage. It is to me an object of certain inspiration. It seems to invite me from noise and publicity into the heart of solitude, and of rural delight. It beckons the imagination on through green and whispering corn-fields, through the short but verdant pasture, the flowering mowing grass, the odorous and sunny hay-field; the festivity of harvest; from lonely farm to farm, from village to village, by clear and mossy wells; by tinkling brooks and deep wood skirted streams, to crofts where the daffodil is rejoicing in spring, or meadows where the blue geranium embellishes the summer way-side; to heaths with their warm elastic sward and crimson bells—the chattering of grass-hoppers,—the fox-glove, and the old gnarled oak; in short, to all the solitary haunts after which the city-peet lover of nature pants, "as the heart panteth after the water-brooks." What is there so truly English? What is so truly linked with our rural tastes, our sweetest memories and our sweetest poetry, as stiles and foot-paths? Goldsmith, Thomson, and Milton have adorned them with some of their richest wreaths. They have consecrated them to poetry and love. It is along the footpath in secluded fields, upon the stile in the embowered lane, where the wild rose and the honeysuckle are lavishing their beauty and their fragrance, that we delight to picture to ourselves rural lovers, breathing, in the dewy sweetness of summer evenings, vows still sweeter. There it is that the poet seated sends back his soul into the freshness of his youth, amongst attachments since withered by neglect,—rendered painful by absence or broken by death; amongst dreams and aspirations which, even now that they pronounce their own fallacy, are lovely. It is there that he gazes upon the gorgeous sunset—the evening star following with its silvery lamp the fading day, or the moon showering her pale lustre through the balmy night air—with a fancy that kindles and soars into the heavens before him; there that we have all felt the charm of woods and green fields, and solitary boughs waving in the golden sunshine, or darkening in the melancholy beauty of evening shadows. Who has not thought how beautiful was the sight of a village congregation, pouring out from their old grey church on a summer day, and streaming off through the quiet meadows, in all directions, to their homes? Or who that has visited Alpine scenery, has not beheld with a poetic feeling, the mountaineers come winding down out of their romantic seclusions on a sabbath morning, pacing the solitary heath-tracks, bounding with elastic step down the fern clad dells, or along the course of a riotous stream, as cheerful, as picturesque, and yet as solemn as the scenes around them?

Again I say, I love field paths and stiles of all sorts, ay, even the most accessible piece of rustic erection ever set up in defiance of age, laziness, and obesity. How many scenes of frolic and merry confusion have I seen at a clumsy stile! What exclamations! and blushes, and fine eventual vaulting on the part of the ladies! and what an opportunity does it afford to beaux of exhibiting a variety of gallant and delicate attentions! I consider a rude stile as anything but an impediment in the course of a rural courtship.

Those good old turnstiles too—can I ever forget them? the hours I have spun round upon them when a boy! or those in which I have almost laughed myself to death at the remembrance of my village pedagogue's disaster! Methinks I see him now!—the time a sultry day,—the domine a goodly person of some eighteen or twenty stone,—the scene a footpath sentinelled with turn-stiles, one of which held him fast as in amazement at his bulk. Never shall I forget his efforts and agonies to extricate himself; nor his lion-like roars, which brought some labourers to his assistance, who, when they had recovered from their convulsions of laughter, knocked off the top of the turn-stile, and let him go. It is long since I saw a stile of this construction, and I suspect the Falstaffs have cried them down. But without a jest, stiles and footpaths are vanishing every where. There is nothing upon which the advance of wealth and population has made so serious an inroad. As land has increased in value, wastes and heaths have been parcelled out and enclosed, but seldom have footpaths been left. The poet and the naturalist who before had, perhaps, the greatest real property in them, have had no allotment. They have been totally driven out of the promised land. Goldsmith complained in his day, that

The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage and hounds;
The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth,
Has robbed the neighbouring fields of half their growth:
His seat, where solitary sports are seen,
Indignant spurns the cottage from the green.

And it is but too true that the pressure of contiguous pride has driven further, from that day to this, the public from the rich man's lands. "They make a solitude and call it peace." Even the quiet and picturesque footpath that led across his fields, or stole along his woodside, giving to the poor man with his burden, a cooler and nearer cut to the village, is become a nuisance. One would have thought that the rustic labourer, with his scythe on his shoulder, or his bill-hook and hedging-mittens in his hand, the cottage dame in her black bonnet and scarlet cloak, the neat village maiden in the sweetness of health and simplicity, or the boy strolling along full of life and curiosity, might have had sufficient interest in themselves, for a cultivated taste not merely to tolerate but to welcome—passing occasionally at a distance across the park or wood, as objects agreeably enlivening the stately solitude of the hall. But they have not; and what is more, those are commonly the most jealous of pedestrian trespassers, who seldom visit their own estates, but permit the seasons to scatter their charms around their villas and rural possessions without the heart to enjoy, or even the presence to behold them. How often have I myself been arrested in some long frequented dale; in some spot endeared by its own beauties and the fascinations of memory, by a board exhibiting in giant characters, "STOPPED BY AN ORDER OF SESSIONS," and denouncing the terrors of the law upon trespassers! This is a little too much. I would not be querulous for the poor against the rich. I would not teach them to look with an envious and covetous eye upon their villas, lawns, cattle, and equipage; but when the path of immemorial usage is closed, when the little streak, almost as fine as a mathematical line, along the wealthy man's ample field is grudgingly erased, it is impossible not to feel indignation at the pitiful monopoly. Is there no village champion to be found bold enough to put in his protest against these encroachments,—to assert the public right?—for a right it is as authentic as that by which the land is held, and as clearly acknowledged by the laws. Is there no local "Hamptden with dauntless breast" to "withstand the petty tyrants of the field," and to save our good old foot-paths? If not, we shall in a few years be doomed to the highways and the hedges, to look, like Dives, from a sultry region of turnpikes, into a pleasant one of verdure and foliage which we may not approach. Already the stranger, if he lose his way, is in jeopardy of falling into the horrid fangs of a steel-trap; the botanist enters a wood to gather a flower, and is shot with a spring-gun; death haunts our dells and copses, and the poet complains, in regretful notes, that he

Wanders away to the field and the glen,
Far as he may for the gentlemen.

I am not so much of a poet, and so little of a political economist, as to lament over the progress of population. It is true, that I see with a poetical regret, green fields and fresh beautiful tracts swallowed up in cities; but my joy in the increase of human life and happiness, far outbalances that imaginative pain. But it is when I see unnecessary and arbitrary encroachments upon the rural privileges of the public, that I grieve. Exactly in the same proportion as our population and commercial habits gain upon us, do we need all possible opportunities to keep alive in us the spirit of nature.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers;
Little there is in nature that is ours.

We give ourselves up to the artificial habits and objects of ambition, till we endanger the higher and better feelings and capacities of our being; and it is alone to the united influence of religion, literature, and nature, that we must look for the preservation of our moral nobility. Whenever, therefore, I behold one of our old field-paths closed, I regard it as another link in the chain which Mammon is winding round us,—another avenue cut off, by which we might fly to the lofty sanctuary of nature, for power to withstand him.

BIRTH-DAYS.

July 9th (21st O. S.) in London according to some, at Wimborne, in Dorsetshire, according to others, Matthew Prior, son of a joiner,—one of the liveliest and airiest of the wit-poets of England, an excellent court panegyrist, but more acquainted with gallantry than love, and far inferior in sentiment and natural freshness to the leader of this race of authors, Sir John Suckling. He wrote, however, one truly loving verse, if no other. It is in his "Solomon." The monarch is speaking of a female slave, who had a real affection for him:—

And when I call'd another, Abra came.

July 10 (22d O. S.) At Exeter House, [in London, (on the site of the present Exeter Street)] Lord Shaftesbury, the philosopher. He was an honest man and politician, an elegant but fastidious writer, and could discern and forcibly expose the vulgar errors of a creed, though a little more philosophy was wanting to enable him to get at the heart of its mystery. In one of his letters is an extraordinary passage, not much calculated to delight the lady whom he married. He said he found marriage "not so much worse" than celibacy as he had expected!

Same day (1707) at Maestricht, in the Netherlands, son of a protestant clergyman of French origin, Peter Lyonnet the naturalist, eminent for resolving to obtain a reputation, and for obtaining it, by means of a work in some one single object of minute enquiry; for which purpose he selected a species of caterpillar. A German writer, Frederick Matthison, has left a notice of him in his Letters, translated by Miss Plumtre, which may not be uninteresting to the reader. The closing anecdote, however, about the rope-dancing is not so "great" a thing, as the writer seems to take it for. It was a waste of energy, upon a matter not worthy of emulation.

"My host (says Matthison, speaking of the celebrated Bonnet, with whom he was on a visit) continues to read his works to me every morning, and we have now entered upon his "Contemplation de la Nature." I read aloud, and when any passage occurs which he thinks wants explanation, he gives it with the clearness and precision which he so peculiarly possesses. We dwelt for a long time yesterday on the Phalena cossus, and on the work which Lyonnet has written on that animal, with which I now for the first time became acquainted. The history of the origin and progress of this work is very extraordinary. Lyonnet, who unites to the most ardent passion for natural history, uncommon perseverance, excessive thirst for fame, and profound observation, determined to strike into a path which should be perfectly new, and to produce a work single of its kind. He first thought of writing on the Aphis, then on the Polypus, but through an extraordinary caprice of chance, he found that in the former Bonnet would be his rival, in the latter Trembley. The question then, was to find another subject wherein so many difficulties should be combined, as effectually to preclude him from any danger of competition, and this point he gained by engaging in the dissection of the Phalena cossus. But on applying to different persons to undertake the designs for the plates, his expectations seemed so out of all bounds, that it was impossible to answer them, and every one shrunk back affrighted from the task. He therefore immediately applied himself to learn drawing, in which art he made, in a short time, such a rapid progress, that he was able to execute designs incredibly difficult with a delicacy and exactness astonishing to every one, both connoisseurs and practitioners. But now he was precisely in the same predicament with the engravers, as before with the draughtsmen; no one had sufficient confidence in his own abilities as to hope that he could satisfy him, and he was compelled, therefore, to learn this art also, in which he soon arrived at such perfection, that the engravings to his works are of a very distinguished excellence. Lyonnet's portrait is much more deserving of the inscription, "Man can do whatever he is resolved on," than the figure of that long forgotten Kraftmann in Lavater's Physiognomy.

"The following trait of Lyonnet, as it is quite appropriate, may serve further to illustrate the character of so great a man. A rope-dancer of the Hague, whose exquisite dexterity was the astonishment of the public, excited Lyonnet's emulation to such a degree that he exclaimed, "This man has no more muscle than myself, nor is formed after any other manner; I must therefore be able to do whatever he can!" Immediately he had a rope stretched in his court-yard, and applied himself with such unwearied assiduity to rope-dancing, that he at last left his astonished master very far behind."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXII.—HISTORY OF THE LATE MR. COMBE.

THOUGH a moment's reflection tells us that "Romances of Real Life," must be daily occurring round about us, yet we are hardly the less surprised to find them true, especially in those ranks of life where we are accustomed to expect the reasonableness and regularity that seem the natural consequences of an educated understanding. We are even, perhaps, for the latter reason, more astonished at eccentric departures from conventional life, and changes from gentility to vagabondism, than at the more tragical results of bad and violent passions, the wilfulness of which defies speculation, or throws us into general reflections on the mysteries of one's common nature; whereas there seems no reason, at first sight, why a man, bred up in the comfort and convenience of refined intercourse, should think it worth his while to depart from it, and play the part of a madman on so poor and unaccommodating a scale. A reason however there is. It is to be found (if it be not actual madness), in an over lively state of the blood, acting upon a strong egotism and a vivid though weak imagination,—one that has a quick sense of the novelty and sufficiency of the moment, at the expense of all the future moments of life. Persons of this temperament and turn of mind, unless they stop short while young, never end in any thing superior to cleverness; and it manifests an unusual portion of natural goodness in them, if they ever shew themselves capable of the industry and regular conduct of Mr. Combe, even in old age.

The present curious account of this gentleman, which could not have been better written, is given by Mr. Campbell in one of the notes to his Life of Mrs. Siddons. The narrative runs well to the last; and the surprise, at the close of it, is truly dramatic.

Mr. Combe's history (says Mr. Campbell) is not less remarkable for the recklessness of his early days, than, for the industry of his maturer age, and the late period of life at which he attracted popularity by his talents. He was the nephew of a Mr. Alexander, an Alderman of the city of London; and as he was sent, first to Eton College, and afterwards to Oxford, it may be inferred, that his parents were in good circumstances. His uncle left him sixteen thousand pounds. On the acquisition of this fortune, he entered himself of the Temple, and in due time was called to the bar. On one occasion he even distinguished himself before the Lord Chancellor Northington. But his ambition was to shine as a man of fashion, and he paid little attention to the law. Whilst at the Temple, his courtly dress, his handsome liveries, and it may be added, his tall stature and fine appearance, procured him the appellation of Duke Combe. Some of the most exclusive ladies of fashion had instituted a society which was called the Coterie, to which gentlemen were admitted as visitors. Among this favoured number was the Duke Combe. One evening Lady Archer, who was a beautiful woman, but too fond of gaudy colours, and who had her face always lavishly rouged, was sitting in the Coterie, when Lord Lyttleton, the graceless son of an estimable peer, entered the room evidently intoxicated, and stood before Lady Archer for several minutes with his eyes fixed on her. The lady manifested great indignation, and asked why he thus annoyed her. "I have been thinking," said Lord Lyttleton, "what I can compare you to, in your gaudy colouring, and you give me no idea, but that of a drunken peacock." The lady returned a sharp answer, on which he threw the contents of a glass of wine in her face. All was confusion in a moment; but though several noblemen and gentlemen were present, none of them took up the cause of the insulted female till Mr. Combe came forward, and, by his resolute behaviour, obliged the offender to withdraw. His spirited conduct on this occasion, gained him much credit among the circles of fashion; but his grace's diminishing finances ere long put an end to the fashionableness of his acquaintance. He paid all the penalties of a spendthrift, and was steeped in poverty to the very lips. At one time he was driven for a morsel of bread to enlist as a private in the British army; and, at another time, in a similar exigency he went into the French service. From a more cogent motive than piety, he afterwards entered into a French monastery, and lived there till the term of his noviciate expired. He returned to Britain, and took service wherever he could get it; but in all these dips into low life, he was never in the least embarrassed when he met with any of his old acquaintance. A wealthy divine who had known him in the best London society, recognized him when a waiter at Swansea, actually tripping about with the napkin under his arm, and staring at him, exclaimed, "You cannot be Combe?" "Yes, indeed, but I am," was the waiter's answer. He married the mistress of a noble lord, who promised him an annuity with her, but cheated him; and in revenge he wrote a spirited satire, entitled "The Diaboliad." Among its subjects were an Irish peer and his eldest son, who had a quarrel that extinguished any little natural affection that might have ever subsisted between them. The father challenged the son to fight; the son refused to go out with him, not, as he expressly stated, because the challenger was his own father, but because he was not a gentleman.

* "Kraftmann," from having been a term much in use in Germany as an epithet of distinction, is now become a mere cant phrase, and chiefly applied to an author who affects any peculiarity of expression, particularly the use of very high sounding words; or who makes a great boast of his superior attainments, and having as he thinks, thrown off all prejudices.—The Traveller.

After his first wife's death, Mr. Combe made a more creditable marriage with a sister of Mr. Cosway, the artist, and much of the distress which his imprudence entailed upon him was mitigated by the assiduity of this amiable woman. For many years he subsisted by writing for the booksellers, with a reputation that might be known to many individuals, but that certainly was not public. He wrote a work which was generally ascribed to the good Lord Lyttleton, entitled "Letters from a Nobleman to his Son," and "Letters from an Italian Nun to an English Nobleman," that professed to be translated from Rousseau. He published also several political tracts, that were trashy, time-serving and scurrilous. Pecuniary difficulties brought him to a permanent residence in the King's Bench, where he continued for about twenty years, and for the latter part of them a voluntary inmate. One of his friends offered to effect a compromise with his creditors, but he refused the favour. "If I compounded with my creditors," said Mr. Combe, "I should be obliged to sacrifice the little substance which I possess, and on which I subsist in prison. These chambers, the best in the Bench, are mine at the rent of a few shillings a week, in right of my seniority as a prisoner. My habits are become so sedentary, that if I lived in the airiest Square of London, I should not walk round it once in a month. I am contented in my cheap quarters."

When he was near the age of seventy, he had some literary dealings with Mr. Ackermann, the bookseller. The late caricaturist, Rowlandson, had offered to Mr. Ackermann a number of drawings representing an old clergyman and school-master, who felt, or fancied himself, in love with the fine arts, quixotically travelling during his holidays in search of the picturesque. As the drawings needed the explanation of letter-press, Mr. Ackermann declined to purchase them unless he should find some one who could give them a poetical illustration. He carried one or two of them to Mr. Combe, who undertook the subject. The bookseller, knowing his procrastinating temper, left him but one drawing at a time, which he illustrated in verse, without knowing the subject of the drawing that was next to come. The popularity of the "Adventures of Dr. Syntax," induced Mr. Ackermann afterwards to employ him in two successful publications, "The Dance of Life," and "The Dance of Death," in England, which were also accompanied by Rowlandson's designs.

It was almost half a century before the appearance of these works, that Mr. Combe so narrowly missed the honour of being Mrs. Siddons's reading-master. He had exchanged the gaieties of London for quarters at a tap-room in Wolverhampton, where he was billeted as a soldier in the service of his Britannic Majesty. He had a bad foot at the time, and was limping painfully along the high street of the town, when he was met by an acquaintance who had known him in all his fashionable glory. This individual had himself seen better days, having exchanged a sub-lieutenancy of marines for a strollership in Mr. Kemble's company. "Heavens!" said the astonished hystriion; "is it possible, Combe, that you can bear this condition?" "Fiddlesticks!" answered the ex-duke, taking a pinch of snuff, "a philosopher can bear anything." The player ere long introduced him to Mr. Roger Kemble; but, by this time, Mr. Combe had become known in the place through his conversational talents. A gentleman passing through the public-house had observed him reading, and looking over his shoulder, saw, with surprise, a copy of Horace. "What!" said he, "my friend, can you read that book in the original?" "If I cannot," replied Combe, "a great deal of money has been thrown away on my education." His landlord soon found the literary red-coat an attractive ornament to his tap-room, which was filled every night with the wondering auditors of the learned soldier. They treated him to gratuitous potations, and clubbed their money to procure his discharge. Roger Kemble gave him a benefit night at the theatre, and Combe promised to speak an address on the occasion. In this address, he noticed the various conjectures that had been circulated respecting his real name and character; and after concluding the enumeration, he said, "Now, ladies and gentlemen, I shall tell you what I am." While expect-tation was all agog, he added, "I am—ladies and gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant." He then bowed, and left the stage.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

MONTAIGNE.

His Account of an Accident which befell him.

We propose in future, from time to time, to give extracts under the above head, from authors of the greatest celebrity or delightfulness;—those who have advanced the world by their wisdom, or cheered it in its advancement by their wit and good qualities. We take them at random, as time and circumstances render it convenient; and for obvious reasons, we make no apology for commencing with a passage from a translation; especially as the translation (Cotton's) is a most excellent one, tasting of all the raciness of the old French, and of its alovenly and ultra gossiping handling too, when required; as in part of the extract before us. Montaigne is a universalist, a man for all ages and nations. Some of our readers may be pleased to be informed, that he was a Frenchman of a noble family, living in the time of the Civil Wars under Charles the Ninth, and not altogether above the prejudices of his breeding; but far superior to the worst prejudices, not only of his own time but succeeding ones,—a genial, original, and candid thinker, who has been accused of egotism, because he could not help being alive to the nature working within himself as well as other men, but whose philosophy was full of consideration for all, and has helped to advance the world. Montaigne may be regarded as the Father of Modern Essay Writing,—the predecessor and superior of the Temples, Addisons, and Steeles, (extraordinary men as they were), just as Chaucer was of the majority of poets that followed him.

The present extract is a remarkable evidence of the habit which the gallant French philosopher had acquired, of reflecting upon every thing that came within his observation. He gets horribly knocked and bruised, within an inch of his life, is thrown into a swoon, and undergoes all the agonizing process of a recovery; and all this he notes down, as it were, in the faint light, the torn and battered tablets of his memory, during the operation; drawing these forth afterwards for the benefit of the reflecting. If you had met such a man in the streets, being carried along on a shutter, he would have been providing, as well as he was able, for your instruction and entertainment! This is philosophy surely.

"In the time of our third or second troubles, (I do not well remember which) going one day abroad to take the air, about a league from my own house, which is seated in the very centre of all the bustle and mischief of the late Civil Wars of France, thinking myself in all security, and so near to my retreat that I stood in need of no better equipage, I had taken a horse that went very easy upon his pace, but was not very strong. Being upon my return home, a sudden occasion falling out to make use of this horse in a kind of service that he was not acquainted with, one of my train, a lusty fellow, mounted upon a strong German horse that had a very ill mouth, but was otherwise vigorous and unfoiled, to play the Bravo, and appear a better man than his fellows, comes thundering full speed in the very track where I was, rushing like a colossus upon the little man and the little horse, with such a career of strength and weight, that he turned us both over and over topsie turvie, with our heels in the air. So that there lay the horse overthrown and stunned with the fall, and I ten or twelve paces from him stretched out at length, with my face all battered and broken, my sword, which I had in my hand, above ten paces beyond that, and my belt broke all to pieces, without motion or sense any more than a stock. 'Twas the only swoon I was ever in till this hour in my life. Those who were with me, after having used all the means they could to bring me to myself, concluding me dead, took me up in their arms, and carried me with very much difficulty home to my house, which was about half a French league from thence. Having been by the way, and two long hours after, given over for a dead man, I began to move and to fetch my breath; for so great an abundance of blood was fallen into my stomach that Nature had need to rouse her forces to discharge it. They then raised me upon my feet, when I threw off a great quantity of pure florid blood, as I had also done several times by the way, which gave me so much ease that I began to recover a little, but so leisurely and by so small advances, that my first sentiments were much nearer the approaches of death than life.

Perche dubbiosa anchor del suo ritorno,
Non s'assicura attonita la mente.

Tasso. Canto 12.

Because her soul her mansion half had quit,
And was not sure she was returned to it.

The remembrance of this accident, which is very well imprinted on my memory, so materially representing to me the image and idea of death, has in some sort reconciled me to that untoward accident. When I first began to open my eyes after my trance, it was with so perplexed, so weak and dead a sight, that I could yet distinguish nothing, and could only discern the light,

— Come quel ch'or apre, o chiude

Gli occhi, mezzo tra'l sonno, e l'esser desto.

Tasso. Canto 8

As people in the morning, when they rise
'Twixt sleep and wake, open and shut their eyes.

As to the functions of the soul, they advanced with the same pace and measure as those of the body. I saw myself all bloody, my doublet being stained and spotted all over with the blood I had vomited, and the first thought that came into my mind was that I had a harquebuse shot into my head; and indeed at the same time there were a great many fired round about us. Methought my life had just hung upon my lips, and I shut my eyes, to help, methought, to thrust it out; and took a pleasure in languishing and letting myself go. It was an imagination that only superficially floated upon my soul, as tender and weak as all the rest, but really not only exempt from pain, but mixed with that sweetness and pleasure which people are sensible of, when they indulge themselves to drop into a slumber. I believe it is the very same condition those people are in, whom we see to swoon with weakness in the agony of death, and am of opinion that we lament them without cause, supposing them agitated with grievous dolours, or that their souls suffer under painful thoughts. It has ever been my belief, contrary to the opinion of many, and particularly of Stephen Boetius, that those whom we see so subdued and stupified at the approaches of their end, or deprest with the length of the disease, or by accident of an apoplexy, or falling sickness,

—(Vi morbi scepe coactus

Ante oculos aliquis nostros ut fulminis ictu
Concidit, et spumas agit, ingemit et tremat artus,
Desipit, extantat nervos, torquetur, anhelat
Inconstanter, et in jactando membra fatigat)

Lucretius. Book 3.

(By the disease compelled, so we see some
As they were thunder-struck, fall, groan, and foam,
Tremble, stretch, writhe, breathe short, until at length
In various strugglings they tire out their strength.)

Or hurt in the head whom we hear to mutter, and by fits to utter grievous groans, though we gather from thence some sign by which it seems as if they had some remains of sense and knowledge,—I have always believed I say both the body and the soul benumbed, and asleep;

Vivit, et est vitæ nascius ipse suus.

Ovid. Tristia. Book i., Elag. 3.

He lives, but does not know
That he does so:

and could not believe that in so great a stupefaction of the members, and so great a defection of the senses, the soul could maintain any force within to take cognizance of herself, or look into her own condition, and that therefore they had no tormenting reflections, to make them consider and be sensible of the misery of their condition, and consequently were not much to be lamented. I can for my part think of no estate so insupportable and dreadful as to have the soul spritely and afflicted, without means to declare itself: as one should say of such who are sent to execution with their tongues first cut out: were it not that in this kind of dying, the most silent seems to be the most graceful, if accompanied with a grave and constanced countenance; or of those miserable prisoners who fall into the hands of the base bloody soldiers of this age, by whom they are tormented with all sorts of inhuman usage, to compel them to some excessive and impossible ransom, kept in the meantime in such condition and place, where they have no means of expressing, or signifying their mind and misery, to such as they may expect should relieve them. The poets have feigned some gods, who favour the deliverance of such as suffer under a languishing death.

Hunc ego Diti

Sacrum justa fero, teque isto corpore solvo.

Virgil. Book iii.

I, by command, offer to Pluto this,
And from that body do the soul dismiss.

Both the interrupted words and the short and irregular answers one gets from them sometimes, by bawling and keeping a clutter about them, or the motions which seem to yield some consent to what we would have them do, are no testimony nevertheless that they live an entire life at least. So it happens that in the yawning of sleep, before it has fully possessed us, as to perceive, as in a dream, what is done about us, and to follow, the last things are said with a perplexed and uncertain bearing, which seem but to touch upon the borders of the soul, and make answers to the last words have been spoken to us, which have more in them of fortune than of sense. Now, seeing I have effectually tried it, I make no doubt I have hitherto made a right judgment. For, first, being in a swoon, I laboured with both hands to rip open the buttons of my doublet, (for I was without arms,) and yet I felt nothing in my imagination that hurt me; for we have many notions in us, that do not proceed from our direct: n

Semianimes que misent digiti, serrum que retractant.
And half dead fingers grope about, and feel
To grasp again the late abandoned steel.

So falling people extend their arms before them by a natural impulse, which prompts them to offices and motions, without any commission from us.

Falciferos memorant currus abecondere membra,
Ut tremere in terra videatur artubus, id quod
Decidit abscissum, cum mens tamen atque hominis via Mobilitate mali non quid sentire dolorem.

How limbs scythe-bearing chariots lopt (they tell,
Would move and tremble on the ground they fell,
When he himself from whom the limb was ta'en,
Could by the swiftness feel no kind of pain.*

My stomach was so oppressed with the coagulated blood, that my hands moved to that part, of their own voluntary motion, as they frequently do to the part that itches, without being directed by our will. There are several animals and even men in whom one may perceive the muscles to stir and tremble after they are dead. New these passions which only touch the outward bark of us, as a man may say, cannot be said to be ours. To make them so, there must be a concurrence of the whole man; and the pains which are felt by the hand or foot while we are sleeping, are none of ours. As I drew near my own house, where the alarm of my fall was already got before me, and my family were come out to meet me, with the hubbub usual in such cases, I did not only make some little answer to some questions that were asked me, but they moreover tell me that I had so much sense, as to order that a horse I saw trip and falter in the way, which is mountainous and uneasy, should be given to my wife. This consideration should seem to proceed from a soul, that retained its functions, but it was nothing so with me. I knew not what I said or did, and they were nothing but idle thoughts in the clouds, that were stirred up by the senses of the eyes and ears, and proceeded not from me. I knew not, for all that, or whence I came, or whither I went, neither was I capable to weigh and consider what was said to me. These were light effects, that the senses produced of themselves, as of custom; what the soul contributed was in a dream, as being lightly touched, licked and bedewed by the soft impression of the senses. Notwithstanding, my condition was, in truth, very easy and quiet. I had no afflictions upon me, either for others or myself. It was an extreme drooping and weakness, without any manner of pain. I saw my own house, but knew it not. When they had put me to bed, I found an inexpressible sweetness in that repose; for I had been damnably tugged and lagged by those poor people who had taken the pains to carry me upon their arms a very great and a very ill way, and had in so doing all quite tired out themselves, twice or thrice, one after another. They offered me several remedies, but I would take none, certainly believing that I was mortally wounded in the head: and, in earnest, it had been a very happy death, for the weakness of my understanding deprived me of the faculty of discerning, and that of my body from the sense of feeling. I suffered myself to glide away so sweetly, and after so soft and easy a manner, that I scarce find any other action less troublesome than that was. But when I came again to myself, and to re-assume my faculties,

Ut tandem sensus convalescere mel,
As my lost senses did to me return, which was two or three hours after, I felt myself on a sudden involved in terrible pain, having my limbs shattered and ground to pieces with my fall, and was so exceedingly ill two or three nights after, that I thought once more to die again, but a more painful death, having concluded myself as good as dead before, and to this hour am sensible of the bruises of that terrible shock. I will not here omit, that the last thing I could make them beat into my head, was the memory of this accident, and made it be over and over again repeated to me whither I was going, from whence I came, and at what time of the day this mischance befell me, before I could comprehend it. As to the manner of my fall, that was concealed from me in favour to him who had been the occasion, and other flim-flams were invented to palliate the truth. But a long time after, and the very next day that my memory began to return and to represent to me the state wherein I was, at the instant I perceived this horse coming full drive upon me (for I had seen him come thundering at my heels, and gave myself for gone: but this thought had been so sudden that fear had no leisure to introduce itself), it seemed to be like a flash of lightning that had pierced through my soul, and that I came from the other world.

This long story, of so light an accident, would appear vain enough, were it not for the knowledge I have gained by it for my own use; for I do really find, that to be acquainted with death, is no more but nearly to approach it. Every one, as Pliny says, is a good doctor to himself, provided he be capable of discovering himself near at hand. This is not my doctrine; 'tis my study; and is not the lesson of another, but my own, and yet if I communicate it, it ought not to be ill taken. That which is of use to me, may also peradventure be useful to another.

These translations of the verses, admirable for the most part, are by Charles Cotton.

MRS. SIDDONS.

Passages from the Life of her by Mr. Campbell, (Just Published).*

A life of Mrs. Siddons by Mr. Campbell the poet cannot but strongly excite the curiosity of the public. With the exception of one critical quotation, we have read it through, with an interest proportionate to the eminence of the parties; and if we occasionally differ with the author in his conclusions, and regret to see that he has condescended to the affectation of saying "the Siddons" and "the Kemble," or forgotten his goodnature in giving a contemptuous epithet to young Betty, who, since he came to man's estate, is understood to estimate his former popularity with singular modesty and good sense, we never forget that a man of genius is writing to us, nor fail to recognise, amidst occasional stiffness and elaboration, those touches of fine poetic feeling, and especially those felicitous similes, for which Mr. Campbell's criticisms are always remarkable. Long and familiarly intimate however as the poet was with Mrs. Siddons, and ready as we are to believe all the good things he says of her heart, he has not succeeded in disengaging us of a notion (produced perhaps by our having known her only on the stage, and during the latter part of her career), that she was a person more admirable than charming, and not even so perfectly admirable on the stage, as the prevalence of an artificial style of acting in her time induced her worshippers to suppose. She was doubtless a grand and effective actress, never at a loss, and equal to any demands of the loftier parts of passion; but her grandeur always appeared to us rather of the queen-like and conventional order, than of the unaffectedly heroic. There was, we doubt not, really a lofty spirit in it, but a spirit not too lofty to take stage-dignity for the top of its mark. Mrs. Siddons, it is to be observed, was born and bred up in the profession, one of a family of actors, and the daughter of a mother of austere manners. Mr. Campbell somewhat quaintly calls her "the Great Woman;" but we know not in what respect she was particularly great as to womanhood. Surely it was queen-hood, not womanhood, that was her forte,—professional greatness, and not that aggregation of gentle and generous qualities, that union of the sexually charming and the dutifully noble, which makes up the idea of perfection in the woman. Great women belong to history and to self-sacrifice, not to the mere annals of a stage, however dignified. Godiva gives us the idea a great woman. So does Edward the First's Queen, who sucked the poison out of his arm. So does Abelard's Eloise, loving with all her sex's fondness as long as she could, and able for another's sake, to renounce the pleasures of love for the worship of the sentiment, and for the cultivation of literature and exalted thoughts. We can suppose Pasta, with her fine simple manner and genial person, the representative of a great woman. The greatness is relative to the womanhood. It only partakes that of the man, inasmuch as it carries to its height what is gentle and enduring in both sexes. The moment we recognize any thing of what is understood by the word masculine in a woman, (not in the circumstances into which she is thrown, but in herself or aspect) her greatness, in point of womanhood, is impaired. She should hereafter, as Macbeth says, "bring forth men-children only." Mrs. Siddons's extraordinary theory about Lady Macbeth (that she was a fragile little being, very feminine to look at) we take to have been an instinct to this effect, repellent of the association of ideas which people would form betwixt her and her personation of the character.

Mrs. Siddons's refinement was not on a par with her loftiness. We remember in the famous sleeping-scene in Macbeth, when she washed her hand and could not get the blood off, she made "a face" in passing them under her nose, as if she perceived a foul scent. We venture to think that she should have shuddered and looked in despair, as recognizing the stain on her soul.

But doubtless she was an extraordinary actress and an estimable woman. Mr. Campbell has exalted her in our opinion in the latter respect, and will put an end to some foolish and insidious mistakes circulated by her enemies, if any such persons remain. We are glad also to see the character of her husband set right; who with that readiness to think ill, so illustrative of the secret characters of those who indulge in it, was represented as living apart from his wife (when he did so) for any other reason than the true one; which turns out to have been a mere matter of necessity to both parties,—to himself, because of a rheumatism with which he was afflicted, and which forced him to live at Bath for the benefit of the waters, while Mrs. Siddons, for obvious reasons, was obliged to remain in town. They saw each other when they could, and were affectionate and content. Would it have been better that they should have been more sick and less happy? We quote with pleasure below some verses addressed by Mr. Siddons to his wife, at the very period of his going to sojourn at Bath; an evidence of the real state of the case, which Mr. Campbell justly adduces as throwing ridicule on the false reports of it. We think he might have added a good word in favour of the verses themselves, which are very agreeable, especially the last stanza; and we are surprised that he could find nothing better to say for the verses by Mrs. Siddons, than to give them a specimen of her "moderate talent for versification." We think them highly creditable to her, and even affecting. There is more "womanhood" in the last stanza, than in the greatness of her acting.

But we are keeping the reader from the book. We must add, that Mrs. Siddons appears to have been a good letter-writer, of a certain class; and to have studied composition more than is common in her profession, or than any body supposed.

Mrs. Siddons's Recollections of Dr. Johnson.

"I do not exactly remember the time that I was favoured with an invitation from Dr. Johnson, but I think it was during the first year of my celebrity. The Doctor was then a wretched invalid, and had requested my friend Mr. Windham to persuade me to favour him by drinking tea with him in Bolt Court.

The Doctor spoke highly of Garrick's various powers of acting. When Mr. Windham and myself were discussing some point respecting Garrick, he said, 'Madam, do not trouble yourself to convince Windham, he is the very bull-dog of argument, and will not loose his hold.' Dr. Johnson's favourite female character in Shakspeare, was Catherine in "Henry VIII." He was most desirous of seeing me in that play, but said, 'I am too deaf and too blind to see or hear at a greater distance than the stage-box, and have little taste for making myself a public gaze in so distinguished a situation.' I assured him that nothing would gratify me so much as to have him for an auditor, and that I could procure for him an easy chair at the stage-door, where he could both see and hear, and be perfectly concealed. He appeared greatly pleased with this arrangement, but unhappily for me, did not live to fulfil our mutual wishes. Some weeks before he died, I made him some morning visits. He was extremely, though formally, polite; always apologized for being unable to attend me to my carriage, conducted me to the head of the stairs, kissed my hand, and bowing, said, 'Dear Madam, I am your most humble servant;' and these words were always repeated without the smallest variation."

Reservation of Scottish Praise.

How much more pleasantly (says Mr. Campbell,) people tell their history in social converse than in formal writing. I remember Mrs. Siddons describing to me the same scene of her probation upon the Edinburgh boards with no small humour. The grave attention of my Scottish countrymen, and their canny reservation of praise till they were sure she deserved it, she said, had well nigh worn out her patience. She had been used to speak to animated clay, but she now felt as if she had been speaking to stones. Successive flashes of her elocution that had always been sure to electrify the South, fell in vain on those Northern flints. At last, as I well remember, she told me she coiled up her powers to the most emphatic possible utterance of one passage, having previously vowed in her heart, that, if this could not touch the Scotch, she would never again cross the Tweed. When it was finished, she paused, and looked to the audience. The deep silence was broken only by a single voice, exclaiming, "That's no bad." This ludicrous parsimony of praise convulsed the Edinburgh audience with laughter. But the laugh was followed by such thunders of applause, that, amidst her stunned and nervous agitation, she was not without fears of the galleries coming down.

VERSES BY MR. SIDDONS ON HIS WIFE'S COTTAGE AT WESTBOURNE.

Would you I'd Westbourn Farm describe,
I'd do it then, and free from gall,
For sure it would be sin to gibe
A thing so pretty and so small.
The poplar-walk, if you have strength,
Will take a minute's time to step it;
Nay, certes, 'tis of such a length,
'T would almost tire a frog to leap it.
But when the pleasure ground is seen,
Then what a burst comes on the view;
Its level walk, its shaven green,
For which a razor's stroke would do.

Now pray be cautious when you enter,
And curb your strides from much expansion;
Three paces take you to the centre,
Three more, you're close against the mansion.
The mansion, cottage, house, or hut,
Call't what you will, has room within
To lodge the king of Lilliput,
But not his court, nor yet his usen.
The kitchen-garden, true to keeping,
Has length, and breadth, and width so plenty,
A snail, if fairly set a creeping,
Could scarce go round while you told twenty.
Perhaps you'll cry on hearing this,
What! everything so very small?
No, she that made it what it is,
Has greatness, that makes up for all

— LINES BY MRS. SIDDONS.

Say, what's the brightest wreath of fame,
But canker'd buds, that opening close;
Ah! what the world's most pleasing dream,
But broken fragments of repose?
Lead me where peace with steady hand
The mingled cup of life shall hold,
Where Time shall smoothly pour his sand,
And Wisdom turn that sand to gold.
Then haptly at religion's shrine
This weary heart its load shall lay,
Each wish my fatal love resign,
And passion melt in tears away.

Stage Habit.—Grandiosity of Manner.

"From intense devotion to her profession, Mrs. Siddons derived a peculiarity of manner, of which I have the fullest belief she was not in the least conscious, unless reminded of it; I mean the habit of attaching dramatic tones and emphasis to common-place colloquial subjects. She went, for instance, one day, into a shop at Bath, and after bargaining for some calico, and hearing the mercer pour forth an hundred commendations of the cloth, she put the question to him, 'But will it wash?' in a manner so electrifying as to make the poor shopman start back from his counter. I once told her this anecdote about herself, and she laughed at it heartily, saying, 'Witness truth, I never meant to be tragical.' This singularity made her manner susceptible of caricature. I know not what others felt, but I own that I loved her all the better for this unconscious solemnity of manner; for, independently of its being blended with habitual kindness to her friends, and giving, odd as it may seem, a zest to the humour of her familiar conversation, it always struck me as a token of her simplicity. In point of fact, a manner in itself artificial, sprung out of the naïveté of her character."

We need not bear testimony to the observation of nature, in which this last remark of the biographer is founded. And we have no doubt there is truth in the application of it to his heroine. But nature and art were so mixed up in her by the circumstances of her early life, that it is impossible to say how much of one or the other was more essentially her own. Perhaps, after all, the best and most extraordinary thing to be said of her, is that she left the impression she has upon the mind of an intimate acquaintance like Mr. Campbell.

CRICKET AND A FÊTE CHAMPÊTRE

BY MR. NYREN.

We have much pleasure in laying before our readers the following brief, but genuine record, of an entertainment after a cricket-match, with which we have been favoured by our old, or rather ever-young friend, Mr. Nyren, the "Cricketer's Tutor." He calls it a "rough sketch," and modestly hints that we may re-cast it. We should as soon think of altering his cricket-bat. There is a right handling in it, and relishing hits. We need not point out to the reader the regard which our veteran cricketer naturally retains for the ladies; nor his pleasant vindication of himself from the charge of being "seventy." As to the close of his fourth paragraph, where he speaks of the descending of the dews, Burns himself might have written it. The mixture of warmth and coolness was never more happily touched; nor the fair picture, better intimated, under the darkening contrast of the twilight. This is the way that cricketers write,—O ye describers who grow sickly in doors! They feel substance and spirit at once, the body of beauty, and the breath of heaven.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

Bromley, Middlesex, June 26.

MY DEAR SIR,

The wise men of the East invited me to stand umpire at a Cricket-match,—the married men against the bachelors. The day was highly interesting, and I cannot forbear giving you a short account of it. If you can take any thing from the description I give you for your paper, do it in any way you like; this will be only a rough sketch. I call these gentlemen "the wise men of the East," as they will not suffer their names in print, and they live at the East-end of London.

When we arrived at the place of our destination, I was both surprised and delighted at the beautiful scene which lay before me. Several elegant tents, gracefully decked out with flags and festoons of flowers, had been fitted up for the convenience of the ladies; and many of these, very many, were elegant and beautiful women. I am not seventy; and — "the power of beauty I remember yet."

(I am only sixty-eight!) Seats were placed beneath the wide spreading oaks, so as to form groups in the shade. Beyond these, were targets for ladies who love archery, the cricket-ground in front.

The carriages poured in rapidly, and each party as they entered the ground, was received with loud cheers by such of their friends as had arrived before them. At this time a band of music entered the ground, and I could perceive the ladies feathers gracefully waving to the music, and quite ready for dancing. However, the band gave us that fine old tune, The roast beef of old England.

We entered a large booth, which accommodated all our party, and a hundred and thirty sat down to the déjeûné. Our chairman was Young, but old in experience. Many excellent speeches were made; and ever and anon, the whole place rang with applause. After this the dancing commenced, quadrilles, gallopade, &c. &c. It was, without exception, the most splendid sight that I ever witnessed, and reminded me far more of the descriptions we read of fairy-land, than of any scene in real life. The dancing was kept up with great spirit, till the dew of heaven softly descended on the bosoms of our fair countrywomen.

Not a single unfortunate occurrence happened to damp the pleasure of this delightful party. Had you been with us, you would have sung "Oh, the pleasures of the plains," &c. &c. How is it, that we have so few of these parties? Can any party in a house compare with it? God bless you and yours,

JOHN NYREN.

P.S. The cricket match was well contested, the Bachelors winning by three runs only.

* * The married men might be content to endure so honourable a defeat, especially if their wives were among these ladies, ready at hand to take pity on them. Bachelors must have some advantages, to make themselves amends. The line of verse from Dryden is quoted with singular appositeness, the poet, when he wrote it, having been just of the same age with the cricketer; that is to say, in number of years. The quality of them he would have been but too happy to exchange for those of the man of action.

But these parties out doors—"Can any parties in a house compare with them?" says Mr. Nyren. None, say we;—unless it be a bridal party, made out of the same kind of people; and even then, the rooms would be better if they could be had out in the fields and woods,—Nature's own apartments,—such as we see in Chaucer's "Flower and the Leaf," or in the pictures of Boccaccio and Stothard. It is a melancholy thing to say for England, with her beautiful country, that we have not even a word to express an entertainment amidst scenery out of doors, but must recur for one to the French,—Fête Champêtre; that is to say, a festival in the fields, or the country,—a rural entertainment. "Rural Entertainment" would sound affected in English!—But we shall grow wiser as real "knowledge of the world" extends, and when it is no longer confined to the signification of above a nine-hundredth million part of it.

"The world!"—The man of fashion means St. James's by it; the mere man of trade means the Exchange, and a good prudent mistrust. But cricketers, and men of sense and imagination, who use all the eyes and faculties God has given them, mean his beautiful planet, gorgeous with sunset, lovely with green fields, magnificent with mountains,—a great rolling energy, full of health, love, and hope, and fortitude, and endeavour. Compare this world with the others,—no better than a billiard ball, or a musty plum.

THE MEETING OF JACOB AND JOSEPH.

When Israel's car on Egypt's plain,
Drew up before the cloud of sand
That eddied round the rapid train
Of Joseph, close at hand;

And when the Venerable stopt,
Down to the earth—and at his feet,
The Great, the Found, the Injured, wept,
And hundreds saw them meet;

And when the guilty with that throng,
Worse than the meanest, bow'd by fears,
And hard in thought of their old wrong,
Stood tearless mid all tears;

Then thro' the Patriarch's mind was showered
His long long path of sorrow trod,
The sense of weakness overpowered,
The wondrous ways of God!

Rachel gone down to dust forlorn—
Rachel, in youth and beauty beaming—
The dreams, the dreams! received with scorn,
The pageant round him streaming;

The coat, sole vestige of his son;
The stains, and he had kiss'd them dim;
The web of falsehood round him spun,
And Joseph holding him!

And prophecy, long almost held
A nursery tale, and faith half fled,
From their deep night of doubt dispell'd,
Awakening from the dead!

"Now might I die!" the Patriarch prays,
As all the seer resumes its reign;
"For I have lived on thee to gaze—
Have touch'd my son again!"

TABLE-TALK.

Frabricius Serbellone, a disgrace to the military profession, was patronized and employed against the Protestants of Avignon and Orange, by Pope Pius the Fourth, and that unfeeling Emperor, Charles the Fifth. This infamous Satellite of the Vatican blots the present page only for the purpose of recording an execrable refinement of cruelty, united with religious rancour, worthy the monster who employed him, and highly gratifying to his own brutality of manners and thirst for blood. Having, as he imagined, exhausted his invention in search of new modes of torture, by suspending in chimnies, impaling, and roasting by slow fires the unfortunate wretches who fell into his hands, and by other means too shocking and too indecent to recite, at the instigation of Satan or his prime ministers, at St. Peter's and Vienna, he procured a number of Geneva bibles, and folding the leaves into long and narrow slips, he larded with them the bodies and limbs of his miserable victims, previous to his committing them to the flames. Adding insult to injury, he told them, in the agonies of death, "That he knew it was an edition of the bible they were attached to, and he was determined they should have enough of it." Such have been the enormities of those who fancied they were doing God service, and fulfilling their duty, under a gospel which preaches love and good will towards men.—Lounger's Common-Place Book.

A German Apologue.—An archbishop and his nephew were taking an evening's walk together, when they fell into a dispute about the spots in the moon. "I see a shepherdess sitting under a tree very clearly," said the young man. "I can distinguish the tower of a cathedral church," said the uncle.

Affecting and Blessed Epitaph.—In the cathedral at Vienne in France, a venerable Gothic structure, on the united tomb of two friends, are inscribed the words

MENS UNA, CINITUS UNUS.
One mind, one dust.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Errors of Education" and the letter of a "Happy Mother" on the question of Flogging at Public Schools, do credit to the feelings of the respective writers; but the subjects are not handled in a way to suit the plan of our Journal.

We shall be glad to hear from UN LECTEUR QUI A SOIR; though we fear we cannot vary our plan so as to meet his wishes.

RUSTICUS and A PART OF THE MANY shall have due attention.

Our friend HOMO may make himself easy, we think, upon the subject of his letter, considering he did his duty so long and strenuously. He set a good example in one respect; he may now fairly set it in another. If all men were to do as much, the world would soon be in excellent condition.

We have not time to go into the subject mentioned by TAU, ourselves; but we shall be ready, as we ever have been, to do it any service by the way, and to insert any information upon it communicated by others.

EDITOR'S opinion of verse-making as a pastime, and a resource against less innocent supports, is excellent; but he must cultivate his ear more, in order to do justice to his feelings.

We shall be glad to hear from F. L. a year hence.

BEPPO's Table-talk will appear. His "Romance of Real Life," besides not being authenticated, is hardly striking enough in the circumstances, for our series. An action may be very noble, and unusual too, and yet not be sufficiently unusual, or invested with interest, to furnish out a narrative.

We should have sooner noticed the communications of J. O. U.; but had been doubting whether his paper, however interesting to scholars, would have been popular and explanatory enough for the general reader. We have come to the conclusion however, that his subject is one which any intelligent mind will be glad to make the most of by the help of its own light, if it possess no other; and accordingly it shall appear next week.

THE MUSICAL LIBRARY.

This work appears in numbers every Saturday, Price Fourpence; and in monthly parts, containing 36 pages of music, sewed in a wrapper, price 1s. 6d.

The principle which has been so extensively applied in Literature and the Graphic Art, of producing works at the lowest possible point of cheapness without any abandonment of the qualities by which the popular knowledge and taste may be advanced, has yet a wide field for its employment in the department of Music. This most delightful of the arts was never so generally cultivated in this country as at the present moment. The Piano-forte, especially contributes to the recreation and enjoyment of thousands of families throughout the United Kingdom, and in our colonial possessions. And yet the publications by which this taste ought to be kept up and improved, are sold at a price which, in many cases, amounts to a prohibition.

The design of the 'Musical Library' is to afford the same advantage to amateurs in music that the lovers of literature are deriving from the cheap publications for the advancement of real knowledge that are now distributed through every part of the Empire, and are placed within the reach of persons of every condition. It is proposed to publish a Collection of Music, both vocal and instrumental, by the best masters, ancient and modern: the ancient in a state adapted to the improved condition of our musical instruments; and the modern the best, and only the best, that the continent of Europe and our own country can supply. We shall revive and put into an inviting form the compositions of the older classical masters, now only known to a few connoisseurs, keeping in mind the saying of a famous French modiste,—"nothing is so new as that which is forgotten." At the same time, it will be our further object to naturalise the confessedly good productions of the newest foreign composers, especially of the German masters, by the republication, sometimes with English words, of their best vocal compositions; and also by publishing movements, or extracts, complete in themselves, from such of their instrumental works as are of a length suited to the 'Musical Library.' It is also our design, occasionally, to engage composers of the first eminence to supply us with new compositions; and we shall never neglect an opportunity of giving currency to such productions of real genius as may be offered to us by those who have no means of securing extensive circulation to them, and who might be deterred from publishing them on their own account. We thus hope to spread widely a taste for what is excellent in the various departments of the art, and render the best compositions available to the purposes of private society. In the execution of our plan we shall steadily keep in view the great principle, that excellence and cheapness are not incompatible. "The best of civilization is to make good things cheap."

In the prosecution of these objects, which we may not unjustly consider likely to advance our national enjoyments, a weekly Number containing eight music-folio pages is devoted either to Vocal or Instrumental Music, so that these two classes of compositions may be separately bound. It would involve great practical difficulties to attempt to make every Number complete in itself; but as the intervals of publication between each Number are very short, little inconveniences will be experienced. Each Part, however, will be complete in itself, except under very peculiar circumstances.

Also, price 6d., sewed in a wrapper, to be continued monthly,
SUPPLEMENT TO THE MUSICAL LIBRARY,
No. 4.

This Supplementary Work may be purchased independently of the Musical Library, which will be complete in itself; but it will form a valuable addition to that publication. It consists of twelve folio pages of letter-press, comprising musical news, foreign and domestic; Reviews of important new musical publications; with memoirs of the Lives, and remarks upon the works, of eminent Composers, and especially of the authors whose productions are published in the 'Musical Library.'

ABBAY MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

A COMPLETE ACCOUNT of the late FESTIVAL, with the names of the Performers properly classed, together with a critical review of all the Performances, will appear in the Supplement to the Musical Library, on the 1st of August next, price 6d. BREAKFAST CONCLUDED.

TEA AND COFFEE, MILK, BREAD, &c.

We have said nothing of coffee and chocolate at breakfast, though a good deal was quoted in our last paper from Mr. D'Israeli respecting those beverages. We confined ourselves to tea, because it is the staple drink. A cheap coffee however, or imitation of it, has taken place of tea with many; and the poor have now their "coffee houses," as the rich used to have. We say "used," because coffee-drinking in such places, among the rich, is fast going out in consequence of the later hours of dinner and the attractions of the club-houses. Coffee, like tea, used to form a refreshment by itself, some hours after dinner. It is now taken as a digester, right upon that meal; and sometimes does not even close it; for the digester itself is digested by a liqueur of some sort, called a chasse-café (coffee-chacer.) We do not, however, pretend to be learned in these matters. If we find ourselves at a rich table, it is but as a stranger in the land, to all but the lasting humanities of it. A custom may change next year, and find us as ignorant of it, as the footman is otherwise.*

As we claim the familiar intimacy of the reader, in this our most private-public Journal, and have had it cordially responded to by fair and brown (who will not cry out as a critic did against Montaigne, for saying he liked sherry, "Who the devil cares whether he liked sherry or not?") we shall venture to observe, in comment upon the thousand inaudible remarks on this question which we hear on all sides of us, that for our parts we like coffee better than tea, once in a way, but tea "for a constancy." And one after the other makes a "pretty" variety; (as Dr. Johnson, or Mr. Pepys, would phrase it). To be perfect in point of taste (we do not say, of wholesomeness) coffee should be strong, and hot, with little sugar and milk. In the East they drink it without either; which, we should think, must be intolerable to any palates that do not begin with it in childhood, or are not in want of as severe stimulants as those of sailors (though by the way, we understand that tobacco-chewing is coming into fashion!) It has been drunk after this mode in some parts of Europe; but the public have nowhere (we believe) adopted it. The favorite way of drinking it as a meal, abroad, is with a great superfluity of milk,—very properly called in France Café-au-lait, Coffee to the milk. One of the pleasures we receive in drinking coffee is, that being the universal drink in the East, it reminds of that region of the Arabian Nights; as smoking does, for the same reason: though neither of these refreshments, which are now identified with Oriental manners, is to be found in that enchanting work. They had not been discovered, when it was written. The drink was sherbet, and its accompaniments cakes and fruit. One can hardly fancy, what a Turk or a Persian could have done without coffee and a pipe, any more than the English ladies and gentlemen before the civil wars, without tea for breakfast. As for chocolate, its richness, if made good, renders it rather a food than a drink. Linnæus seems to have been fond of it; for it was he, we believe, who gave it its generic name of Theobroma, or food of the gods. It is said to be extremely nourishing,* but heavy for weak stomachs. Cocoa (cacao) is a lighter kind of it, made of the shell instead of the nut. They make German flutes of the wood of the chocolate-tree. An Italian wit, who flourished when tea, coffee, and chocolate had not long been introduced into his country, treats them all three with great contempt, and no less humour:—

Non fia già, che il Cioccolato
V'adopra, ovvero il Tè:
Medicine così fatte
Non saran giammai per me.
Beveri prima il veleno,
Che un bicchier che fosse pieno
Del amaro e reo Caffè.
Colà tra gli Arabi,
E tra i Giannizzeri,
Liquor sì ostico,
Sì nero e torbido,
Gli schiavi ingollino.
Giù nel Tartaro,
Giù nell' Erebo,
L'empie Belidi l'inventarono;
E Tesifone, e l'altre Furie,
A Proserpina il ministrarono:
E se in Asia il Musulmano
Se lo cionca a precipizio,
Mostra aver poco giudizio.
Redi. Bacco in Toscana.

Talk of Chocolate! Talk of Tea!
Medicines made, ye Gods, as they are,
Are no medicines made for me!
I would sooner take to poison
Than a single cup set eyes on
Of that bitter and guilty stuff ye
Talk of by the name of Coffee.
Let the Arabs and the Turks
Count it 'mongst their cruel works.
Foe of mankind, black and turbid,
Let the throats of slaves absorb it.
Down in Tartarus,
Down in Erebus,
Twas the detestable Fifty† invented it;
The Furies then took it,
To grind and to cook it,
And to Proserpina all three presented it.
If the Mussulman in Asia
Doats on a beverage so unseemly,
I differ with the man extremely.

These vituperations however are put into the mouth of the god of wine; who may justly have resented the introduction of "the cups

Which cheer but not inebriate."

Chocolate is a common refreshment in Italy, in a solid shape. The pastry-cooks sell sweetmeats of it, wrapped up in little papers with printed mottoes, containing some couplet of humour or gallantry. They have made their appearance of late years in England, owing, we believe, to the patronage of George the Fourth, who is said to have given an order to a Paris manufacturer, to the value of 500*l*.

Off, ye inferior goods, ye comparative sophistications, perhaps fleeting fashions, and let us bethink ourselves of the everlasting virtues of beautiful milk and bread!

"Milk," says a venerable text, "is fit for children." It is too often unfit for men, not because their stomachs are stronger than those of children, but be-

* "An acquaintance, on whose veracity we can rely," says Mr. Phillips in his History of Fruits, "informed us, that during the retreat of Napoleon's army from the north, he fortunately had a small quantity of little chocolate cakes in his pocket, which preserved the life of himself and a friend for several days, when they could procure no other food whatever, and many of their brother officers perished for want."

cause they are weaker. Causes of various sorts, sorrow, too much thinking, dissipation, shall render a man unable to digest the good wholesome milk-bowl, that delighted him when a child. He must content himself with his experience, and with turning it to the best account, especially for others. A child over a milk-bowl is a pleasant object. He seems to belong to every thing that is young and innocent,—the morning, the fields, the dairies. And no fear of indigestion has he, nor of a spoiled complexion. He does not sit up till twelve at night; nor is a beauty tightlacing herself; nor does he suspend his stomach in breathlessness, with writing "articles," and thinking of good and evil.

Pleasant object also, nevertheless, is the milk-jug to the grown man, whether sick or well, provided he have "an eye." White milk in a white jug, or cream in a cream-coloured, presents one of those sympathies of colour, which are sometimes of higher taste than any contrast, however delicate. Drummond of Hawthornden has hit it, with a relishing pencil:—

In petticoat of green
With hair about her eine,*
Phillie, beneath an oak,
Sat milking her fair flock:
'Mongst that sweet-strained moisture (rare delight)
Her hand seem'd milk, in milk it was so white.†

Anacreon beautifully compares a finely tinted cheek, to milk with roses in it. There is a richness of colouring, as well as of substance in the happy scriptural designation of an abundant country,— "A land overflowing with milk and honey." Milk and honey suit admirably on the breakfast-table. Their colours, their simplicity, their country associations, all harmonize. We have a dairy and a bee-hive before us,—the breath of cows, and the buzzing over the garden. By the way, there is a very pretty design, in Cooke's edition of Parnell's Poems, of a girl milking a cow, by Kirk, a young Scotch artist of great promise, who died prematurely, which has wandered to the tea-cups, and is to be found on some of the cheapest of them. We happened to meet with it in Italy, and felt all our old landscapes before us,—the meadows, the trees, and the village church; all which the artist has put into the back ground. The face is not quite so good on the tea-cup as in the engraving. In that, it is eminently beautiful,—at least in the work now before us. We cannot answer for re-prints. It is one of those faces of sweetness and natural refinement, which are to be met with in the humblest as well as highest classes, where the parentage has been genial, and the bringing up not discordant. The passage illustrated is the pretty exordium of the poet's Eclogue entitled Health:—

Now early shepherds o'er the meadow pass,
And print long footsteps in the glittering grass:
The cows neglectful of their pasture stand,
By turns obsequious to the milker's hand.

Is it not better to occupy the fancy with such recollections as these over a common breakfast, than to be lamenting that we have not an uncommon one? which perhaps also would do us a mischief, and for the gain of a little tickling of the palate take health and good temper out of us for the rest of the day. Besides, a palate unspoilt has a relish of milks and teas, and other simple foods, which a Nabob, hot

* We advert to the knowledge of this personage, out of no undue feeling either towards himself, or those whom he serves. Both classes comprise natures of all sorts, like others. But fashion, in itself, is a poor business, everlastingly shifting its eastons because it has nothing but change to go upon; and with all our respect for good people who wear its liveries, whether master or footman, we own we have no sort of veneration for the passés of neckcloths and coats, and the vicissitudes of the modes of dining.

from his mulligatawny and his enragins, would envy.

We look upon it as a blessing, for our parts, that we retain a liking for a very crust. We were educated at a school, where the food was poorer than the learning; but the monks had lived in its cloisters; and left us a spring of delicious water. Hence we have the pleasure of enjoying a crust of bread and a draught of water to this day. Oftentimes have we "spoilt our dinner," when it has not come up in time, with a "hunk" of bread, choosing ~~rather to spoil our dinner than our spirits: and sweet~~ have been those mouthfuls of the pure staff of life, and refreshing of the corn. To our apprehensions there is a sort of white taste in bread, analogous to the colour, and reminding us of the white milkiness of the wheat. We have a respect, both of self-love and sympathy, with the poor light-hearted player in Gil Blas, who went singing along the country road, dipping his crust in the stream. Sorrow had no hold on him, with ninety-nine out of her hundred arms. Carelessly along went he, safe from her worst handling, in his freedom from wants. She might have peered out of her old den, and grown softened at his chaunt. But he went alone too: he had none to care for; which was a pleasure also. It would be none to us,—one thing provided. There are pains, when you get heartily acquainted with them, which out-value the reverse pleasures. Besides, we must all get through our tasks, as manfully and cheerfully as we can; losing, if possible, no handsome pleasure by the way, and sustaining ourselves by the thought that all will be for the best, provided we do our best for all. It is not the existence of pain that spoils the relish of the world; but the not knowing how to make the most of pleasures, and thereby reducing the pains to their most reasonable size and their most useful account.

You may make a landscape, if you will, out of your breakfast table, better than Mr. Kirk's picture. Here where the bread stands, is its father, the field of corn, glowing in the sun, cut by the tawny reapers, and presenting a path for lovers. The village church (where they are to be married) is on a leafy slope, on one side; and on the other is a woody hill, with fountains. There, far over the water, (for this basin of water, with island lumps of butter in it, shall be a sea) are our friends the Chinese, picking the leaves of their tea-trees,—a beautiful plant; or the Arabs plucking the berries of the coffee-tree, a still more beautiful one, with a profusion of white blossoms and an odour like jessamine. For the sugar (instead of a bitterer thought, not so harmonious to our purpose, but not to be forgotten at due times) you may think of Waller's Sacharissa,* so named from the Latin word for sugar (sacharum) a poor compliment to the lady; but the lady shall sweeten the sugar, instead of the sugar doing honour to the lady; and she was a very knowing as well as beautiful woman, and saw farther into love and sweetness than the sophisticated court poet; so she would not have him, notwithstanding his sugary verses, but married a higher nature.

Bread, milk, and butter are of venerable antiquity. They taste of the morning of the world. Jael, to entertain her guest, "brought forth butter in a lordly dish." Homer speaks of a nation of milk-eaters, whom he calls the "justest of men." To "break bread" was from time immemorial the Eastern signal of hospitality and confidence. We need not add reasons for respecting it, still more reverend. Bread is the "staff of life" throughout the greater part of the civilized world; and so accordant in its taste with the human palate, that nature, in some places, seems to have grown it ready-made on purpose, in the shape of the Bread Fruit Tree. There is also a Milk-tree; but we no where find a carniferous, or flesh-bearing tree; nor has the city yet been discovered in which "the pigs run through the streets ready roasted, with knives and forks stuck in their sides." Civilized nations eat meat, but they can also do without it, living upon milk, grain, and vegetables alone, as in India. None but savages live without those. And common breakfasts, without any meat in them, have this advantage over others, that you can look back upon them without any sort of doubt or disgust, nor are theiravings offensive to the eye. It is one of the perplexities of man's present condition, that he is at once carnivorous, and has very good reason for being so, and relishing his chop and his steak, and yet cannot always reconcile it to the rest of his nature. He would fain eat his lamb, and pity it too; which is puzzling. However, there are worse perplexities than these; and the lambs lead pleasant flowery lives while they do live. Nor could they have had this taste of existence, if they were not bred for the table. Let us all do our best to get the world forward, and we shall see. We shall either do away all we think wrong, or see better reasons for thinking it right. Meanwhile, let us dine and breakfast, like good-humoured people; and not "quarrel with our bread and butter."

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday, the 16th to Tuesday, the 22d of July.

About the close of this week takes place that extraordinary proceeding of government among the bees,—the massacre of the drones.

"After the season of swarming," says Dr. Bevan, "viz.: towards the end of July, as is well known, a general massacre of the drones takes place. The business of fecundation being now completed, they are regarded as useless consumers of the fruits of others labours, 'fruges consumere nati;' love is at once converted into furious hate, and a general proscription takes place. The unfortunate victims evidently perceive their danger; for they are never, at this time, seen resting in one place, but darting in or out of the hive with the utmost precipitation, as if in fear of being seized. Their destruction has generally been supposed to be effected by the workers harassing them till they quit the hive; this was the opinion of Mr. Hunter, who says that the workers pinch them to and fro, without stinging them, and he considers their death as a natural rather than an untimely one. In this, Bonnet seems to agree with Mr. Hunter. But Huber has observed that their destruction is effected by the stings of the workers. He ascertained this by placing his hives upon a glass table. Reaumur seems to have been aware of this, for he has remarked that, "notwithstanding the superiority which the drones seem to have from their bulk, they cannot hold out against the workers, who are armed with a poison which conveys poison into the wound it makes." The moment this formidable weapon has entered their bodies, they expand their wings, and expire. This sacrifice is not the consequence of a blind indiscriminating instinct, for if a hive be deprived of its queen, no massacre takes place, though the hottest persecution rage in all the surrounding hives. This fact was observed by Bonnet, who supposed the drones to be preserved for the sake of the additional heat which they would generate in the hive during winter; but according to Huber's theory, they are preserved for the purpose of impregnating a new queen. The lives of the drones are also spared in hives which possess fertile workers only, but no proper queen; and likewise in hives governed by a queen whose impregnation has been retarded; but under any other circumstances, the drones all disappear before winter. Not only all that have undergone their full transformations, but every embryo, in whatever period of its existence, shares the same fate. The workers drag them forth from their cells, and after sucking the fluid from the bodies, cast them out of the hive. In all these respects the hive bees resemble wasps, but with this difference; among the latter, not only the males and the male larvae are destroyed, but all the workers and their larvae, (and the very combs themselves), are involved in one indiscriminate ruin, none remaining alive during the winter but the queens, which lie dormant in various holes and corners till the ensuing spring,—of course, without food, for they store none."

How are the destroyers then destroyed? Do they destroy one another? Is the whole of wasp-kind

Or do the queens go about, stabbing and making a finish?—These appear to be light questions on a subject that might be awful enough, were we bees or wasps: but human beings are too fond of drawing analogies between themselves and other creatures,—a practice, very good, where the latter can receive any benefit from it, but to be used with caution in all other cases. We have, in another publication, (the Indicator,—in a paper added to the second edition,) shewn the absurdity of arguing from bee-government to human government,—a process of political reasoning once in great favour with some, who in thinking to advocate the cause of monarchy, forgot the perils they might bring on another part of the state. If men were bees and wasps, they would not only have no sovereigns and mothers except queens, but massacre their nobility, and themselves into the bargain, once a year! But being men, and gifted with reason, they discover that it is a manlier thing to teach and improve one another, than massacre any body. Bees must not guide men. Men are their masters, and must guide them: perhaps, will ultimately give them a lift, and so be like gods to them!

As our extract in the present department of our paper is so short this week, we gladly take the opportunity of a beautiful little description of a nook to read in, to make the following striking extract from the Seven Temptations of Mrs. Howitt,—a production which we have read through with a pleasure, only bounded by our regret, that the fair writer's conventional opinions of what is good and pious, are not always in perfect harmony with her natural good sense and benevolence. The chief actor in the following scene is a spendthrift who has alienated his house and lands, and is resolved to get them back again by an inexorable pursuit of money.

SCENE III.

A fine moonlight night—A lonely field in the extremity of the valley of Torres.—Enter Thomas with an ass, he takes off the bridle and turns it to graze.

Thomas. There, thou poor, half-starved, patient animal,

There's grass, rare green grass for thee; eat thy fill, Would thou couldst take a store for forty days! This once was mine—I tell thee, it was mine! I know it inch by inch—yon leafy hedge is hazel every twig. I little dreamed When I was wandering here a happy boy, The time would come when I should steal in here A thief o' nights!

Ah! I remember well— There is a little hollow hereabout, Where wild-briar roses, and lithe honeysuckle Made a thick bower; 'twas here I used to come To read sweet books of witching poetry! Could it be I? No, no, I am so chang'd, I will not think this man was once that boy, The thought would drive me mad! I will but think I once knew one who call'd this vale his own; I will but think I knew a merry boy, And a kind, gentle father, years ago, Who had their dwelling here; and that the boy Did love this lonely nook, and used to find Here the first nests of summer; here did read All witching books of glorious poetry; And then, that as the boy became a youth, And gentle feelings strengthened into passion, And love became the property of life, Hither he wandered with a girlish beauty, Gathering, like Proserpine, sweet meadow flowers; And that they sat beneath the wild-briar rose, And that he then did kiss that maiden's cheek The first time as a lover!—Oh, my God! That was the heir of Torres,—a brave boy, A noble hearted boy! he grew a man, And what became of him? Ha! pass we that— Would that I knew not what became of him!

[He advances into the hollow.]

'Tis even as then! this bower hath little changed, But hearts have changed since then, and thoughts have changed,

And the great purpose of a life hath changed! Oh, that I were a bird among these boughs, To live a summer life of peace and joy; To never fret my soul for broken faith; To have no onward hope, no retrospection!— Ah! there's the tiny glowworm as of old! It is a lovely thing. Oh me! how much That's beautiful and pure have I forgotten! Years is it since a glow worm crossed my thoughts, And it was the bright marvel of my boyhood— A fire, and yet so cold! let's feel it now, If 'tis as it was then.

[He stoops to pick it up.]

Heavens, it is gold!

And here is more! bright, shining, glorious gold! [He pulls away the moss and roots, and draws out a small bag of gold coin.]

* Sacharissa was Lady Dorothy Sidney, of the great and truly noble family of the Sidneys. She married a sincere, affectionate, and courageous man, Robert Spencer, Earl of Sunderland, who was killed four years afterwards, in a cause for which he thought himself bound to quit the arms of the woman he loved. Her second husband was of the Smythe family. In her old age, meeting Walker at a card table, Lady Sunderland asked him, in good-humoured and not ungrateful recollection of his fine verses, when he would write any more such upon her; to which the "polite" poet, either from spite or want of address, had the poverty of spirit to reply, "Oh, madam! when your ladyship is as young again."

Bent
On bloody courses, till the rude scene ends,
And darkness is the burier of the dead?

Let me into the moonlight—gold, gold, gold!
A hoard of shining gold: here lieth more
Than I have saved in seven years weary toil,
And honest gain—this is some robber's booty—
It were no sin to take a robber's gold.

[A step is heard approaching.

Ha! some one comes!

[He shrinks into the shadow, and lies close under the bench.

Mrs. Now, by your leave, good friend,

Who may you be?

Thos. A poor night traveller,

Who takes up his cheap quarters 'neath the hedges

Mrs. I'm in the like case too. But, honest friend,

I have a little liking for your pillow,

May't please you take the further side o' the bed!

Thos. First come, first served—it is a well known sage.

Mrs. Come, come, my friend, these are my ancient quarters;

I have a foolish liking for this spot—

All are alike to you—

Thos. I have possession,

And will maintain it!

Mrs. It shall then be tried.

[He lays hold on Thomas, and they struggle together.

Ha, ha, you thief, then you have got the bag!

Thos. You villain! you marauding thief!

[Thomas rushes into the thicket, the men follow.

Mrs. (within the thicket). I am a dead man, help!

oh, I am murdered!

Christ help me! I am murdered!

Thos. (Rushing out). He is not! no!

Calls do not murder men!

[He runs off.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXIII.—A GAMESTER WITH A WIFE TOO GOOD FOR HIM.

THIS rare, because pleasing passage, in the domestic history of a gamester (we do not mean the having a wife too good for him—which must be the case with all gamesters whose wives are good for any thing—but the agreeable surprise which she had prepared for him against his downfall) is related by Goldsmith in his life of Beau Nash. It looks like a page out of one of Fielding's novels. We have only to imagine Booth grown less civil, and Amelia remaining what she was, and the incident would have perfectly suited her.

At Tunbridge, in the year 1715, Mr. J. Hedges made a very brilliant appearance; he had been married about two years to a young lady of great beauty and large fortune; they had one child, a boy, on whom they bestowed all that affection, which they could spare from each other. He knew nothing of gaming, nor seemed to have the least passion for play; but he was unacquainted with his own heart; he began by degrees to bet at the table for trifling sums, and his soul took fire at the prospect of immediate gain; he was soon surrounded with sharpers, who with calmness lay in ambush for his fortune, and coolly took advantage of the precipitancy of his passions.

His lady perceived the ruin of her family approaching, but, at first, without being able to form any scheme to prevent it. She advised with his brother, who at that time was possessed of a small fellowship in Cambridge. It was easily seen that whatever passion took the lead in her husband's mind, seemed to be there fixed unalterably: it was determined therefore to let him pursue fortune, but previously take measures to prevent the pursuit being fatal.

Accordingly, every night this gentleman was a constant attender at the hazard tables; he understood neither the arts of sharpers, nor even the allowed strokes of a connoisseur, yet still he played. The consequence is obvious; he lost his estate, his equipage, his wife's jewels, and every other moveable that could be parted with, except a repeating watch. His agony, upon this occasion, was inexpressible; he was even mean enough to ask a gentleman who sate near, to lend him a few pieces, in order to turn his fortune; but this prudent gamester, who plainly saw there were no expectations of being repaid, refused to lend a farthing, alledging a former resolution against lending. Hedges was at last furious with the continuance of ill success, and pulling out his watch, asked if any person in company, would set him sixty guineas upon it: the company were silent; he then demanded fifty; still no answer: he sunk to forty, thirty, twenty; finding the company still without answering, he cried out, "By G—d it shall never go for less," and dashed it against the floor; at the same time attempting to dash out his brains against the marble chimney-piece.

This last act of desperation immediately excited the attention of the whole company; they instantly gathered round, and prevented the effects of his passion; and after he again became cool, he was permitted to return home, with sullen discontent, to his wife. Upon his entering her apartment, she received him with her usual tenderness and satisfaction; while he answered her caresses with contempt and severity; his disposition being quite altered with his misfortunes. "But, my dear Jenny," says his wife, "perhaps you don't know the news I have to tell; my mamma's old uncle is dead, the messenger is now in the house, and you know his estate is settled upon you." This account seemed only to increase his agony, and looking angrily at her, he cried, "There you lie, my dear; his estate is not settled upon me." "I beg your pardon," said she, "I really thought it was, at least you have always told me so." "No," returned he, "as sure as you and I are to be miserable here, and our children beggars hereafter, I have sold the reversion of it this day, and have lost every farthing I got for it at the hazard table." "What all?" replied the lady. "Yes, every farthing," returned he, "and I owe a thousand pounds more than I have got to pay." Thus speaking, he took a few frantic steps across the room. When the lady had a little enjoyed his perplexity, "No, my dear," cried she, "you have lost but a trifle, and you owe nothing: our brother and I have taken care to prevent the effects of your rashness, and are actually the persons who have won your fortune; we employed proper persons for this purpose, who brought their winnings to me. Your money, your equipage, are in my possession, and here I return them to you, from whom they were unjustly taken. I only ask permission to keep my jewels, and to keep you, my greatest jewel, from such dangers for the future." Her prudence had the proper effect. He ever retained a sense of his former follies, and never played for the smallest sums, even for amusement.

BEAU NASH.

We take the opportunity of following the above extract from Goldsmith's life of this once "influential personage," with an account of Nash himself. We do not add it to our list of "Romances," because though Nash was a real singularity, there was something in him too firm to bring him within the borders of so grave a thing as Romance. The most solid thing about him was his charitableness; and it would have made him respectable, had it been less a matter of temperament, and more accompanied with justice. But he was a curiosity of his kind, and a 'Reminiscence' of him will not be unacceptable to many of our readers just now, when a popular dramatist has made him the subject of a comedy.

Nash is to be added to the list of long livers; and the reader will observe, that what has been invariably observed of them, and appears (with temperance or great exercise) to be the only invariable condition of their longevity, has not failed in his instance:—he was an early riser.

It has been doubted whether Goldsmith was the author of the life attributed to him. We think, however, it bears strong internal marks of his hand, though not in its happiest or most confident moments. Its pleasantness is uneasy and overdone, as if conscious of having got into company unfit for it; and something of the tawdriness of the subject sticks to him,—perhaps from a secret tendency of his own to mix up the external character of a fine gentleman "in a blossom-coloured coat," with his otherwise natural and totally incompatible character of a single-hearted and unaffected writer. Chalmers, the compiler of the Biographical Dictionary, who was much in the secrets of book-making, appears to have had no doubt on the subject. It is not improbable, that Goldsmith had materials for the life, by some other person, put into his hands, and so made it up by touches of his own, and by altering the composition. The following summary of it is taken from Chalmers, (with the exception of a few words).

Richard Nash, Esq. was born at Swansea, in Glamorganshire, Oct. 18, 1674. His father was a gentleman, whose principal income arose from a partnership in a glass-house; his mother was niece to Colonel Poyer, who was killed by Oliver Cromwell, for defending Pembroke Castle against the rebels. He was educated at Caermarthen School, and thence sent to Jesus College, Oxford, in order to prepare him for the study of the law. His father had strained his little income to give his son such an education, and from the boy's natural vivacity, he hoped a recompense from his future preferment. In college, however, he soon shewed that though much might be expected from his genius, nothing could be hoped from his industry. The first method Nash took to distinguish himself at college was not by application to study, but by assiduity in intrigue. Our hero was quickly caught, and went through all the mazes and adventures of a college intrigue before he was seventeen; he offered marriage; the offer was accepted; but the affair coming to the knowledge of his tutor, his happiness, or perhaps his misery, was prevented, and he was sent home from college, with necessary advice to him, and proper instructions to his father. He now purchased a pair of colours, commenced a professed admirer of the sex, and dressed to the very edge of his finances; but soon becoming disgusted with the life of a soldier, quitted the army, entered his name as a student in the Temple books, and here went to the very summit of second-rate luxury. He spent some years about town, till at last, his genteel appearance, his constant civility, and still more his assiduity, gained him the acquaintance of several persons, qualified to lead the fashion both by birth and fortune. He brought a person genteelly dressed to every assembly; he always made one of those who are called good company; and assurance gave him an air of elegance and ease.

He was, if not a brilliant, at least an agreeable companion. He never forgot good manners, even in the highest warmth of familiarity, and, as we hinted before, never went in a dirty shirt, to disgrace the table of his patron or friend. "These qualifications," says his biographer, "might make the furniture of his head; but for his heart, that seemed an assemblage of the virtues which display an honest benevolent mind; with the vices that spring from too much good nature." He had pity for every creature in distress, but wanted prudence in the application of his benefits. He had generosity for the wretched in the highest degree, at a time when his creditors complained of his justice.

Nash was now fairly for life entered into a new course of gaiety and dissipation, and steady in nothing but in the pursuit of variety. He was thirty years old, without fortune, or useful talents to acquire one. He had hitherto only led a life of expedients; he thanked chance alone for his support; and having been long precariously supported, he became, at length, totally a stranger to prudence or precaution. Not to disguise any part of his character, he was now by profession a gamester; and went on from day to day feeling the vicissitudes of rapture and anguish in proportion to the fluctuations of fortune. About 1703, the city of Bath became, in some measure, frequented by people of distinction. The company was numerous enough to form a country-dance upon the bowling-green; they were amused with a fiddle and a hautboy, and diverted with the romantic walks round the city. They usually sauntered in fine weather in the grove, between two rows of sycamore trees. Several learned physicians, Dr. Jordan and others, had even then praised the salubrity of the wells; and the amusements were put under the direction of a master of the ceremonies. Captain Webster was the predecessor of Nash. This gentleman, in 1704, carried the balls to the Town-hall, each man paying half-a-guinea each ball. One of the greatest physicians of his age conceived a design of ruining the city, by writing against the efficacy of the waters; and accordingly published a pamphlet, by which, he said, "he would cast a toad into the spring."

In this situation things were when Nash first came into the city; and, hearing the threat of this physician, he humorously assured the people, that if they would give him leave, he would charm away the poison of the toad, as they usually charmed the venom of the tarantula by music. He therefore was immediately empowered to set up a band of music against the doctor's reptile; the company very sensibly increased, Nash triumphed, and the sovereignty of the city was decreed to him by every rank of people. None could possibly conceive a person more fit to fill this employment than Nash; he had some wit; but it was of that sort which is rather happy than permanent. He was charitable himself, and generally shamed his betters into a similitude of sentiment, if they were not naturally so before. His first care, when made master of the ceremonies, or King of Bath, as it is called, was to promote a music subscription of one guinea each, for a band; which was to consist of six performers, who were to receive a guinea a-week each for their trouble. He allowed also two guineas a-week for lighting and sweeping the rooms, for which he accounted to the subscribers by receipt. By his direction, one Thomas Harrison erected a handsome assembly-house for these purposes. A better band of music was also procured, and the former subscription of one guinea was raised to two. Harrison had three guineas a week for the room and candles, and the music two guineas a man. The money Nash received, and accounted for with the utmost exactness and punctuality. The balls, by his direction, were to begin at six and to end at eleven. Nor would he suffer them to continue a moment longer, lest invalids might commit irregularities, to counteract the benefit of the waters. By degrees, he made the gentlemen give up their custom of wearing their swords at the rooms; and in order to make their boots follow the swords, he was at the pain of getting up a puppet show, in which Punch did the most preposterous things, booted and spurred, going, among other pranks, to bed, thus accoutred. The city of Bath by such assiduity, soon became the theatre of summer amusements for all the people of fashion; and the magistrates of the city, finding him so necessary and useful, took every opportunity of paying the same respect to his fictitious royalty, that is generally extorted by real power. His equipage was sumptuous, and he used to travel to Tunbridge in a post chaise and six greys, with outriders, footmen, French horns, and every other appendage of expensive parade. He always wore a white hat; and to apologize for this singularity, said he did it purely to secure it from being stolen; his dress was tawdry, and not perfectly genteel; he might be considered as a beau of several generations, and, in his appearance, he, in some measure, mixed the fashions of a former age with those of his own. He perfectly understood elegant expense, and generally passed his time in the best company, if persons of the first distinction deserve that title.

But, perhaps, the reader may demand, what finances were to support all this finery?—or whence the treasures came that gave him such frequent opportunities of displaying his benevolence or his vanity? The secret was to be found in his gaming. Wherever people of fashion came, needy adventurers were generally found in waiting. With such, Bath swarmed; and among this class Nash was certainly to be numbered in the beginning—only with this difference, that he wanted the corrupt heart too commonly attending a life of expedients; for he was generous, humane, and honourable, even though by profession a gamester. But, whatever skill Nash might have acquired by long practice in play, he was never formed by nature for a successful gamester. He was constitutionally passionate and generous. While others made considerable fortunes at the gaming table, he was ever in the power of chance; nor did even the intimacy with which he was received by the great, place him in a state of independence. The considerable inconveniences that were found to result from a permission of gaming, at length attracted the attention of the Legislature; and in the twelfth year of his late Majesty the most prevalent games at that time were declared fraudulent and unlawful.

It was enacted that after the 24th of June, 1745, none should be permitted to keep a house, room, or place for playing, upon pain of such forfeitures as were declared in former acts instituted for that purpose.

By this wise and just act, all Nash's future hopes of succeeding by the tables were blown up. From that time, we find him involved in continual disputes, every day calumniated with some new slander, and continually endeavouring to obviate its effects. Nature had by no means formed him for a beau garçon: his person was clumsy, too large, and awkward, and his features harsh, strong, and peculiarly irregular; yet, even with those disadvantages, he made love, became a universal admirer of the sex, and was universally admired. He was possessed, at least, of some requisites of a lover. He had assiduity, flattery, fine clothes, and as much wit as the ladies he addressed. Wit, flattery, and finery clothes, he used to say, were enough to debauch a nunnery. He did not long continue an universal gallant; but in the earlier years of his reign, entirely gave up his endeavours to deceive the sex, in order to become the honest protector of their innocence, the guardian of their reputation, and a friend to their virtue. This was a character he bore for many years, and supported it with integrity, assiduity, and success; and he not only took care, during his administration, to protect the ladies from the insults of our sex, but to guard them from the slander of each other. He, in the first place, prevented any animosities that might arise from place and precedence, by being previously acquainted with the rank and quality of almost every family in the British dominion. He endeavoured to make scandal odious, by marking it as the result of envy and folly united. Whatever might have been his other excellencies, there was one in which few exceeded him—his extensive humanity. None felt pity more strongly, and none made greater efforts to relieve distress. "If we were," says his biographer, "to name any reigning and fashionable virtue in the present age, it should be charity. We know not whether it may not be spreading the influence of Nash too widely to say, that he was one of the principal causes of introducing this noble emulation among the rich; but certain it is, no private man ever relieved the distressed of so many as he."

As Nash grew old, he grew insolent, and seemed not aware of the pain his attempts to be a wit gave others. He grew peevish and fretful; and they who only saw the remnant of a man, severely returned that laughter upon him, which he had once lavished upon others. Poor Nash was no longer the gay, thoughtless, idly industrious person he once was; he now forgot how to supply new modes of entertainment, and became too rigid to wind with care through the vicissitudes of fashion. The evening of his life began to grow cloudy. His fortune was gone, and nothing but poverty lay in prospect. He now began to want that charity which he had never refused to any; and to find that a life of dissipation and gaiety is ever terminated by misery and regret. He was now past the power of giving or receiving pleasure, for he was poor, old, and peevish; yet still he was incapable of turning from his former manner of life to pursue happiness. An old man thus striving after pleasure, is indeed an object of pity; but a man at once old and poor, running on in this pursuit, might excite astonishment.

Anxious, timid, his thoughts still hanging on a receding world, he desired to enjoy a little longer that life, the miseries of which he had experienced so long. The poor unsuccessful gamester husbanded the wasting moments with an increased desire to continue the game; and, to the last, eagerly wished for one yet more happy throw. He died at his house in St. John's Court, Bath, Feb. 3, 1761, aged 87. His death was sincerely regretted by the city, to which he had been so long and so great a benefactor.

In domestic life, among his servants and dependants, where no gloss was required to colour his sentiments and disposition, nor any mask necessary to conceal his foibles, Nash was ever fond of promoting the interests of his servants and dependants, and making them happy. In his own house, no man was, perhaps, more regular, cheerful, and beneficent. His table was always free to those who sought his friendship or wanted a dinner. As his thoughts were entirely employed in the affairs of his government, he was seldom at home but at the time of eating or of rest. His table was well served, but his entertainment consisted principally of plain dishes. He generally arose early in the morning, being seldom in bed after five; and to avoid disturbing the family and depriving his servants of their rest, he had the fire laid after he was in bed, and in the morning lighted it himself, and sat down to read some of his few, but well chosen books. His generosity and charity in private life, though not so conspicuous, was as great as that in public, and indeed far more considerable than his little income would admit of.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS. COWLEY.

His Preference of a Small Style of Living to a Great.

Abraham Cowley, a political court secretary, son of a grocer, born at the western corner of Chancery Lane in Fleet Street, A.D. 1618, and as honest a man in the ranks of the loyalists to Charles the First, as Milton was in those of the republicans, was looked upon, by the leaders of opinion in his time, as the greatest wit and poet that existed, perhaps that ever existed. A wit he was, and a poet too, though not of the great order that was supposed. His most admired poetry was full of "conceits;" that is to say, of laboured and far-fetched thoughts, instead of imagination and feeling; but amidst his less pretending compositions he has verses that abundantly satisfy both the taste and heart, and his prose is exquisite. It is the genuine expression of a sincere, thoughtful, kindly, and innocent nature. Pope has well touched upon the difference between what was mortal in his writings, and what has survived him:—

"Forgot his Epic, nay, Pindaric art,
Yet still we love the language of his heart."

The following is one of those "Essays in Prose and Verse," which form the portion of his works that Pope alludes to, and which have ever been the delight of lovers of reading, especially those who are fond of taking a country walk with a book in their hand. The paraphrase of Horace at the end of it is not such close and finished writing as the original Latin; but the feeling in it is more true to the subject; and there is a more thorough air of goodness in Cowley than in Horace. Both were courtiers; but Horace was a courtier in the worldly sense. Cowley's heart always retained its boyhood.

"SINCE we cannot attain to greatness," (says the Sieur de Montaigne), "let us have our revenge by railing at it." This he spoke but in jest. I believe he desired it no more than I do, and had less reason: for he enjoyed so plentiful and honourable a fortune in a most excellent country, as allowed him all the real conveniences of it, separated and purged from the inconveniences. If I were but in his condition, I should think it hard measure, without being convinced of any crime, to be sequestered from it and made one of the principal officers of the state. But the reader may think that what I now say is of but small authority, because I never was, nor ever shall be, put to the trial: I can therefore only make my protestation.

If ever I more riches did desire
Than cleanliness and quiet do require;
If e'er ambition did my fancy cheat,
With any wish so mean as to be great;
Continue, Heaven, still from me to remove
The humble blessings of that life I love.

I know very many men will dispise, and some pity me, for this humour, as a poor spirited fellow; but I am content, and, like Horace, thank God for being so.

Di bene fecerunt, inopis me quodque pusilli Finscerunt animi.

Sat. iv. 17.

I confess I love littleness almost in all things. A little convenient estate, a little cheerful house, a little company, and a very little feast; and if I ever were to fall in love again, (which is a great passion, and, therefore I hope I have done with it), it would be, I think, with prettiness, rather than with majestic beauty. I would neither wish that my mistress, nor my fortune, should be a bona roba, nor, as Homér uses to describe his beauties, like a daughter of great Jupiter for the stateliness and largeness of her person; but, as Lucretius says,

Parvula, pumillo, xaphron pul, tota merum sal.

Lucr. iv. 1155.

Where there is one man of this, I believe there are a thousand of Senecio's mind, whose ridiculous affectation of grandeur Seneca the elder describes to this effect:—Senecio was a man of turbid and confused wit, who could not endure to speak any but mighty words and sentences, till this humour at last grew into so notorious a habit or rather disease, as became the sport of the whole town; he would have no servants, but huge, massy fellows; no plate or household stuff, but thrice as big as the fashion; you may believe me, for I speak it without railery, his extravagance came at last into such a madness, that he would not put on a pair of shoes, each of which was not big enough for both his feet; he would eat nothing but what was great, nor touch any fruit but horse plums and pound pears; he kept a concubine that was a very giantess, and made her walk to always in Chiopins, till, at last, he got the name of Senecio Grandio, which Messala said, was not his cognomen, but his cognomentum; when he declaimed for the three hundred Lacedæmonians, who alone opposed Xerxes's army of above three hundred thousand, he stretched out his arms and stood on tip-toes, that he might appear the taller, and cried out in a very loud voice; "I rejoice, I rejoice!"—We wondered, I remember, what new fortune had befallen his eminence. 'Xerxes,' says he, 'is all mine own. He who took away the sight of the sea, with the canvass sails of so many ships; and then he goes on so, as I know not what to make of the rest, whether it be the fault of the edition, or the orator's own burley way of nonsense.'

This is the character that Seneca gives of this hyperbolical fop, whom we stand amazed at; and yet there are few men who are not in some things, and in some degrees, Grandios. Is anything more common than to see our ladies of quality wear such high shoes as they cannot walk in, without one to lead them; and a gown as long again as their body, so that they cannot stir to the next room without a page or two to hold it up? I may safely say, that all the ostentation of our grandees is, just like a train, of no use in the world, but horribly cumbersome and inconvenient. What is all this but a spice of Grandio? How tedious would this be, if we were always bound to it! I do believe there is no king who would not rather be deposed, than endure every day of his reign all the ceremonies of his coronation.

The mightiest princes are glad to fly often from these majestic pleasures, (which is, methinks, no small disparagement to them), as it were for refuge, to the most contemptible diversions and meanest recreations of the vulgar, nay, even of children. One of the most powerful and fortunate princes* of the world, of late, could find out no delight so satisfactory as the keeping of little singing birds, and hearing of them, and whistling to them. What did the emperors of the whole world? If ever any men had the free and full enjoyment of human greatness (nay, that would not suffice, for they would be gods too), they certainly possessed it; and yet one of them who styled himself lord and god of the earth,† could not tell how to pass his whole day pleasantly, without spending constantly two or three hours in catching flies, and killing them with a bodkin, as if his godship had been Beelzebub.‡ One of his predecessors, Nero, who never put any bounds, nor met with any stop to his appetite, could divert himself with no pastime more agreeable, than to run about the streets all night in a disguise, and abuse the women, and affront the men whom he met, and sometimes to beat them, and sometimes to be beaten by them; this was one of his imperial nocturnal pleasures. His chiefest in the day was to sing, and play upon a fiddle, in the habit of a minstrel, upon a public stage: he was prouder of the garlands that were given to his divine voice (as they called it then) in those kind of prizes than all his forefathers were of their triumphs over nations; he did not at his death complain that so mighty an emperor, and the last of all the Cæsarean race of deities, should be brought to so shameful and miserable an end; but only cried out, 'Alas! what pity it is, that so excellent a musician should perish in this manner.§ His uncle Claudius spent half his time at playing at dice; and that was the main fruit of his sovereignty. I omit the madnesses of Caligula's delights, and the execrable sordidness of those of Tiberius. Would one think that Augustus himself, the highest and most fortunate of mankind, a person endowed too with many excellent parts of nature, should be so hard put to it sometimes for want of recreation, as to be found playing at nuts and bounding stones, with little Syrian and Moorish boys, whose company he took delight in, for their prating?

* Louis XIII. The Duke de Laynes, the constable of France, is said to have gained the favour of this powerful and fortunate prince, by training up singing birds for him.

Was it for this that Rome's best blood be spilt,
With so much falsehood, so much guilt?
Was it for this that his ambition strove
To equal Cæsar first; and after, Jove?
Greatness is barren, sure, of solid joys;
Her merchandize (I fear) is all in toys;
She would not else, sure, so uncivil be,
To treat his universal majesty,
His new-created Deity
With nuts, and bounding-stones, and boys.

But we must excuse her for this meagre entertainment; she has not really wherewithal to make such feasts as we imagine. Her guests must be contented sometimes with but slender cakes, and with the same cold meats served over and over again, even till they become nauseous. When you have pared away all the vanity what solid and natural contentment does there remain, which may not be had with five hundred pounds a year? Not so many servants or horses; but a few good ones, which will do all the business as well; not so many choice dishes at every meal; but at several meals all of them, which makes them both the more healthy, and the more pleasant; not so rich garments, nor so frequent changes; but as warm and as comely, and so frequent change too, as is every jot as good for the master, though not for the tailor or valet-de-chambre; not such a stately palace, nor gilt rooms, or the costliest tapestry; but a convenient brick-house, with decent wainscot, and pretty forest-work hangings. Lastly, (for I omit all other particulars, and will end with that which I love most in both conditions), not whole woods cut in walks, nor vast parks, nor fountains or cascade-gardens; but herb, and flower and fruit gardens, which are more useful, and the water every whit as clear and wholesome, as if darted from the breasts of a marble nymph, or the urn of a river god.

If, for all this, you like better the substance of that former estate of life, do but consider the inseparable accidents of both; servitude, disquiet, danger, and most commonly guilt, inherent in the one; in the other, liberty, tranquillity, security and innocence. And when you have thought upon this, you will confess that to be a truth which appeared to you before but a ridiculous paradox, that a low fortune is better guarded and attended than an high one. If, indeed, we look only upon the flourishing head of the tree, it appears a most beautiful object.

Sed quantum vertice ad auras
Æthereas, tantum radice in Tartara tendit.*

As far up towards heaven the branches grow,
So far the root sinks down to hell below.

Another horrible disgrace to greatness is, that it is for the most part in pitiful want and distress; what a wonderful thing this is! Unless it degenerate into vice, and so cease to be greatness, it falls perpetually into such necessities, as drive it into all the meanest and most sordid ways of borrowing, cozenage, and robbery:

Mancipii locuples, eget æris-Cappadocum rex,†

This is the case of almost all great men, as well as of the poor King of Cappadocia; "they abound with slaves, but are indigent of money." The ancient Roman Emperors, who had the riches of the whole world for their revenue, had wherewithal to live (one would have thought) pretty well at ease, and to have been exempt from the pressures of extreme poverty. But yet with most of them it was much otherwise; and they fell perpetually into such miserable penury, that they were forced to devour and squeeze most of their friends and servants, to cheat with infamous projects, to ransack and pillage all their provinces. This fashion of imperial grandeur is imitated by all inferior and subordinate sorts of it, as if it were a point of honour. They must be cheated of a third part of their estates, two other thirds they must expend in vanity; so that they remain debtors for all the necessary provisions of life, and have no way to satisfy those debts, but out of the succours and supplies of rapine. As riches increase, (says Solomon), so do the mouths that devour them! The master mouth has no more than before. The owner, methinks, is like Ocnus in the fable, who is perpetually winding a rope of hay, with an ass at the end perpetually eating it.

Out of these inconveniences arise naturally one more, which is, that no greatness can be satisfied or contented with itself; still, if it could mount up a little higher, it would be happy; if it could gain but that point, it would obtain all its desires; but yet at last, when it has got up to the very top of the Pic of Teneriff, it is in very great danger of breaking its neck downwards, but in no possibility of ascending upwards into the seat of tranquillity above the moon.

The first ambitious men in the world, the old giants, are said to have made an heroic attempt of scaling heaven in spite of the gods; and they cast Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa: two or three mountains more, they thought, would have done their business; but the thunder spoilt all their work when they were come up to the third story:

And what a noble plot was crost!
And what a brave design was lost!

A famous person of their offspring, the late giant of our nation,* when, from the condition of a very inconsiderable captain, he had made himself lieutenant-general of an army of little Titans, which was his first mountain, and afterwards general, which was his second, and after that, absolute tyrant of three kingdoms, which was the third, and almost touched the little heaven which he affected, is believed to have died with grief and discontent, because he could not attain to the honest name of king and the old formality of a crown, though he had before exceeded the power by a wicked usurpation. If he could have compassed that, he would, perhaps, have wanted something else that is necessary to felicity, and pined away for want of the title of an emperor or a god. The reason of this is, that greatness has no reality in nature, being a creature of the fancy, a notion that exists only in relation and comparison: it is indeed an idol; but St. Paul teaches us "that an idol is nothing in the world." There is, in truth, no rising or meridian of the sun, but only in respect to several places: there is no right or left, no upper hand in nature; everything is little, and everything is great, according as it is diversely compared. There may be, perhaps, some village in Scotland or Ireland where I might be a great man; and in that case I should be like Cæsar, (you would wonder how Cæsar and I should be like one another in any thing,) and choose rather to be the first man of the village, than second of Rome. Our country is called Great Britain, in regard only of a lesser of the same name; it would be but a ridiculous epithet for it when we consider it with the kingdom of China. That, too, is but a pitiful rood of ground, in comparison of the whole earth besides, and this whole globe of earth, which we account so immense a body, is but one point or atom in relation to those numberless worlds that are scattered up and down in the infinite space of the sky which we behold.

The other many inconveniences of grandeur I have spoken of dispersedly in several chapters; and shall end this with an ode of Horace, not exactly copied, but rudely imitated:—

HORACE, B. III. ODE I.

"Odi profanum vulgus," &c.

Hence, ye profane; I hate you all;
Both the great vulgar and the small.
To virgin minds which yet their native whiteness hold,
Not yet discolour'd with the love of gold,
(That jaundice of the soul,
Which makes it look so gilded and so foul),
To you, ye very few, these truths I tell;
The muse inspires my song,—hark, and observe it well.
We look on men, and wonder at such odds
Twixt things that were the same by birth;
We look on kings as giants of the earth,
These giants are but pigmies to the gods.
The humblest bush and proudest oak
Are but of equal proof against the thunder stroke.
Beauty, and strength, and wit, and wealth, and power,
Have their short flourishing hour:
And love to see themselves, and smile,
And joy in their pre-eminence a while;
Even so in the same land,
Poor weeds, rich corn, gay flowers, together stand;
Alas! death mows down all with an impartial hand.

And all ye men, whom greatness does so please,

Ye feast, I fear, like Damocles:
If ye your eyes could upwards move
(But ye I fear think nothing is above),
Ye would perceive by what a little thread

The sword still hangs over your head:
No tide of wine would drown your cares;
No mirth or music over noise your fears:
The fear of death would you so watchful keep,
As not t' admit the image of it, sleep.
Sleep is a god too proud to wait in palaces,
And yet so humble too, as not to scorn
The meanest country cottages:
His poppy grows among the corn.
The halcyon sleep will never build his nest
In any stormy breast.

'Tis not enough that he does find
Clouds and darkness in the mind;
Darkness but half his work will do:
'Tis not enough; he must find quiet too.
The man, who, in all wishes he does make,
Does only nature's counsel take,
That wise and happy man will never fear
The evil aspects of the year:
Nor tremble, though two comets should appear:
He does not look in almanacs to see Whether he fortunate shall be;

Let Mars and Saturn in the heavens conjoin,
And what they please against the world design,
So Jupiter within him shine.
If of your pleasures and desires no end be found,
God to your cares and fears will set no bound.
What would content you? who can tell?
Ye fear so much to lose what ye have got,
As if ye liked it well:
Ye strive for more, as if ye liked it not.
Go level hills, and fill up seas,
Spare nought that may your wanton fancy please:
But, trust me, when you have done all this,
Much will be missing still, and much will be amiss.

THREE GERMAN LEGENDS.

1.—HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

[We have drawn largely this time on the "Lays and Legends of various Nations;" but the new number, being another on "Germany," the most legendary of all nations, naturally tempts us; and our temptation is made virtuous by the excellent morals of what we quote.]

On a sultry Summer evening, Henry, Bishop of Halberstadt, and a foreign Bishop, who had been his guest for a month, were seated on the lawn before the castle of Gruningen. On a table before them stood, in two massive cups, their night drink. From ten o'clock in the morning, when they had seated themselves to their mid-day meat, their conversation had turned upon a mighty wine tun which had been constructed for a Bishop on the banks of the Rhine, and upon the propriety of every noble ecclesiastic having a similar one, for the purpose of giving suitable splendour to his residence. The question at length became so thoroughly exhausted, that the conversation began to flag, and was carried on for the most part slowly and in monosyllables, being from time to time interrupted by the yawnings of both parties.

Fortunately, at this moment Conrad, the shepherd, brought into the court-yard of the castle his well-tended flock, which Bishop Henry himself always counted over every evening. 'God greet thee, my lord Bishop.' 'Good evening to you, Conrad; where is the ram?' Conrad whistled, and a large handsome ram came bounding forth to the shepherd, and then to the Bishop, who stroked him, and fed him with crumbs of bread, which he had laid by on the table for the purpose. The Bishop then conversed for a minute or two with the shepherd, and asked him, jocosely, 'when his wedding was to take place?' Conrad was a little confused by the question, and withdrew, followed by his flock.

When he was gone, the Bishop began expatiating upon the beauty of the ram, which nothing could induce him to part with, and then upon his good shepherd Conrad, who was honesty itself. The foreign Bishop laughed at this declaration; for much travelling, and frequent residence at various princely courts, had filled him with distrust in his fellow-creatures. He maintained that it was impossible to find a really honest servant, at least in the retinue of an ecclesiastic; for they would all deceive their masters, and were all knaves more or less.

Bishop Henry contradicted this with great earnestness, praised the worthy disposition of the people over whom he wielded his crozier, but above all, Conrad the shepherd, who had never told him an untruth, nor deceived him in the most trifling affair. 'What, has Conrad never yet told you a lie,—never deceived you,—never betrayed his master?' said the foreign Bishop sarcastically. 'No,' answered Henry warmly, in defence of his retainer, 'Conrad never has been, nor ever will be, guilty of such conduct.' 'No!' repeated the foreign Bishop: 'what wager would you venture upon that?'

After sundry proposals, the Bishops at length agreed to support their opinions by a wager of a wine-tun, which should hold one hundred and fifty butts of wine. And, within three days, Conrad was, without being made aware of it, to be put to the test. This done, they took leave of one another for the night, well pleased to have found a fresh source of amusement for the next few days, and each feeling certain of victory.

The foreign Bishop, however, before retiring to rest, entered, as was his wont, into conversation and council with his servant Peter. This Peter, who was nominally only the servant and professed jester of the Bishop, was in fact much more his secret adviser than many of those who flattered it in titles and bands; and to him the Bishop looked for advice and assistance in all his difficulties, spiritual and temporal. Peter was accustomed to hear, to see, and occasionally to think for his master, without any body suspecting it; and this he had already done upon the very subject in question.

This evening he was, however, not in a very communicative humour; but the Knave, whom his master had made acquainted with everything, was vexed at heart, and it was only his master's promise of a new scarlet cap in case of winning the wager, which at all induced him to open his lips. After many biting remarks upon the cost of a wine tun which would hold a hun dred and fifty butts of wine, and come to more than half the yearly income of the bishoprick, he at length undertook to discover by what means this Conrad—this paragon pattern, and phoenix of honesty, as lord and servant jestingly called him, was to be tempted.

No sooner did the sun arise, than Peter set to work to bring about the object decided upon on the previous evening; and before noon he was enabled to tell his master that Conrad had a sweetheart, the pretty Lisette, but who would hear nothing of his passion till he had a house of his own to take her to, so poor were they both. The industrious Peter had himself already spoken to Lisette, and found her both ready and willing to assist in the scheme which he had devised. And all that he now had to ask from his master was a small sum of money to ensure the winning of this huge wine-tun. The bishop gave him what he desired, and seated himself in good heart at the table.

Peter then returned to the pretty Lisette, shewed her the money which he had got, and they discoursed together about a cottage which a poor widow in the neighbourhood had long wanted to dispose of; and Peter ended by promising to give Lisette the purchase-money for it, as soon as she had brought what he wished for.

On the following morning Lisette set to work in a spot past which Conrad must necessarily drive his flock. No sooner did Conrad see her in the distance, than he flew to her, accompanied by his favourite ram, and repeated to her all that he had previously told her, over and over again, to gain her consent to their marriage. But to all this Lisette answered him very coolly—that she had heard it a thousand times before, and if he had nothing more to say to her about a house of his own to take her to, that he knew very well what her determination was.

Conrad was about to take his leave with a troubled heart, when a half friendly glance from Lisette made him turn round and ask her, why she always behaved so coolly towards him, and what he should do to please her? 'Well, for the novelty of the thing, let us see whether you will do anything that I ask you,' said Lisette (the bishop's favourite ram had thrust himself between her and Conrad, and was eating bread out of her hand); 'will you, then, give me this ram, that I may sell it?'

Conrad's heart fell when he heard this request. Sorrowfully he replied, 'Everything in the world besides, but not that. If the bishop were not to feed my ram every evening, I should be sure to meet with some disaster. Take the ten best sheep of the flock, take the whole fifty of them that belong to me, but leave me the ram.'

'Well,' said Lisette; 'what a pattern of a man you are! But begone with your fifty sheep! Well! you are a pretty bridegroom, indeed, to refuse me such a trifle! You would certainly be a very good-natured husband when the honeymoon was over! Go, go to the bishop, let him feed your pet ram; and you may kiss his great toe into the bargain!'

Thus did they contend for awhile together. Conrad wept for very sorrow. Lisette, at least, acquainted him that she had sold the ram for the little cottage which they had both so often wished for, and that she must give it up that day, let it cost what it might, for she had passed her word to that effect, and would not be convicted of a falsehood, be the consequences what they might; she then dropped a few tears, to think that anything should have marred the unexpected joy she felt, at being able to purchase a snug dwelling, in which both themselves and their children might live so happy together; and then again enquired whether sheep did not die every day; whether they were never lost or stolen; and whether the wolf never ate any of the numbered flocks?

Love at length gained the victory. Conrad clapped his hands, and promised that before noon the ram should be her's; whereupon, Lisette gave Conrad her hand and promise, that in a month's time she would become his wife; and added a kiss to the bargain, as a sort of earnest money.

Lisette made the best of her way back to the village, and Conrad watched her as long as he could see her. The joy of his betrothing was, however, sorely troubled at the thoughts of the enquiries of his powerful, but at the same time, kind hearted master, in whose service he had hitherto conducted himself with such propriety, and who was so very fond of this favourite beast.

And he stood alone in the field where Lisette had been occupied, with his eyes fixed on the earth. At last he thrust his crook into the ground, hung his cloak over it, placed his bonnet on the top of it, and then began a series of soliloquies, or dialogues, whichever they may be called, in which he was occasionally assisted by the action of the ram.

'God greet you, my lord Bishop!—' 'Good even to you, Conrad; but where's the ram?' 'Ram, lord Bishop! why the ram is lost. I mean it has really strayed away.—(The beast, just as he was speaking, thrust himself between his master's feet, as if to eye the strange image before which he kept bowing so respectfully). 'Conrad, Conrad!' with a shake of the head, 'he is accustomed to be fed so regularly, I am sure he would not stray away—that won't do!'

A second dialogue, in which Conrad described the ram as having been stolen, was interrupted by a powerful blow with which the beast returned his master's bow. 'You would not suffer yourself to be taken very easily, so that won't do.'

He continued for a full half hour conversing with himself in this manner, ending every excuse with a shake of the head, and a 'Conrad! that won't do!'

'And yet,' added he, 'I must part with the poor brute before noon, for I have promised to do so, and if Lisette does not give him to the person to whom she has sold him, she will be a cheat, and can never be my wife!'

At last he jumped for joy into the air, crying out, 'Honesty is the best policy! That will do—that will do!' He drew on his cloak, clapped his cap upon his head, and drove forward his herd. And yet, before noon, he handed over his favourite with a deep sigh to Lisette, who exchanged him for the purchase money of the cottage, without troubling her brains much upon the subject.

The evening was appointed for the trial of Conrad's honesty—a trial of which he had not the slightest suspicion. The bishops were, as usual, seated at their night drink, expecting the arrival in the palace court-yard of the shepherd, who was to decide their wager. They spoke but little, for each was anxious to leave to his friend the honour and expense of constructing the huge wine-tun.

Peter, the secret councillor, was in high spirits; and laughing to himself, rejoiced beforehand at the victory and success of his well laid plan. For he had the pet sheep in his possession, and felt sure that Conrad would never venture to speak the plain truth, whereby he would be certain to draw down upon himself the anger and high displeasure of his all powerful master, and get dismissed from his service.

Thus thought Peter, the secret adviser. In the meanwhile, Conrad drove his herd into the palace court, right before the bishops. Peter smiled, for he read, or he fancied he read, fear and anxiety in the countenance of the shepherd.

This evening, however, no favourite ram gambled before Bishop Henry, to eat the bread from his hand. 'Where is the ram?' enquired the bishop, with a significant glance. Conrad answered with a firm voice, 'I have sold it!—there, the truth is out—honesty is the best policy. That is my favourite saying, as you know, my lord bishop; and, by God's grace, my favourite saying it shall continue to be!'

Peter's visage lengthened considerably, but Bishop Henry called out, 'Way have you sold it without speaking to me? I would rather have paid ten times the sum it fetched. Don't you know that?'

'Lord Bishop,' said Conrad, 'pray hear me. Lisette has betrayed me, as Eve before her betrayed Adam; and a knave has betrayed Lisette, as the Evil One of old did Eve. If he will give me my ram again, I will not say who he is. (Peter turned away full of rage, for gone was his money, gone his promised cap of scarlet, and all hopes of a drinking bout, which he had calculated upon at the end of the business). Lisette had sold the beast without first speaking to me about it, otherwise it would not have happened. But as she had done so, I felt bound to give him up, how much soever I might be grieved at doing so, otherwise she would have told a lie, and would not have been what she is now to be—my wife. That is the real truth, lord bishop; so now do with me as you please. What is done, is done, but do not punish Lisette; a weak head is soon betrayed by a serpent.'

Bishop Henry would have scolded him, but the strange bishop said, with a troubled side glance to Peter, who was making off from the scene, 'I have lost my wager: that was the proof.'

And bishop Henry chided not. The pleasure of winning the wager consoled him; but the honesty of Conrad delighted him more than gaining the wine-tun, and he acknowledged the power of love.

'Verily,' cried the two bishops, 'Honesty is the best policy.' And Bishop Henry said, 'As a reward for thine honesty, I will be at the charge of thy wedding, and the half of the flock shall be thine.' 'And,' continued the other bishop, 'thou art welcome to thy ram again, and thou shalt still keep the cottage, as a christening present to thy first child!'

And the bishop who lost the wager caused the large wine-tun to be built, which formerly brought so many travellers to Groningen, and which is now on the Spigelsberg, near Halberstadt.

III. HANS JAGUENTEUFEL.

It is commonly believed that if any person is guilty of a crime for which he deserves to lose his head, he will, if he escape punishment during his life time, be condemned after his death to wander about with his head under his arm.

In the year 1644, a woman of Dresden went out early one Sunday morning into a neighbouring wood for the purpose of collecting acorns. In an open space, at a spot not very far from the place which is called Lost Water, she heard somebody blow a very strong blast upon a hunting horn, and immediately afterwards a heavy fall, as though a large tree had fallen to the ground. The woman was greatly alarmed, and concealed her little bag of acorns among the grass; shortly afterwards the horn blew a second time, and on looking round she saw a man without a head, dressed in a long grey cloak and riding upon a grey horse; he was booted and spurred, and had a bugle horn hanging at his back. As, however, he rode past her very quietly, she regained her courage, went on gathering the acorns, and when evening came, returned home undisturbed.

Nine days afterwards, the woman returned to that spot for the purpose of again collecting the acorns, and as she sat down by the Fosterberg, peeling an apple, she heard behind her a voice, calling out to her, 'Have you taken a whole sack of acorns, and nobody tried to punish you for doing so?' 'No,' said she, 'the foresters are very kind to the poor, and they have done nothing to me; the Lord have mercy on my sins!' And with these words she turned about, and there stood he of the grey cloak, but this time he was without his horse, and carried his head, which was covered with curling brown hair, under his arm. The woman shrunk from him in alarm, but the Spirit said, 'You do well to pray to God to forgive you your sins, it was never my good lot to do so.' And thereupon he related to her how he had lived about one hundred and thirty years before, and was called Hans Jaguenteufel, as his father had been before him; and how that his father had often besought him not to be hard upon poor people, and that he had paid no regard to the advice that his father had given to him, but had passed his time in drinking and carousing, and all manner of wickedness. For which he was now condemned to wander about the world as an evil spirit.

III.—THE GREEN ROBE.

There were once three brothers, of whom the eldest ones always despised the youngest; and when they went out in the world to seek their fortunes, they drove him out of their company, saying, 'We have no need of you,—you must travel by yourself.' So they left him, and he was forced to wander alone. And he came to a very high mountain, on the top of which was a circle of trees, and he was almost starved; he sat down under these trees, and began to weep. Scarcely had he seated himself before he heard a loud noise, and immediately the Evil One came to him, dressed in a green robe, and with a cloven hoof, and asked him what he was crying for. Then he told him all his misfortunes, and how his brothers had abandoned him. When the Evil One heard this, he said, 'Well, I can assist you; put on this green robe, it has pockets, which will always keep full of gold, let you use it as fast as ever you may; but upon this condition, that for seven years, you neither wash yourself, comb yourself, nor say your prayers. If you die during these seven years, you will be mine; if not, you will be free from your bargain, and be a rich man all the days of your life.' His necessities obliged him to agree to these terms; so he put on the green robe, and when he put his hands in his pockets, he found them quite full of gold.

Now he went forth into the world with his wonderful robe; and for the first year it was well enough, for he could purchase whatever he wanted, and passed off tolerably well among his fellow-creatures, but the second year did not go off quite so pleasantly; his hair had grown so long that nobody knew him, and he had grown so frightful that he could scarcely find any person who would let him into their houses. Every year matters grew worse; but he gave great alms to the poor, that they might pray for him, that he might not die, and fall into the power of the Tempter during the seven years. It was during the fourth year that he came to an inn, the landlord of which would not take him in—till he saw what large sums of gold he took from his pockets,—then he was glad enough of his company. During the night, Green Robe heard some one moaning bitterly in the next room; and when he went to hear what was the matter, he found an old man, who bade him go his ways, for he could not assist him. So he asked the old man what he wanted. He said he had no money, and that because he was in the landlord's debt, he detained him until he paid it. 'Then,' said Green Robe to him, 'I have money enough—I'll soon pay it;' and he did so, and delivered the old man.

Now it happened that this old man had three beautiful daughters; so he asked him to go home and marry one of them, in return for his kindness. He went; but when they arrived there, and the eldest saw him, she declared that she would never marry so frightful an object; and the second flew from her home, rather than do so; while the youngest said,—'Dear father, since you have promised as much, and this man helped you in the time of need, I will do what you desire of me.' Then Green Robe took a ring from his finger, broke it in half, gave her the one half, and retained the other for himself; and in her half he wrote his name, and in his half her's, and said they must take good care of them. After staying with her a little, he departed saying, 'Now I must leave you for three years. Be faithful unto me for this period, and I will then return and marry you; but if I come not back again in three years, you are free, for I shall be dead; but in the meantime, pray for me that my life may be preserved.'

During these three years, the two elder sisters mocked and laughed at the youngest, saying that she was going to have a bear for her husband, instead of an ordinary man. But she heeded them not, and thought, 'We should obey our father, come what may.' Meanwhile, Green Robe journeyed through the wide world, purchasing, wherever he came, the most beautiful presents for his betrothed; doing good to all, ill to none, and giving to the poor whatsoever they asked of him. And Providence rewarded him; for when the three years were past, he was still alive and hearty. So he went to the circle of trees upon the lofty mountain, and he heard the loud noise, and the Tempter came, angered and vexed at seeing him, and threw him back his old robe, and demanded the green one. This the youth handed to him quite joyfully, and so became free again, and a rich man for ever. So he went home, dressed and cleaned himself, and set forth to see his betrothed.

When he came to the door, her father met him, and he announced himself as the bridegroom; but the old man did not know him again, and would not believe him. Then he went to his future bride, but neither she believed him. Then he asked her if she had still got half of his ring. She said 'Yes;' and fetched it: and when he produced the other half, and she saw how they matched, she was assured that he could be no other than the bridegroom. And when she saw what a goodly man he was, she became deeply enamoured of him, and straightways they were married. But the two sisters were so grieved that they had rejected such good fortune, that on the day of the wedding, the one hanged, and the other drowned herself; and at night, a loud knocking was heard at the house, and when the bridegroom arose, and opened the door, he saw the Tempter in his green robe, who said, 'At all events, I have now got two souls instead of your one.'

MEDALS A KIND OF BOOKS.

(For the London Journal.)

We have, from our youth upwards, been addicted to the study of ancient medals. Ere the tail of our jacket exceeded a span in length, we were ever on the alert when we heard of the discovery of ancient treasure, and have often followed the plough, not as rural labourers, nor like the rooks to pick up the vermin so unceremoniously disturbed, but in the hope of seeing the plough-share bring to light some relic of the olden time.

We confess our relationship to the Dry-as-dust family; and let those, who will, sneer at our endeavours to eke out information from mould and dust and cobwebs; we have often derived both pleasure and profit from our examinations. Our business is now with a description of antiquities second only to the statuary of the ancients, those images, before which as Addison remarks, the politest nations of modern times have bowed the knee. Need we add, that we mean the coins of the Greeks and Romans, those minute relics upon which we certainly have the correct representation of many statues by the first masters of antiquity. The noble figure of Neptune, on a large brass coin of Hadrianus, resting his foot on the prow of a vessel, is evidently copied from a statue of the time, as are also the figures of Jupiter Stator, the deity to whom Cicero appeals in his tremendous orations against Catiline. But first a few words on the coins of the Greeks. Many obscure states struck coins and these are now almost their only remaining records. "When we compare," says Payne Knight, "the smallness and insignificance of many of these states, scarcely known to the historian or geographer, with the exquisite beauty, elegance, and costly refinement displayed in their money, the common drudge of retail traffic in the lowest stages of society, we must admit that there is scarcely any thing more wonderful in the history of man."

Of some Greek cities we have such an abundance of ancient coins that they are often sold at public sales for little more than their intrinsic value. The gold pieces of Carthage exist in great numbers, and although mostly of elegant fabric, bring but a trifle beyond the price of the metal of which they are composed. The coins of Sicily are common to excess, and of the most exquisite fabric; and the large silver medallions of Syracuse still remain in some numbers to delight the artist and the antiquary.* To enumerate the various emblems on the coins of the Greeks would occupy many volumes; plants, animals, weapons, armour, utensils, are given with surprising fidelity and spirit. Sicily displays her ear of barley and her fish; Carthage her palm-tree and horse; Corinth the Pegasus; Chios the Sphinx, and Athens her favourite badge, the bird of Minerva. In looking over a well arranged cabinet, we see the compositions of the first artists of antiquity: Hercules combats the lion and strangles Antæus; Bellerophon gives battle to the Chimera; the Dioscuri rush to the conflict with levelled lances; and Diana with buskined leg and curtailed tunic, directs her arrow with unerring certainty, to the heart of the fated stag. Nor are the other deities neglected: Ephesus glories in the temple of her Diana, who is represented with numberless breasts; and Samos boasts her Juno. The truly noble and godlike head of Jupiter must be as familiar to every numismatic student, as his own image in a mirror; in fact, that extraordinary compilation of fables, the Mythology, can in no manner be studied better than in the coins of the Greeks and Romans. Of the money of the latter, we have an infinite number of specimens, containing portraits of nearly all the Emperors, many of the Emperesses, and Cæsars, and several of those of the Consuls, not forgetting the heads of the early kings, Ancus and Numa; but the latter are found on coins of a period posterior to their reigns, and were struck by families who boasted their descent from those princes.

Having reached thus far we shall take occasion to mention a work which has been recently published and has received the approbation of our literary journals: it is entitled "A Descriptive Catalogue of Roman Coins from the earliest period of the Roman Coinage to the extinction of the Empire under Constantine Paleologus, by J. Z. Ackerman, F.S.A." This Catalogue which is comprised in two volumes octavo, contains a description of upwards of ten thousand coins, and is illustrated by numerous fac-simile engravings from the originals in the British Museum, and other public and private collections in this country and on the continent. It commences with the "As, a large piece of brass first issued in the time of the Roman kings." The account which Pliny gives of this money is not satisfactory, for he speaks of a sudden and considerable reduction in its weight, while pieces exist which show that the declension was gradual. Our information with respect to this early money is very limited, and we shall be glad to see an elaborate treatise on the subject. Next follow the coins denominated Consular: of these we have many hundreds and we have little doubt that the varieties enumerated by Mr. Ackerman are susceptible of considerable augmentation; but here are enough for a moderate collector, all the rare and interesting coins being accurately described, and in many instances illustrated by plates. One or two of the most remarkable coins of this series we shall take occasion to introduce to our readers, more especially as there are no doubt many who consider the study of medals as unprofitable and unamusing. A coin of the family Æmilia gives us a representation of the crowning of the youthful Egyptian king Ptolemy Epiphanes by the Roman Consul, Marcus Lepidus who is styled "tutor regis," (the king's guardian). Another coin of the same family bears the figure of an equestrian carrying a trophy, and has a legend which tells us that Marcus Lepidus at the age of fifteen had slain an enemy and saved the life of a citizen. Another coin of the family, commemorates the subjection of Aretas king of Arabia, by Æmilius Scæurus. Others of the consular series bear numerous interesting records; on a denarius of the family Didia, we have the representation of a military punishment: on those of Tituria, the rape of the Sabines and the guilty Tarpeia receiving the just reward of her treachery; while on a coin of Mamiliæ, Ulysses is recognized by his faithful dog, a representation which, as a contemporary observes, proves that the study of Homer was popular at Rome. From the Consular, or family series, we pass to that of the Emperors, the portraits of which (to say nothing of the reverses), might furnish a day's amusement, and a subject for a week's study. The bald head, and crane-neck of the first Cæsar must be familiar to every one, while that of his successor is indicative of the subtle policy which enabled him to triumph over his rivals, and secure to himself the triumph of the world.

We have much to say on the portraits of the Cæsars, but must reserve our observations for another opportunity, contenting ourselves with a word on the bust of Nero, as represented on his medals. How characteristic are the features of the despot! his short neck, sensual chin, and scowling brow, answer to the description of the historian, and convince us that we have on these relics most faithful portraits of the tyrants or philosophers, in whose reign they were issued.

Of the reverses of the imperial coins we could say much; but must limit our notices to a few which we take from Mr. Ackerman's work. At page 146, vol. I. we find a coin described which records the only virtuous act of the monster Tiberius—his munificence to the cities of Asia which had suffered severely in the tremendous earthquake described so eloquently by Tacitus. Galba (page 172, vol. I.) registers (or rather the Senate registers for him) the circumstances which led to his succession, and Vespasian and Titus chronicle with a sententiousness peculiar to the Latin language the destruction of Jerusalem; the simple words "JUDÆA CAPTA" (Judea captive) tell the sad history of that memorable siege. The scroll of the annalist has mouldered to dust, and time has erased many high sounding inscriptions; but the money of the Romans still exists to publish the fame which that mighty empire had acquired. In the vineyards of Italy, the peasant's spade turns up a denarius which once rattled in the money bags of the nummularius; it bears the word Judæa, and on it is portrayed the figure of that unhappy province weeping at the foot of a trophy. On the plains of France, where the bravest of Cæsar's legions earned their laurels, the same minute records are oftentimes discovered; and in England the descendant of the hardy tribes who opposed the hosts of the dictator, frequently turns up the coins of the masters of the world: the words JUDÆA CAPTA have been carried where even our gazettes have not travelled. What a lesson to those who have the direction of a national coinage! Gibbon justly observes, that "if all our historians were lost to us, medals and inscriptions would alone record the travels of Hadrian." To be assured of the truth of this observation, let the reader turn to page 241, vol. I. of the work under notice.

On the exquisite brass medallions of Antoninus Pius and of Commodus, we have many subjects of great beauty from the mythology of the ancients.

We shall conclude our notice for the present by an extract from vol. 2, p. 137, relative to the coins of Carausius, the admiral of the Roman fleet, in the reign of Diocletian and Maximian. This man having betrayed his trust, went over with the whole fleet to Britain, where he established himself as emperor. The emperors being unable to cope with him, agreed, as we are told to allow him the sovereignty of the Island, but he was assassinated not long after by his friend Allectus. During his stay in this Island he struck a number of coins, the most remarkable of which are those with the legend PAX AVGG. the three g's denoting the three augusti. The same is found on a few coins of Diocletian and Maximian, on which latter Mr. Ackerman offers the following remarks.

"The coins of Maximianus and Diocletianus, with these types, deserve especial notice. We learn from history that these emperors recognized the title which Carausius had assumed; but we know at the same time that they were not enabled to depose and punish the usurper. Mionnet, either doubting the authenticity of coins of these princes with AVGG., or passing them over through inadvertence, does not notice the types here described, although they are of considerable rarity. But we have no proof that they were struck by authority of Diocletianus and Maximianus; while on the other hand, there appear some grounds for believing that they were minted by the usurper himself. Many coins of Carausius bear AVGG.; and this is not surprising, for he would naturally publish the recognition of his titles by Diocletianus and his colleague: but those of the emperors, though very common with AVGG., are of rare occurrence with AVGG. Now it is somewhat singular, that the two coins in the British Museum with PAX AVGG. are in fabric, exceedingly like the rude coins of Carausius; so much so, that they might, if it were not for the legends, by a careless observer be supposed to belong to that personage. Eakhel (see Doct. Num. Vet.) after quoting a coin with virtus AVGG., observes that it bears testimony to the truth of the account of the recognition of Carausius by Diocletianus and Maximianus; but he does not notice that on the Continent these coins are of great rarity, and even in England are of unfrequent occurrence; a circumstance certainly in favour of the supposition that they were minted by Carausius."

ITALY.

(From the Second Part (just published) of Mr. D'Israeli Junior's, "Revolutionary Epick.")

Set the red sun, the silver moon upsprang,
And morn again its rosy radiance shed
Upon the purple mountains; o'er the plain
The sunbeam steals, and o'er the gloomy woods,
And into light the dusky rivers glide.
Then rose the song of birds from sunny trees,
Their leaves all quivering in the gentle air,
The primal breathing of the waking world;
Fair is the dawn, right fair, and full of hope,
Though crimson eve is memory's gorgeous dower;
Fair is the dawn, and poets love its breath:
But can its sunbeam on a fairer scene
Than thine, Italia, rest, when on the hill
The hooded convent crowns, it brightly falls,
Flanked by a single tree, the sea-born pine;
Or sparkling village with its tall thin tower
Mid orchards bowered, and fields of Indian grain,
With vines enclosed and ploughed by milk-white steers,
Calls into lucid life?

H. B. and the communication of our fair friend F. L. N. shall appear the first opportunity.

INDICATOR of Scarborough is informed, that the articles he speaks of were suspended on account of the difficulty of finding matter sufficiently "piquant" every week. But we are trying if we cannot revive them in some other shape.

We shall be glad to see a specimen of SAMUEL SQUARE-ACRES' dreaming. His most finished poetical performance was the one he put into the hand of the little sleeping beggar.

* One of the most interesting coins of the Greeks is perhaps that of Catania. When an eruption of Mount Etna destroyed that town, two young men bore off on their shoulders their aged parents to a place of safety: the act obtained for them divine honours in Sicily; and coins were struck with a representation of the brothers bearing their sacred burdens. Cæsar's Pompey, when he vainly endeavoured to avenge his father, struck a coin with the head of his parent on one side, and the type of the Catanian brothers on the other.

THE MUSICAL LIBRARY.

This work appears in numbers every Saturday, Price Fourpence; and in monthly parts, containing 36 pages of music, sewed in a wrapper, price 1s. 6d.

The principle which has been so extensively applied in Literature and the Graphic Art, of producing works at the lowest possible point of cheapness without any abandonment of the qualities by which the popular knowledge and taste may be advanced, has yet a wide field for its employment in the department of Music. This most delightful of the arts was never so generally cultivated in this country as at the present moment. The Pianoforte, especially contributes to the recreation and enjoyment of thousands of families throughout the United Kingdom, and in our colonial possessions. And yet the publications by which this taste ought to be kept up and improved, are sold at a price which, in many cases, amounts to a prohibition.

The design of the 'Musical Library' is to afford the same advantage to amateurs in music that the lovers of literature are deriving from the cheap publications for the advancement of real knowledge that are now distributed through every part of the Empire, and are placed within the reach of persons of every condition. It is proposed to publish a Collection of Music, both vocal and instrumental, by the best masters, ancient and modern: the ancient in a state adapted to the improved condition of our musical instruments; and the modern the best, and only the best, that the continent of Europe and our own country can supply. We shall revive and put into an inviting form the compositions of the older classical masters, now only known to a few connoisseurs, keeping in mind the saying of a famous French modiste,—"nothing is so new as that which is forgotten." At the same time, it will be our further object to naturalize the confessedly good productions of the newest foreign composers, especially of the German masters, by the republication, sometimes with English words, of their best vocal compositions; and also by publishing movements, or extracts, complete in themselves, from such of their instrumental works as are of a length unsuited to the 'Musical Library.' It is also our design, occasionally, to engage composers of the first eminence to supply us with new compositions; and we shall never neglect an opportunity of giving currency to such productions of real genius as may be offered to us by those who have no means of securing extensive circulation to them, and who might be deterred from publishing them on their own account. We thus hope to spread widely a taste for what is excellent in the various departments of the art, and render the best compositions available to the purposes of private society. In the execution of our plan we shall steadily keep in view the great principle, that excellence and cheapness are not incompatible. 'The bent of civilization is to make good things cheap.'

In the prosecution of these objects, which we may not unjustly consider likely to advance our national enjoyments, a weekly Number containing eight music-folio pages is devoted either to Vocal or Instrumental Music, so that these two classes of compositions may be separately bound. It would involve great practical difficulties to attempt to make every Number complete in itself; but as the intervals of publication between each Number are very short, little inconveniences will be experienced. Each Part, however, will be complete in itself, except under very peculiar circumstances.

Also, price 6d., sewed in a wrapper, to be continued monthly, SUPPLEMENT TO THE MUSICAL LIBRARY,

No. 4.

This Supplementary Work may be purchased independently of the Musical Library, which will be complete in itself; but it will form a valuable addition to that publication. It consists of twelve folio pages of letter-press, comprising musical news, origin and domestic; Reviews of important new musical publications; with memoirs of the Lives, and remarks upon the works, of eminent Composers, and especially of the authors whose productions are published in the 'Musical Library.'

In order that the volumes might in future contain the numbers of an entire year, the first volume closed with the supplement published December 31, 1832, and is published with a title and index, bound in cloth, price 6s. The second volume was published on January 1, 1834, price 7s. 6d. The two volumes are embellished with 468 engravings on wood.

THE PENNY CYCLOPEDIA

Of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Just Published, Part XVII., price 9d.

This work has now been published, with invariable regularity, since Jan. 1833; and the great circulation which it has attained is the best proof of the confidence of the public in the accuracy and completeness of its information. In the commencement of such an undertaking, the Editors, bearing in mind the difficulty of securing at once an efficient body of contributors, recommended to the Committee only to attempt the publication of six numbers in each month. Their present stock of materials, and their reliance upon their numerous coadjutors, founded upon ample experience, have induced them to desire that the work should proceed at a quicker rate. In this they feel satisfied that they only second the wishes of the great body of its purchasers.

The Committee have therefore to announce the following arrangements:—

1. That the First Volume of the Penny Cyclopædia—containing eleven parts—was concluded on the 30th of November; and published on that day, handsomely bound in cloth, lettered at 7s. 6d.
2. That, commencing with December, two numbers of the work will be published regularly every week without supplements, so that sometimes eight, and sometimes ten numbers will appear in each calendar month.
3. That on the 1st of January, 1834, part 12 was published, price 9d. and the monthly parts will be regularly continued at that price.
4. That on the 1st of September, 1834, the second volume, containing eight ninepenny parts will be published, bound uniformly with vol. I. at 7s. 6d.; and that the future vols. will be completed every eight months.

ENGLISH AND FRENCH FEMALES.

BRITISH COSTUME.

As Mr. Planché's curious and entertaining book on British Costume, and the following letter from a correspondent on the dress and gait of British ladies, happened to come into our hands at the same time, and led us to devote our principal article this week to such matters, we may as well introduce the letter in this place. The writer is very unmerciful on the ribbons, plumes, and other enormities of the present mode of dress, and having torn these to pieces, proceeds to rend away veils and gowns, and fall plumb down upon the pretty feet of the wearers, and their mode of walking: but when our fair readers see what he says of their faces, and call to mind how Momus found fault with the steps of Venus herself, we trust they will forgive his fury for the sake of his love, and consider whether so fond an indignation does not contain something worth their reflection.

FRENCH LADIES VERSUS ENGLISH.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,

It is Mrs. Gore, I think, in one of her late novels, who says, that ninety-nine English women out of a hundred, dress infinitely worse than as many French; but that the hundredth dresses with a neatness, elegance, and propriety, which is not to be paralleled on the other side of the channel. On my relating this to a fair relation of mine, she replied, "Very true,—only I never saw that hundredth."—Nor has any one else. Without exception, the English women wear the prettiest faces and the ugliest dresses of any in the known world. A Hottentot hangs her sheep-skin caross on her shoulders with more effect,—and it is from what I see every day of my life that I come to this conclusion.

I was the other day at a large shop at the west end of the town, where, if any where, we may expect to meet with favourable specimens of our countrywomen. Not a bit of it. There were a couple of French ladies there dressed smartly and tidily, one in blue and the other in rose-coloured silk, with snug little scuffy bonnets guiltless of tawdry ribbons or dingy plumes; and great was their astonishment at beholding the nondescript figures which ever and anon passed by. First came gliding out of her carriage with a languishing air, a young Miss all ringlets down to the knees—feathers drooping on one side of her bonnet, flowers on the other, and an immense Brussels veil (or some such trash) hanging behind; her gown pinned to her back like rags on a Guy Fawkes; a large warming-pan of a watch, secured round her neck by as many chains, gold, silver, and pinchbeck, as an Italian brigand;—with divers other articles, as handkerchiefs, boas, &c., which however costly and beautiful individually, formed all together an unbecoming and cook-maidish whole. Then came the old ladies—but I give them up as too far gone in their evil ways of dressing to hope for amelioration. Ditto for the widows in their hideous black bonnets, with a foot and a half of black crape tacked to each side like wings to a paper kite—the horned caps of Edward the confessor are nothing to them. The French damsels alluded to above, eyed one or two of these machines (they can go by no other name) with considerable attention, as if doubting the sanity of the wearer.

"One would not, sure, be frightful when one's dead," says Pope's Narcissa. I might address a similar question to English widows,

"One would not, sure, be frightful when one mourns." I looked from one end to the other of the crowded shop, in hopes of finding some happy lady to retrieve the honour of her country—but in vain. All wore the same ugly garment more akin to a night-shift than a gown; the same warming-pan watch and chains; the same fly-flapping bonnet with bunches of ugly ribbons. Altogether they formed an awkward contrast to the "tight, regular built French craft," as Matthew's Tom Piper calls them. This time, however, it was the English who were "rigged so rum."

And then their walk! Oh quondam Indicator! quondam Tatler! quondam and present lover of all that is good and graceful! could you not "indicate" to our English ladies the way to walk? In what absurd book was it that I read the other day that French women walked ill, because from the want of trottoirs in France, they get a habit of "picking" with one foot which gave a jerking air to the gait. The aristocratic noodle! whose female relations shuffle about on smooth pavements till they forget how to walk at all! I would not have them cross my grass-plot for the world. They would decapitate the very daisies. How infinitely superior is the French woman's brisk springy step (albeit caused by a most plebeian and un-English want of cause-ways), to the languid sauntering gait of most English dames! Nature teaches the one—the drill-sergeant can do nothing with the other. I wonder how they walked in the days of Charles II. Surely Nell Gwynne and my Lady Castlemaine walked well—and if they did, they walked differently from what they do now.

I hope that some good creature like the London Journalist, who believes in the improveability of all things, will take up this subject. A word from him would set English ladies upon trying, at least, to improve both in dressing and walking. There are models enough—look at the French, the Spanish, the Italians. They have not better opportunities for dressing well than we, and yet they beat us hollow. Why can't we have a basquina or mantilla, as well as any one else? Let us endeavour.

Above all, let no one suppose that the writer of these desultory remarks is in the least deficient in love and duty to his fair countrywomen. If he offends any of them, they must imagine that it has been caused by excess of zeal for their interests. Bless their bonnie faces! if we could screw English heads on French figures, what women there would be—surely!

AN OLD CRONY.

To enter properly into this subject, however trifling it may appear (as indeed is the case with almost every subject so called) would be to open a wide field of investigation into morals, laws, climates, &c. Perhaps climate alone, by reason of the variety of habits it generates in consequence of its various heats, colds, and other influences, will ever present an entire similarity of manners, whatever may be the approximation of opinion; but taking for granted, as is not unreasonable, that the progress of knowledge and intercourse will not be without its effect in bringing the customs of civilized countries nearer to one another, and that each will be for availing itself of what is best and pleasantest amongst its neighbours, it becomes worth any body's while to consider in what respect it is advisable or otherwise to modify the behaviour or manners accordingly. We can say little, from personal experience, how the case may be in the present instance with regard to French manners. We have a great opinion of Mrs. Gore, both as a general observer, and one that particularly understands what is charming in her own sex. On the other hand, from books, and from a readiness to be pleased with those who wish to please, and even from merely having passed through France in our way from another country, we have got a strong impression, that the "hundreth" French woman, as well as the hundreth Englishwoman, nay, the hundreth Italian, that is to say, the one that carries the requisite graces, the beau ideal, of any country to its height, is likely to be so charming a person, in dress and every thing else, to her own countrymen, that what Mrs. Gore says of the perfectly dressing Englishwoman, is precisely the same thing that would be said of the perfectly dressing Frenchwoman by the French, and of her Italian counterpart by the Italians. It is impossible, unless we are half-foreigners, or unless our own nation is altogether of an inferior grade (and then perhaps our prejudices and irritation would render it equally so) to get rid of some one point of national preference in forming judgments of this kind. Our friend the old Crony, we see, for all his connoisseurship and crony-ism, his regard for a certain piquancy of perfection in the French dress and walk, and his wish that his fair countrywomen would "take steps" after their fashion, cannot get rid of the preference in which he was brought up for the beauty of the English countenance. We have a similar feeling in favour even of a certain subjected manner, a bending gentleness, (how shall we term it?) in the bearing of the sweetest of our countrywomen, not exactly connected with decision of step nor perhaps with variety of harmony: for all pleasures run into one another, if they are of a right sort, and the ground of them true. Look at the paintings of the French, and you will find, in like manner, that their ideal of a face, let them try to universalize it as they can, is a French one; and so it is with the Spanish and Italian paintings, and with the Greek statues. The merry African girls shriek with horror when they first look upon a white traveller. Their notion of a beautiful complexion is a skin shining like Warren's blacking.

It is proper to understand, in any question, great or small, the premises from which we set out, the point which is required. In the dress and walk of females, as in all other matters in which they are concerned, the point of perfection, we conceive, is that which shall give us the best possible idea of perfect womanhood. We are not to consider the dress by itself, nor the walk by itself, but as the dress and the walk of the best and pleasantest woman, and how far therefore it does her justice. This produces the consideration of what we look upon as a perfect female; people will vary in their opinions on this head; and hence even so easy a looking question as the one before us, becomes invested into difficulties. The opinion will depend greatly on the temperament as well as the understanding of the judge. Our correspondent for instance, is evidently a lively fellow, old or young; and given a good deal rather to the material than to the spiritual; and hence his notion of perfection tends towards a union of the trim and the lively, the impulsive, and yet withal to the self-possessed. He is one, we conceive, who would "have no nonsense," as the phrase is, in his opinion of the possible or desirable; and who is in no danger of the perils, either of sentimentality or sentiment; either of an affected refinement of feeling, or any very serious perception of any sort. He is not for bringing into the walks of publicity, male or female, the notions of sequestered imaginations, nor to have women glancing and bashful like fawns. He is for having all things tight and convenient as a dressing-case; "neat as imported;" polished, piquant, well-packed, and with no more flowers upon it than serve to give a hint of the smart pungency within, like a bottle of attar of roses, or fleur d'épine. We do not quarrel with him. Chacun a son gout. Every man to his taste. Nay, his taste is our own, as far as concerns the improvement of female manners in ordinary. We do think that the general style of female English dressing and walking would be benefitted by an inoculation of that which we conceive him to recommend. We have no predilection in favour of shuffling, and shouldering, and lounging, of a mere moving onwards of the feet, and an absence of all grace and self-possession. We can easily believe, that the French women surpass the English in this respect, because their climate is livelier; and themselves better taught and respected. People may start at that last word, but there is no doubt that the general run of French females are better taught, and therefore more respected than the same number of English. They read more, they converse more, they are on more equal terms with the other sex (as they ought to be), and hence the other sex have more value for their opinions, aye, and for their persons; for the more sensible a woman is, supposing her not to be masculine, the more attractive she is, in her proportionate power to entertain. But whether it is that we are English, or fonder of poetry, in its higher sense, than of vers de société, or the poetry of polite life, we cannot help feeling a prejudice in favour of Mrs. Gore's notion about the "hundreth" Englishwoman; though perhaps the "hundreth" Frenchwoman, if we could see her, or the hundredth Italian or Spanish woman, would surpass all others, by dint of combining the sort of private manner which we have in our eye, with some exquisite implication of a fitness for general intercourse, which we have never yet met with.

Meantime, we repeat, that we give up to our correspondent's vituperations the gait of English females in general, and their dress also; though it is a little hard in him to praise the smallness of the French bonnet at the expense of the largeness of the English, when it is recollected that the latter are copied from France, and that our fair countrywomen were ridiculed on their first visit there after the war, for the very reverse appearance. But it is to the spirit of our mode of dressing and walking, that we object; and both are unfit either for the private or public "walk" of life, because both are alike untaught and unpleasant,—alike indicative of minds not properly cultivated, and of habitual feelings that do not care to be agreeable. The walk is as saunter or shuffle, and the dress a lump. Or if not a lump throughout, it is a lump at both ends, with a horrible pinch in the middle. A tight-laced Englishwoman is almost invariably a most painful sight; because her notion of being charming is confined to three inches of ill-used ribs and liver; while her head is either grossly ignorant of the harm she is doing herself, or her heart more deplorably careless of the consequences to her offspring.

Are we of opinion then, that the dress and walk of Englishwomen would be bettered, generally speaking, by taking the advice of our correspondent? Most certainly we are; and for this reason; that there is some sense of grace, at all events, in the attire and bearing of the females of the continent; some evidence of mind, and some testimony to the proper claims of the person; whereas, the only idea in the heads of the majority with us is that of being in fashion merely because it is the fashion, or of dressing in a manner to shew how much they can afford. This is partly owing, no doubt, to our being a commercial people, and also to the struggles which every body has been making for the last forty years to seem richer than they are, some for the sake of concealing how they have decreased in means, and others to shew how they have risen; but a nation may be commercial, and yet have a true taste. The Florentines had it, when they were at once the leaders of trade and of the fine arts, in the time of Lorenzo de Medici. It is to our fine arts and our increasing knowledge that we ourselves must look to improvement even in dress, in default of being impelled to it by greater liveliness of spirit, or a more convenient climate. We shall then learn to oppose even the climate better, and to furnish it with the grace and colour which it wants. In France, the better temperature of the atmosphere, as well as intellectual and moral causes, impels people to a livelier and happier way of walking. They have no reason to look as if they were uncomfortable. In the South of Europe, where everything respires animal sensibility, and love and music divide the time with business, the most unaffected people acquire an apparent consciousness and spring in the gait, which in England would be thought ostentatious. It gave no such idea to the severe and simple Dante, when (in the poetical spirit of the image, and not of course in the letter), he praised his mistress for moving along like "a peacock," and "a crane."

Soave à guisa va di un bel pavone,
Diritta sopra se come una grue.

Sweetly she goes, like the bright peacock; straight
Above herself, like to the lady crane.

Petrarch, speaking of Laura, does not venture upon these primeval images; but still he shews how much he thought of the beauty of a woman's steps! Laura too was a Frenchwoman, not an Italian, and probably had a different kind of walk. Petrarch, expresses the moral graces of it.

Non era l'audar suo cosa mortale,
Ma d'angelica forma.

Her walk was like no mortal thing, but shap'd
After an angel's.

In English poetry the lover speaks with the usual enthusiasm of his mistress's eyes and lips, &c., but he scarcely ever mentions her walk. The fact is remarkable, and the reason too obvious. The walk is not worth mention. Italian and (we believe) Spanish poetry abound with the reverse. Milton, deeply imbued with the Italian, as well as with his own perceptions of beauty as a great poet, did not forget, in his description of Eve, to say, that

Grace was in all her steps, Heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.

This moving and gesticulating beauty was not English; at least she is not the Englishwoman of our days. Mrs. Hutchinson perhaps might have been such a woman; or the ladies of the Bridgewater family, for whom he wrote his Comus. In Virgil, Oneas is not aware that his mother Venus has been speaking with him in the guise of a wood-nymph, till she begins to move away: the "divinity" then become apparent.

Et vera incesed patuit dea.

And by her walk the Queen of Love is known.

Dryden.

The women of Spain, and Spanish America, are celebrated throughout the world for the elegance of their walking, and for the way in which they carry their veil or mantilla, as alluded to by our correspondent. Knowing it only from books, we cannot say precisely in what the beauty of their walk consists; but we take it to be something between stateliness and vivacity,—between a consciousness of their being admired, and that grace which is natural to any human being who is well made, till art or diffidence spoils it. It is the perfection, we doubt not, of animal elegance. We have an English doubt, whether we should not require an addition or modification of something, not indeed diffident, but perhaps not quite so confident,—something which to the perfection of animal elegance, should add that of intellectual and moral refinement, and a security from the chances of coarseness and violence. But all these are matters of breeding and bringing up,—aye, of "birth, parentage, and education," and we should be grateful when we can get any one of them. Better have even a good walk than nothing, for there is some refinement in it, and moral refinement too, though we may not always think the epithet very applicable to the possessor. Good walking and good dressing, truly so called, are alike valuable, only inasmuch as they afford some external evidence, however slight, of a disposition to orderliness and harmony in the mind within,—of shapeliness and grace in the habitual movements of the soul.

We must postpone our remarks on existing male costume till next week, recommending the reader's attention meanwhile to the following extract from Mr. Planché's volume, a book, we suspect, that will be read wherever hat or bonnet is thought of; and that, we take it, is a pretty wide sphere, even in very serious countries.

MALE AND FEMALE COSTUME.

FROM THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND TO THAT OF GEORGE THE THIRD INCLUSIVE.

(Taken from Mr. Planché's History of British Costume from the Earliest Periods,—published by the Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge, and illustrated with one hundred and thirty-six wood-cuts.)

REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND.

With the restoration of the house of Stuart, Fashion also regained the throne, from which she had been driven by the stern and puritanical republicans, and, like the "merry monarch" with whom she returned, many were the mad pranks she played in the delirium of her joy, many the excesses she committed. Taste and elegance were abandoned for extravagance and folly; and the male costume, which, in the time of Charles I. had reached the highest point of picturesque splendour, degenerated and declined from this moment, and expired in the square coat, cocked hat, full-bottomed wig, and jack-boots of the following century.

The birth of these odious articles may be traced to Charles the Second's reign; at the commencement of which a few fantastical additions to the Vandyke costume injured but did not totally destroy it. The doublet was made exceedingly short, open in front, without any under waistcoat, and displaying a rich shirt, which bulged out from it over the waist-band of the loose breeches, which, as well as the large full sleeves, were exceedingly ornamented with points and ribands. Beneath the knee hung long drooping lace ruffles, and the falling collar of lace, with a high crowned hat and plume of feathers, still preserved some of its old gallant cavalier character; but the fashions of the court of Louis XIV. of France soon found their way across the water to "White Hall Stairs;" and the servile imitation of the courtiers of the Grande Monarque gave rise to that absurd and detestable monstrosity, a periwig. His majesty, it appears, when a little boy, had remarkably beautiful hair, which hung in long waving curls upon his shoulders, and the courtiers, out of compliment to their young sovereign, had heads of false hair made to imitate his natural locks, which obtained the name of perukes. When the king grew up, he returned the compliment by adopting the article himself, and the peruke or peruke speedily lodged upon the heads and shoulders of all the gentlemen of England, under the corrupted appellation of a periwig.

"Misfortunes never come single," says the Proverb; so extraordinary a head-dress as the periwig demanded a different covering to the high crowned hat or broad-leaved Spanish Sombrero. Down went the crowns, and up went the brims at the side; a row of feathers was placed round it in lieu of the chivalric plume, and the first approach was made to the cocked hats of the eighteenth century.

JAMES II. AND WILLIAM III.

The two brief reigns of James II. and William III. are distinguished by scarcely any novelty in the civil costume. * * * * The periwig became more monstrous, and it was the fashion of the beaux to comb their perukes publicly, for which purpose large combs of ivory or tortoise shell, curiously chased and ornamented, were carried in the pocket as constantly as the snuff-box, which had latterly also become an indispensable appendage to a fine gentleman. At court, in the mall, and in the boxes of the theatre, a gallant of these days combed his peruke during a conversation or flirtation with the same air that a modern exquisite would twirl his moustachios. The full bottomed wig was worn by the learned professions, and those who affected particular gravity. Farquhar, in his comedy of 'Love and a Bottle,' written in 1698, remarks that "a full wig" is imagined as "infallible a token of wit as the laurel."

The broad brims of the hats were now frequently turned up on two sides; they were ornamented by several feathers placed round them, or by bows of ribands. To turn up the brim or flap of the hat, was, in the language of that day, to cock it, and each gallant cocked his hat according to his own fancy, or after the style of some leader of fashion. One mode was called after the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth, the Monmouth cock.

THE FEMALE COSTUME

remained unaltered during the reign of James II.; but some Dutch fashions appear to have followed the court of William and Mary. The bosom, which had been for some years past indelicately exposed, was again consigned to the guardianship of the jealous and formal stomacher. The elegant full sleeve of the gown was replaced by a tight one, with a cuff above the elbow, in imitation of the coats of the gentlemen, from beneath which fell a profusion of lace in the shape of ruffles or lapets; and a long glove in the portrait of Queen Mary by Vischer, completes the envelopment of the arm in satin, lace, and leather. The hair, which had hitherto been permitted to fall in natural ringlets on the shoulders and seldom burdened with more ornaments than a jewel or a flower, was now combed up from the forehead like a rising billow, and surmounted by piles of ribands and lace, disposed in regular and alternate tiers, or the ribands were formed into high

* Holme spells it "perawicke." A letter was written by Charles II. to the University of Cambridge forbidding the members to wear periwigs, smoke tobacco, and read their sermons!

stiffened bows, like the late fashionable coiffure à la Giraffe, and covered or not, as it might happen, by a lace scarf or veil, that streamed down each side of the pinnacle. Farquhar, in his comedy of "Love in a Bottle," mentions the "high top-knots;" and Swift, "the pinners edged with colberteen," as the lace streamers were called. The fan in its modern, or what would now be termed "old fashioned" shape is seen in the hands of the Dutchess of Portsmouth and Queen Mary, having superseded its picturesque predecessor during the reign of Charles II.

With

vanished every relic of our chivalric costume except the sword, which still completes the full dress of the court of St. James's.

Square-cut coats and long flapped waistcoats, with pockets in them, the latter meeting the stockings, still drawn up over the knee so highly as to entirely conceal the breeches, but gartered below it; large hanging cuffs and lace ruffles; the skirts of the coat stiffened out with wire or buckram, from between which peeped the hilt of the sword, deprived of the broad and splendid belt in which it swung in the preceding reigns; blue or scarlet silk stockings, with blue or silver clocks; lace neckcloths; square-toed short-quartered shoes, with high red heels and small buckles; very long and formally curled perukes, black riding-wigs, bag-wigs, and night-cap-wigs; small three-cornered hats, laced with gold or silver galloon, and sometimes trimmed with feathers, composed the habit of the noblemen and gentlemen during the reigns of Queen Anne and

GEORGE I., (1714—27.)

Minuter fashions were, of course, continually arising and disappearing, adopted and named after some leader of the ton, or in commemoration of some public event. The famous battle of Ramillie, for instance, introduced the Ramillie cock of the hat, and a long gradually-diminishing plaited tail to the wig, with a great bow at the top and a smaller one at the bottom called a Ramillie tail, and the peruke itself a Ramillie wig, which was worn as late as the reign of George III. Tying the hair is said to have been first introduced by the noted Lord Bolingbroke. (See Nash's Collect. for Worcestershire, in 561.) The cocked hat had a variety of shapes in the reign of Queen Anne. In No. 526 of the Spectator, "John Sly, a haberdasher of hats and tobacconist," is directed to take down the names of such country gentlemen as have left the hunting for the military cock of the hat upon the approach of peace; and in No. 532, is a letter written in the name of the said John Sly, in which he states that he is preparing hats for the several kinds of heads that make figures in the realms of Great Britain, with cocks significant of their powers and faculties. His hats for men of the faculties of law and physic do but just turn up to give a little life to their sagacity; his military hats glare full in the face; and he has prepared a familiar easy cock for all good companions between the above mentioned extremes.*

THE REIGN OF GEORGE II. (1727—60), produced no alteration in the general character of the dress; but to the catalogue of wigs we find added the tye wig and the bob-wig, the latter sometimes worn without powder. The ramillie tail was followed by the pig-tail, which appears in prints of this reign as early as 1745, and some young men wore their own hair dressed and profusely powdered. In the Rambler, No. 109, dated 1751, is a letter from a young nobleman, who says his mother "would rather follow him to the grave than see him sneak about with dirty shoes and blotched figures, hair unpowdered, and a hat uncocked;" and in 1753, the Adventurer, No. 101, contains a description of the gradual metamorphosis of a green horn into blood. "I cut off my hair, and procured a brown bob periwig of Wilding, of the same colour, with a single row of curls just round the bottom, which I wore very nicely curled, and without powder. My hat, which had been cocked with great exactness in an equilateral triangle, I discarded, and purchased one of a more fashionable size, the fore corner of which projected nearly two inches further than those on each side, and was moulded into the shape of a spout." The fashion, however, soon changed, for we find he afterwards altered his hat by considerably elevating and shortening the fore corner of it till "it no longer resembled a spout, but the corner of a minced-pye."

This latter fashion was succeeded by a larger cocked hat imported from Germany, and distinguished by the name of the Keven-huller; and, at the commencement of the reign of

GEORGE III. (1760),

we are told, "hats are now worn upon an average six inches and three fifths broad in the brim, and cocked between Quaker and Kevenhuller. Some have their hats open before like a church spout, or the scales they weigh flour in; some wear them rather sharper, like the nose of a grey-hound, and we can distinguish by the look of the hat the mode of the wearer's mind."

* Nov. 12, 1728, John Sly writes to say he has seen of late French hats of a prodigious magnitude pass by his observatory

There is the military cock, and the mercantile cock; and while the beaux of St. James's wear their hats under their arms, the beaux of Moorfields wear them diagonally over their left or right eye. Some wear their hats with the corners, which should come over their foreheads, in a direct line pointed into the air. Those are the Gawkies. Others do not above half cover their heads, which is, indeed, owing to the shallowness of their crowns." The hat edged with a gold binding, the same informant tells us, was at that time the distinguishing badge of "the brothers of the turf." In 1770 the Nivernois hat was the rage. It was exceedingly small, and the flaps fastened up to the shallow crown, which was seen above them, by hooks and eyes. The corner worn in front was of the old spout or shovel-shape, and stiffened out by wire. Gold-laced hats were again general in 75; and in 78 were adopted by many to give them a military or distinguished air, and to escape the press-gangs that were remarkably busy in that year.*

Round hats began to be worn in the morning shortly after this date, and the French revolution in 1789, completed the downfall of the three-cornered cocked hat on both sides of the channel. It was insulted in its decay by the nickname of "an Egham, Staines, and Windsor," from the triangular direction-post to those places, which it was said to resemble; but a flat, folding, crescent-shaped beaver, still called a cocked hat, but more correctly an opera-hat, distinguished the beaux at the theatre, from whence it derived its name, and at full dress evening parties, till within the last few years, and the chapeau-de-bras, a small triangular silk article, the shadow of its gold-laced prototype, slipped under the arm of the courtier. The old original three-cornered cocked hat, banished from the fashionable world, has found a temporary refuge on the heads of the state coachmen of our royal and noble families, and enjoys a sort of life-interest in the pews of Greenwich and Chelsea Hospitals, dropping to the earth with its veteran wearer. The opera hat has given way to the crush hat, and the chapeau-de-bras is but just tolerated within the privileged precincts of the court.

The wig was likewise doomed to feel the influence of the French Revolution. During the latter half of the eighteenth century it had gradually diminished in size, and the practice of frizzing, plastering, and powdering the hair till it was at least as ugly as a wig, has even now some faithful followers. In 1772, a most macaw-like toupée and a portentous tail distinguished a macaroni (vide print, entitled Macaroni's Courtship, published Feb. 1, 1772); but the republican spirit of the Parisians revived the classical coiffure of Rome, and a "tête à la Brutus" put to flight the "ailes de pigeon" of the ancient regime. The bag still clings to the collar of the courtier, though the wig and even the powder has been gradually dispensed with, and a solitary pigtail is now and then seen reclining on an elderly gentleman's shoulder, as if only to remind us—

"That such things were,
And were most dear to us."

The square-cut coat and long flapped waistcoat of the reign of queen Anne and the first two Georges, underwent an alteration about the middle of the reign of their successor. The skirts were unstiffened, the waists shortened, and the art of the present court suit introduced. Cloth became the general material for the coat, and velvet, silk, satin, and embroidery were reserved for court dresses, or waistcoats and breeches only. The latter were, from the close of George the Second's reign, worn over the stockings, as at present, and fastened first by buckles and afterwards by strings. The shoes were worn with longer quarters and larger buckles.† The lace cravat was abandoned about 1735, and a black riband worn round the neck tied in a large bow in front.‡ To this succeeded white cambric stocks, buckled behind; and to them (about 1789) the modern muslin cravat, in which it was, at one time, the fashion to bury the chin. About the same period the shirt collar appeared and the ruffe vanished. The coat was made up with lapels and a tail, being cut square in front above the hips as well as the waistcoat, which, deprived of its flaps, was soon made as ridiculously short as it had previously been unnecessarily long. Pantaloon and Hessian boots were introduced about the same period: but from this time the fashions are in the recollection of most of our readers. Short boots and loose trousers the result of the visit of the Cossacks to London, have, together with frock coats, rendered our costume more convenient and less formal; and could we exchange the heavy and tasteless beaver hat for some light and more elegant head-covering, the dress of the present

* For this and several other interesting facts concerning the fashion of the long reign of George III., we are indebted to the notes and conversation of a highly esteemed octogenarian, whose veracity is as unquestionable as his memory is extraordinary.

† In 1777, the buckles on the coat and the buckles in the shoes were worn of an enormous size, and occasioned the production of a caricature, called "Buckles and Buttons, or I'm the thing, d'ne!" A beau with steel buttons dazzling a lady, is the subject of another caricature of the same year.

‡ This must not be confounded with the solitaire which was a black riband worn loosely round the neck almost like an order of knighthood. Vide portraits of Beffon, published by the Society of the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

day, if not so picturesque as that of Charles the First's time, would at least have comfort and durability to recommend it; and an Englishman, instead of being caricatured, as of yore, with a pair of sheers in his hand as uncertain what fashion to adopt, might remain contented, and described as—

"An honest man close buttoned to the chin, Broad cloth without, and a warm heart within."

In attempting to describe the

COSTUME OF THE LADIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, we fling ourselves upon the generosity of those of the nineteenth, as a mere catalogue of articles introduced by fashion in our later days would, to make it complete, occupy more space than our limits can afford; and the very contemplation of them in the innumerable prints of the time has nearly bewildered us. An intelligent writer on this subject has remarked, that Fashion, from the time of George I., "has been such a varying goddess, that neither history, tradition, or painting has been able to preserve all her mimic forms; like Proteus struggling in the arms of Telemachus on the Phœnic coast, she passed from shape to shape with the rapidity of thought." And Addison tells us that there is not so variable a thing in nature as a lady's head-dress, which rose and fell in his own memory above thirty degrees.

It is probable, however, that the inconstancy of fashion is not very much greater now than it was shortly after the Norman invasion, and in almost every succeeding century have we quoted the lamentations of some poet or historian over the caprices and extravagance of his contemporaries, male and female, lay and ecclesiastic. It is the multiplication of authorities that increases our difficulty with our information; but, on the other hand, (and we call the attention of our readers most particularly to this fact,) the costume of a nation is not disturbed by the introduction or abandonment of minute alterations and ephemeral fashions. Although we may scarcely find figures dressed or armed precisely alike in a dozen coeval monuments or paintings, the general character of the time is stamped upon all, and to that we have, at first from necessity, and, now upon principle, confined ourselves.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE, (1702-1714)

was brief as it was "happy and glorious." The dress of the ladies during the greater part of her short and gentle sway resembled, in its general features, that of the time of James II. and William III. The tower or commode was still worn, and the gowns and petticoats flounced and furbelowed so that every part of the garment was "in curl," and a lady of fashion "looked like one of those animals," says the Spectator, "which in the country we call a Friesland hen." But, in 1711, we find Mr. Addison remarking, that "the whole sex is now dwarfed and shrunk into a race of beauties that seems almost another species. I remember several ladies who were once very near seven feet high, and at present want some inches of five. How they came to be thus curtailed I cannot learn: whether the whole sex be at present under any penance which we know nothing of, or whether they have cast their head-dresses in order to surprise us with something in that kind which shall be entirely new; though I find most are of opinion they are at present like trees lopped and pruned that will entirely sprout out and flourish with greater heads than before." He confesses himself, however, highly pleased with the coiffure then in fashion, which, as may be seen from the later portraits of Queen Anne, was of a natural and consequently elegant description; the hair clustering in curls down the back of the neck; and though hair-powder was worn by some, her Majesty's chestnut ringlets are unsullied by that abominable composition.

The praise the essayist lavishes upon the ladies heads he is shortly, however, obliged to qualify by his reprobation of a new fashion that had sprung up a few months later. This was an introduction of the true heiress and successor of the fardingale—the enormous, inconvenient, and ridiculous hoop. In Sir Roger de Coverley's picture gallery, his grandmother is said to have on "the new-fashioned petticoat except that the modern is gathered at the waist." The old lady was evidently in the wheel fardingale, which projected all round, for the knight adds—"My grandmother appears as if she stood in a large drum, whereas the ladies now walk as if they were in a go-cart;" the whale-bone petticoat, on its first introduction, representing a triangular rather than a hooped appearance. In the months of July in that year, we find that it was swollen out to an enormous size, so that what the ladies had lost in height, they made up in breadth; and a correspondent, speaking of the fashionable country ladies at sixty miles distance from London, says, they can absolutely walk in their hooped petticoats without inconvenience.

Hoods of various colours were worn by ladies at the opera in 1711-12, and cherry-colour was the prevailing fashion of the latter year. Scarlet stockings were worn by fashionable belles, and the practice of taking snuff is mentioned in No. 344 of the Spectator as one that fine ladies had lately fallen into,

The practice of wearing black patches on various parts of the face is amusingly ridiculed in several papers, and its application to party politics satirized in the 81st number.

The affectation of a male costume by ladies for riding suits is repeatedly noticed and censured by the Spectator. In No. 104 is a description of a lady in a coat and waistcoat of blue camlet, trimmed and embroidered with silver, with a petticoat of the same stuff by which alone her sex was recognized, as she wore a smartly cocked beaver hat edged with silver, and rendered more sprightly by a feather; and her hair, curled and powdered, hung to a considerable length down her shoulders, tied like that of a rakish young gentleman's, with a long streaming scarlet riband. They also assumed the male periwig on those occasions, in addition to the coat, hat, and feather. An exceedingly little muff was in fashion in 1710-11, and a black silk mantua is mentioned in the pleasant story of Brunetta and Phillis, No. 80.

THE REIGNS OF GEORGE I. (1714-27), and GEORGE II. (1727-60) boast of Hogarth for their illustrator, and introduce small frilled or puff caps, loose gowns called sacques, and cloaks with hoods, termed cardinals. The hoop maintained its post, though it frequently changed its fashion. In 1735, we perceive it projecting all round like the wheel fardingale; the petticoat short and the gown without a train. In 1745 the hoop has increased at the sides and diminished in front, and a pamphlet was published in that year, entitled 'The enormous abomination of the Hoop-petticoat, as the fashion now is.' Ten years later, it is scarcely discernible in some figures, and in 1757 it re-appears, expanding, right and left, into the shape which the court dress of George III's reign has rendered familiar to us. In 1735 we find the heads still low and covered by small frilled caps, and flat gipsy-looking straw hats of moderate dimensions. In 1745-6 the caps are still smaller, but the hats larger; and a little bonnet tied under the chin appears almost of the last modern fashion. Aprons had become part of the dress of a fashionable belle during the early part of this century, and in 1744 they reached the ground. They were next shortened, and lengthened again before 1752, as a lady is made to exclaim in the Gray's Inn Journal, No. 7, that "short aprons are coming into fashion again." In the same year we find a successor to the hood in the capuchin or a new name for the old head covering. "Mr. Needlework, bid John come round with the coach to the door, and bring me my fan, gloves and capuchin in an instant." And in the eighth number of the same work is an advertisement of the sale by auction of "the whole stock of a coquette leaving off trade, consisting of several valuable curiosities, &c.," amongst which are mentioned "a transparent capuchin," "an elegant snuff-box with a looking glass within it, being a very good pocket companion for a beauty," directions for painting and the use of cosmetics, and "the secret of putting on patches in an artful manner, shewing the effect of their different arrangement, with instructions how to place them about the eye in such a manner as to give disdain, an amorous languish, or a cunning glance; translated from the French."

With regard to ornaments, the watch and etui adorned the waist; the jewelled necklace sparkled on the bosom, and bracelets were worn over the long gloves. Shortly after the accession of a necklace composed of several rows of gold chains, beads, or jewels, the first close round the throat, and the others falling in festoons one under the other, so as to cover the whole neck, was highly fashionable, and called "an esclavage," from the collar and chains with which the wearer seemed laden. In 1772, the print called a Maccaroni Courtship, exhibits the same ridiculous toupee and curls by which the gentleman's head-dress of the same day was made hideous. A pretty cap, called the wing or fly-cap, and resembling one still worn in Holland, concealed in some instances the deformity of the hair, revealing only the club in which it was worn behind: the cap was again surmounted by a bonnet laden with bows and bunches of ribands, and the gown was tucked up behind as country girls frequently wear it at this day. The maccaroni head-dress was followed by those mountains of curls, powder, flowers, and feathers, which rose "alp above alp" upon the foreheads of our stately grandmammæ, fulfilling the prophetic fears of Addison, and which, notwithstanding every body wore them, were as much laughed at and caricatured then as they would be at present. Several prints published in the years 1776-7, represent those head-dresses composed, like the figures in some of our recent pantomimes, constructed by the clown from the contents of the nearest green grocer or buttermilkman. In one called 'the Green Stall,' the long side curls are imitated by carrots similarly disposed, and in another the slanting summit of the mountain is laid out as in a parterre, and a gardener is seen at work in it! The 'Maiden Aunt,' published July 4, 1776, exhibits a parrot perched upon the powdered precipice, and completing with its wings and tail the ludicrous effect of the picture. In 1778 and 1783 we still meet with varieties of this fashion, which certainly is not exceeded in absurdity and ugliness by the horned and heart-shaped dresses of the fifteenth century. In 1783, a change appears to have taken place, and a flat-crowned, broad-brimmed straw or silk hat, surrounded with ribands, is worn upon the hair, which lowered atop, bulges out at the sides like a bishop wig profusely powdered, while two or three immense curls fall from beneath it upon the shoulders. In 1786-9, an improvement appears, which a modern writer attributes, in a great measure, to the taste of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Angelica Kauffman, Hopner, and the other painters of that day. The hair was worn full and flowing, we may almost say dishevelled; but powder maintained its ground till 1793, when it was discarded by Her Majesty Queen Charlotte and the Princesses, and at length disappeared, we trust for ever, from the toilets of a British beauty. Ladies wore white stockings even in mourning, as late as the year 78. Mrs. Damer, the eccentric and celebrated sculptor, is said to have been the first female who wore black stockings in England; which circumstance, combined with other peculiar habits, obtained for her the epithet of "Epicinean" in the newspaper epigrams of the day. Though the large hoop was, towards the close of the eighteenth century, only worn at court or in full dress, the pocket-hoop is ridiculed in 1780 by a print in which a girl so attired is placed beside a donkey laden with a pair of panniers. For the abolition of the court-hoop, we are indebted to the taste of George IV. The other excrescence lingered in fashion more or less till the French revolution in 89, which affected the female as powerfully as the male costume of Europe. Fashion, ever in extremes, rushed from high-peaked stays and figured satins, yard-long waists and hooped petticoats, into the lightest and slightest products of the loom, which clung round the form, whether graceful or ungainly, and were girdled absolutely under the armpits. Let those who have laughed at the habits of our ancestors—let the Lady Patroness of Almack's who would start back with horror at the idea of figuring in the wimple and gorget of the thirteenth, or the coat-hardie and monstrous head-dresses of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and even eighteenth century, peep into a lady's pocket-book or fashionable magazine, of which the cover is scarcely old—let her recal by such a glance the costume in which she paraded Bond-street and the park, as lately as 1815, or 20, (remembering at the same time that the fashions of the reign of Rufus or Henry V., have been rudely copied by monkish illuminators ignorant of the first principles of design, and their natural deformities made still more hideous by a total absence of taste and skill in the delineator, while those of the reigns of George III. and IV. have been displayed by creditable and even first-rate artists to the best advantage,) and then favour us with her honest opinion of the difference between the periods in ugliness and absurdity.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 23rd, to Tuesday the 29th of July.

A HOT DAY.

We have been reminded, in making extracts from other authors, that it might be taking no unreasonable or immodest advantage of our position to make one occasionally from writings of our own, especially as it might be of service to other publications, and the readers of the London Journal far outnumber any that may be supposed to possess the books from which we should quote. We should of course make no extracts that were not designated as such, and those who do possess the books will pardon us for old acquaintance sake, and because it is a convenience to us. The following passage is from the second edition of the "Indicator and Companion," lately published by Mr. Colburn.

A "NOW."

Descriptive of a Hot Day.

Now the rosy- (and lazy-) fingered Aurora, issuing from her saffron house, calls up the moist vapours to surround her, and goes veiled with them as long as she can: till Phœbus, coming forth in his power, looks every thing out of the sky, and holds sharp interrupted empire from his throne of beams. Now the mower begins to make his sweeping cuts more slowly, and resorts oftener to the beer. Now the carter sleeps a-top of his load of hay, or plods with double slouch of shoulder, looking out with eyes winking under his shading hat, and with a hitch upwards on one side of his mouth. Now the little girl at her grandmother's door watches the coaches that go by, with her hand held up over her sunny forehead. Now the labourers look well resting in their white shirts at the door of rural ale-houses. Now an elm is fine there, with a seat under it; and horses drink out of the trough, stretching their yearning necks with loosened collars; and the traveller calls for his glass of ale having been without one for more than ten minutes; and his horse stands wincing at the flies, giving sharp shivers of his skin, and moving to and fro his ineffectual docked tail; and now Miss Betty Wilson, the host's daughter, comes streaming forth in a flowered gown and ear-rings, carrying with four of her beautiful fingers the foaming glass, for which, after the traveller has drank it, she receives with an indifferent eye, looking another way, the lawful two-pence. Now grasshoppers "fry," as Dryden says. Now cattle stand in water, and ducks are envied. Now boots and shoes, and trees by the roadside are thick with dust; and dogs, rolling in it, after issuing out of the water, into which they have been thrown to fetch sticks, come scattering horror among the legs of the spectators. Now a fellow who finds he has three miles further to go in a pair of tight shoes, is in a pretty situation. Now rooms with the sun upon them become intolerable; and the apothecary's apprentice, with a bitterness beyond aloes, thinks of the pond he used to bathe in at school. Now men with powdered heads (especially if thick) envy those that are unpowdered, and stop to wipe them up hill, with countenances that seem to expostulate with destiny. Now boys assemble round the village pump with a ladle to it, and delight to make a forbidden splash and get wet through the shoes. Now also they make suckers of leather, and bathe all day in rivers and ponds, and make mighty fishing for "tittle-bats." Now the bee, as he hums along, seems to be talking heavily of the heat. Now doors and brick walls are burning to the hand; and a walled lane, with dust and broken bottles in it, near a brick-field is a thing not to be thought of. Now a green lane, on the contrary, thick set with hedge-row elms, and having the noise of a brook "rumbling in pebble stone," is one of the pleasantest things in the world.

Now, in town, gossips talk more than ever in rooms, in door-ways, and out of window, always beginning the conversation with saying that the heat is overpowering. Now blinds are let down and doors thrown open, and flannel waistcoats left off, and cold meat preferred to hot, and wonder expressed why tea continues so refreshing, and people delight to slobber lettuce into bowls, and apprentices water door-ways with tin canisters that lay several atoms of dust. Now the water-cart, jumbling along the middle of the street, and jolting the showers out of its box really does something. Now fruiterers' shops and dairies look pleasant, and ices are the only things to those who can get them. Now ladies loiter in baths, and people make presents of flowers, and wine is put into ice; and the after-dinner lounge recreates his head with applications of perfumed water, out of long-necked bottles. Now the lounge who cannot resist riding his new horse, feels his boots burn him. Now buckskins are not the lawn of Cos. Now jockeys, walking in great coats, to lose flesh, curse inwardly. Now five fat people in a stage-coach hate the sixth fat one who is coming in, and think he has no right to be so large. Now clerks in offices do nothing but drink soda-water and spruce-beer, and read the newspaper. Now the old-clothesman drops his solitary cry more deeply into the areas on the hot and forsaken side of the street, and bakers look vicious, and cooks are aggravated, and the steam of a tavern-kitchen catches hold of us like the breath of Tartarus. Now delicate skins are beset with gnats, and boys make their sleeping companion start up with playing a burning-glass on his hand; and blacksmiths are super-carbonated, and cobblers in their stalls almost feel a wish to be transported; and butter is too easy to spread; and the dragoons wonder whether the Romans liked their helmets; and old ladies, with their lappets unpinned, walk along in a state of dilapidation; and the servant-maids are afraid they look vulgarly hot; and the author who has a plate of strawberries brought him, finds that he has come to the end of his writing.

We cannot conclude this article, however, without returning thanks, both on our own account and on that of our numerous predecessors who have left so large a debt of gratitude unpaid, to this very useful and ready monosyllable—"Now." We are sure that there is not a didactic poet, ancient or modern, who, if he possess a decent share of candour, will not be happy to own his obligations to that masterly conjunction, which possesses the very essence of wit, for it has the art of bringing the most remote things together. And its generosity is in proportion to its wit, for it always is most profuse of its aid, where it is most wanted.

BIRTH-DAYS.

24th July, at Rome, 100 years B. C. (12 O. S. We know not whether the computation is very accurate, but he should be mentioned during the month, which was named after him), Julius Cæsar, one of the greatest men that ever lived, as far as a man's greatness can be estimated from his soldiership, and general talents, and personal aggrandizement. He had the height of genius in the active sense, and was not without it in the contemplative. He was a captain, a writer, a pleader, a man of the world, in the largest as well as most trivial points of view, and superior to all scruples, except those which tended to the enlargement of his fame, such as clemency in conquest. Whether he was a very great man in the prospective, universal, and most enduring sense, as a man of his species, instead of a man of his time is another question, which must be settled by the growing lights of the world and by future ages. He put an end to his country's freedom, and did no good that we are aware of to any one but himself, unless by the production or prevention of results known only to Providence.

July 26th, (14th O.S.) 1721, at one of the Orkney islands, where his family had settled during the Reformation, Sir Robert Strange, an engraver of true genius, knighted by George III.; famous for his congenial handling of some of the finest productions of Titian and others, particularly in the roundness and delicacy of his flesh. He was originally intended for the law; took up arms for the Pretender, partly to please the family of the lady whom he afterwards married; and was a most excellent, amiable man, the delight of his friends as well as of the connoisseur. He was so conscientious, however in the exercise of his art, and worked so hard at it, that he dreaded lest any of his children should adopt it as a profession, and was always anxious to keep the pencil out of their hands.

July 28th, (16.O.S.) 1723, at Plympton in Devonshire, the son of a schoolmaster, Sir Joshua Reynolds, the well-known portrait and historical painter, the greatest artist except Hogarth which this country is understood to have produced, till Wilkie rose to surpass him in correctness, and Edwin Landseer lately appeared, to surpass them all perhaps in the union of correctness and gusto. Hogarth remains unrivalled as a moralist and a wit on canvass; and Wilkie (of course, in no ill sense of the word), is the low humourist of his country; but Edwin Landseer is perhaps upon the whole the most perfect artist, and the least likely to be doubted by posterity, that has hitherto adorned the nation. Stothard however will be loved for his tenderness and grace; and we have a fine landscape-painter in Wilson. Sir Joshua Reynolds had colouring, elegance, and a taste for artificial refinement, which thoroughly suited his age; but he wanted drawing and real history, and tampered so with his colours that they do not last.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXIV.—STORY OF MADEMOISELLE DE TOURNON, RELATED BY MARGARET, QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

This story, which if we are not mistaken, has been worked up into a novel by Madame de Genlis, is taken from a translation of the autobiographical memoirs of the celebrated Margaret of Valois, Queen of Navarre, who seems to have been beloved by every body but her husband, Henry IV., who divorced her. Her mastery, who was sister of Kings Charles IX. and Henry III., and much used by them for court purposes, on account of her wit and persuasiveness, is relating a journey which she had been advised to make into the Netherlands, in company with the Princess de la Roche Sur Yon; and we have retained, in our extract, the circumstances immediately preceding and following the young lady's story, as a sort of frame and contrast to the picture, and a specimen of those gay court enjoyments which invested whatever happened in those times, however tragical.

The Bishop of Liege, who is the sovereign of the city and country, (says the royal autobiographer) received me with all the cordiality and respect that could be expected from a person of his dignity and great accomplishments. He was, indeed, a nobleman endowed with singular prudence and virtue; agreeable in his person and conversation, gracious and magnificent in his carriage and behaviour; to which I may add that he spoke the French language perfectly well.

He was constantly attended by his chapter, with several of his canons, who are all sons of dukes, counts, or great German lords. The bishopric is itself a sovereign state, which brings in a considerable revenue, and includes a number of fine cities. The bishop is chosen from amongst the canons, who must be of noble descent, and resident one year. The city is larger than Lyons, and much resembles it, having the Meuse running through it. The houses in which the canons reside, have the appearance of noble palaces. The streets of the city are regular and spacious, the houses of the citizens well built, the squares large, and ornamented with curious fountains; the churches appear as if raised entirely of marble, of which there are considerable quarries in the neighbourhood; they are all of them ornamented with beautiful clocks, and exhibitions of moving figures.

The bishop received me as I landed from the boat and conducted me to his magnificent residence, ornamented with delicious fountains and gardens, set off with galleries all painted, superbly gilt, and enriched with marble beyond description.

The spring which affords the waters of Spa, being distant no more than three or four leagues from the city of Liege, and there being only a village, consisting of three or four small houses on the spot, the Princess of Roche Sur Yon was advised by her physicians to stay at Liege, and have the waters brought to her, which they assured her would have equal efficacy, if taken up after sunset and before sunrise, as if drank at the spring. I was well pleased that she resolved to follow the advice of her doctors, as we were more comfortably lodged, and had an agreeable society; for besides his grace, (so the bishop is styled, as a king is addressed his majesty, and a prince his highness), the news of my arrival being spread about, many lords and ladies came to visit me. Amongst these was the countess d'Aremberg, who had the honour to accompany Queen Elizabeth to Mexiers, to which place she came to marry King Charles, my brother, a lady very high in the estimation of the empress, the emperor, and all the princes in christendom. With her came her sister, the Landgravine, Madame d'Aremberg, her daughter, Mons. d'Aremberg, her son, a gallant and accomplished nobleman, the perfect image of his father, who brought the Spanish succours to King Charles, my brother, and returned with great honour and additional reputation. This meeting, so honourable to me, and so much to my satisfaction, was damped by the grief and concern occasioned by the loss of Mademoiselle de Tournon, whose story being of a singular nature, I shall now relate to you, agreeable to the promise I made in my last letter.

Madame de Tournon, lady of my bed-chamber, had several daughters, the eldest of whom married Mons. de Balenson, governor, for the king of Spain, in the county of Burgundy. This daughter, upon her marriage, had solicited her mother to admit of her taking her sister, the young lady whose story I am now about to relate, to live with her, as she was going to a country strange to her, and wherein she had no relations. To this her mother consented; and the young lady being universally admired for her modesty and graceful accomplishments, for which she certainly deserved admiration, attracted the notice of the Marquis de Varenbon. The marquis was the brother of M. de Balenson, and was intended for the church; but, being violently enamoured of Mademoiselle de Tournon (whom, as he lived in the same house, he had frequent opportunities of seeing), he now begged his brother's permission to marry, not having yet taken orders. The young lady's family to whom he had likewise communicated his wish, readily gave their consent, but his brother refused his, strongly advising him to change his resolution, and put on the gown.

Thus were matters situated, when her mother, Madame de Tournon, thinking she had cause to be offended, ordered her daughter to leave the house of her sister, Madam de Balenson, and come to her. The mother, a woman of violent spirit, not considering that her daughter was grown up, and merited a mild treatment, was continually scolding the poor young lady, so that she was for ever with tears in her eyes. Still there was nothing to blame in the young lady's conduct; but such was the severity of the mother's disposition. The daughter, as you may well suppose, wished to be from under the mother's tyrannical government, and was accordingly delighted with the thoughts of attending me, in the journey to Flanders, hoping, as it happened, that she should meet the Marquis de Varenbon somewhere on the road, and that, as he had now abandoned all thoughts of the church, he would renew his proposal of marriage, and take her from her mother.

I have before mentioned that the Marquis de Varenbon, and the younger Balenson joined us at Namur. Young Balenson, who was far from being so agreeable as his brother, addressed himself to the young lady, but the Marquis, during the whole time we staid at Namur, paid not the least attention to her, and seemed as if he had never been acquainted with her.

The resentment, grief, and disappointment occasioned by a behaviour so slighting and unnatural, was necessarily stifled in her breast, as decorum and her sex's pride obliged her to appear as if she disregarded it; but, when, after taking leave, all of them left the boat, the anguish of her mind, which she had hitherto suppressed, could no longer be restrained, and labouring for vent, it stopped her respiration, and forced from her those lamentable outcries which I have already spoken of. Her youth combated for eight days with this uncommon disorder, but at the expiration of that time she died, to the great grief of her mother, as well as myself; I say of her mother, for though she was so rigidly severe over her daughter, she tenderly loved her.

The funeral of this unfortunate young lady was solemnized with all proper ceremonies, and conducted in the most honourable manner, as she was descended from a great family allied to the queen my mother. When the day of interment arrived, four of my gentlemen were appointed bearers, one of whom was named La Boessiere. This man had entertained a secret passion for her, which he never durst declare, on account of the inferiority of his family and station. He was now destined to bear the remains of her, dead, for whom he had long been dying, and was now as near dying for her loss, as he had before been for her love.

The melancholy procession was marching slowly along, when it was met by the Marquis de Varenbon, who had been the sole occasion of it. We had not left Namur long, when the Marquis reflected upon his cruel behaviour towards the unhappy young lady; and his passion, (wonderful to relate!) being revived by the absence of her who inspired it, though scarcely alive while she was present, he had resolved to come and ask her of her mother in marriage. He made no doubt perhaps of success, as he seldom failed in enterprises of love, witness the great lady he has since obtained for a wife, in opposition to the will of her family. He might besides have flattered himself that he should easily have gained a pardon from her by whom he was beloved, according to the Italian proverb, che la forza d'amore non riguarda al delitto,—"Lovers are not criminal in the estimation of one another." Accordingly, the Marquis solicited Don John to be despatched to me on some errand, and arrived, as I said before, at the very instant the corpse of this ill-fated young lady was bearing to the grave. He was stopped by the crowd occasioned by this solemn procession. He contemplates it for some time. He observes a long train of persons in mourning, and remarks the coffin to be covered with a white pall, and that there are chaplets of flowers laid upon the coffin. He inquires whose funeral it is. The answer he receives is, that it is the funeral of a young lady. Unfortunately for him this reply fails to satisfy his curiosity. He makes up to one who led the procession, and eagerly asks the name of the young lady they are proceeding to bury. When oh! fatal answer! Love, willing to revenge the victim of his ingratitude and neglect, suggests a reply which had nearly deprived him of life. He no sooner heard the name of Mademoiselle de Tournon pronounced, than he fell from his horse in a swoon. He is taken up for dead and conveyed to the nearest house, where he lay, for a time, insensible; his soul, no doubt, leaving his body to obtain pardon from her whom he had hastened to a premature grave, and then to return to taste the bitterness of death a second time.

Having performed the last offices to the remains of this poor young lady, I was unwilling to discompose the gaiety of the society assembled here, on my account, by any show of grief. Accordingly, I joined the bishop, or, as he is called, his grace, and his canons in their entertainments at different houses, or in gardens, of which the city and its neighbourhood afforded a variety. I was every morning attended by a numerous company to the garden, in which I drank the waters, the exercise of walking being recommended to be used with them. As the physician who advised me to take them was my own brother, they did not fail of their effect with me; and for these six or seven years which are gone over my head since I drank them, I have been free from any complaint of Erysipelas on my arm. From this garden we usually proceeded to the place where we were invited to dinner; after dinner we were amused with a ball; from the ball we went to some convent, where we heard vespers; from vespers to supper, and that over, we had another ball, or music on the river.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

SWIFT.

A Treatise on Good Manners and Good Breeding.

It has happened, that in our first two extracts under this head, owing to a certain easiness in the temperament of the writers, the style has occasionally been more negligent than might have been looked for in models of composition, especially in that from Montaigne. We now present the reader with one, which the very infirmities of the author, his irritability and pride, conspired to render a sample of the very perfection of clearness and precision. Swift's distinction of a good style was "proper words in proper places;" and the passage before us is a triumphant exhibition of it. The treatise, throughout, is admirable, and calculated to be of the greatest service to every sensible reader who may happen to be in need of any of its precepts. The author, perhaps the greatest man of his time, had himself stood in need of bearing such precepts in mind, and may have profited by putting them down on paper; for though naturally subject to the infirmities above mentioned, he was scrupulous in observing certain laws of conversation, and till disease over-mastered him, was a very attractive companion.

Good manners is the art of making those people easy with whom we converse.

Whoever makes the fewest persons uneasy is the best bred man in the company.

As the best law is founded upon reason, so are the manners. And as some lawyers have introduced unreasonable things into common law; so likewise many teachers have introduced absurd things into common good manners.

One principal point of this art is to suit our behaviour to the three several degrees of men; our superiors, our equals, and those below us.

For instance, to press either of the two former to eat or drink is a breach of manners; but a tradesman, or a farmer, must be thus treated, or else it will be difficult to persuade them that they are welcome.

Pride, ill-nature, and want of sense, are the three great sources of ill-manners: without some of these defects, no man will behave himself ill for the want of experience; or what, in the language of fools, is called knowing the world.

I defy any one to assign an accident wherein reason will not direct us what we are to say or do in company, if we are not misled by pride or ill-nature.

Therefore I insist that good sense is the principal foundation of good manners; but because the former is a gift which very few among mankind are possessed of, therefore all the civilized nations of the world have agreed upon fixing some rules for common behaviour, best suited to their general customs and fancies; as a kind of artificial good sense to supply the defects of reason. Without which, the gentlemanly part of dunces would be perpetually at cuffs, as they seldom fail when they happen to get drunk, or engaged in squabbles about women or play. And, God be thanked, there hardly happeneth a duel in a year, which may not be imputed to one of these three motives. Upon which account, I should be exceedingly sorry to find the Legislature make any new laws against the practice of duelling; because the methods are easy and many, for a wise man to avoid a quarrel with honour, or engage in it with innocence. And I can discover no political evil in suffering bullies, sharpers, and rakes to rid the world of each other by a method of their own, where the law hath not been able to find an expedient.

As the common forms of good manners were intended for regulating the conduct of those who have weak understandings; so they have been corrupted by the persons for whose use they were contrived. For these people have fallen into a needless and endless way of multiplying ceremonies, which have been extremely troublesome to those who practise them and insupportable to every body else; in-somuch, that wise men are often more uneasy at the overcivility of these refiners, than they could possibly be in the conversation of peasants or mechanics.

The impertinences of this ceremonial behaviour are no where better seen than at those tables where the ladies preside, who value themselves upon account of their good breeding; where a man must reckon upon passing an hour without doing any one thing he hath a mind to; unless he will be so hardy as to break through all the settled decorum of the family. She determineth what he loveth best, and how much he is going to eat, and if the master of the house happeneth to be of the same disposition, he proceedeth, in the same tyrannical manner, to prescribe in the drinking part; at the same time you are under the necessity of answering a thousand apologies for your entertainment. And, although a good deal of this humour is pretty well worn off among people of the best fashion, yet too much of it still remaineth, especially in the country; where, an honest gentleman assured me, that having been kept four days against his will at a friend's house with all the circumstances of hiding his boots, locking up the stable, and other contrivances of the like nature, he could not remember, from the moment he came into the house to the moment when he left it, any one thing, wherein his inclination was not directly contradicted; as if the whole family had entered into a combination to torment him.

But besides all this, it would be endless to recount the many foolish and ridiculous accidents I have observed among these unfortunate proselytes to ceremony. I have seen a dutchess fairly knocked down by the precipitances of an officious coxcomb, running to save her the trouble of opening a door. I remember, upon a birthday at court, a great lady was utterly disconsolate by a dish of sauce let fall by a page directly upon her head-dress and brocade; while she gave a sudden turn to her elbow upon some point of ceremony with the person who sat next to her. Mons. Buys, the Dutch envoy, whose politics and manners were much of a size, brought a son with him, about thirteen years old, to a great table at court. The boy and his father whatever they put on their plates they first offered round in order, to every person in company, so that we could not get a minute's quiet during the whole dinner. At last their two plates happened to encounter, and with so much violence, that, being china, they broke in twenty pieces; and stained half the company with wet sweetmeats and cream.

There is a pedantry in manners, as in all arts and sciences; and sometimes in trades. Pedantry is properly the over-rating of any kind of knowledge we pretend to. And if that kind of knowledge be a trifle in itself, the pedantry is the greater. For which reason, I look upon fiddlers, dancing-masters, heralds, masters of the ceremony, &c. to be greater pedants than Lipsius, or the elder Scaliger. With these pedants, the court, while I knew it, was always plentifully stocked; I mean from the gentleman usher (at least) inclusive; down to the gentleman-porter, who are, generally speaking, the most insignificant race of people that this island can afford; and with the smallest tincture of good manners, which is the only trade they profess. For, being wholly illiterate, and conversing chiefly with each other, they reduce the whole system of breeding within the forms and circles of their several offices; and as they are below the notice of ministers, they live and die in court, under all revolutions, with great obsequiousness to those who are in any degree of credit or favour, and with rudeness and insolence to everybody else. From whence I have long concluded, that good manners are not a part of the court growth; for if they were, those people who have understandings directly of a level for such acquirements, who have served such long apprenticeships to nothing else, would certainly have picked them up. For as to the great officers who attend the prince's person, or councils, or preside in his family, they are a transient body, who have no better title to good manners than their neighbours, nor will probably have recourse to gentlemen-ushers for instruction. So that I know little to be learned at court upon this head, except in the material circumstance of dress; wherein the authority of the maids of honour must indeed be allowed to be almost equal to that of a favourite actress.

I remember a passage my lord Bolingbroke told me; that, going to receive Prince Eugene of Savoy at his landing, in order to conduct him immediately to the queen, the prince said he was much concerned he could not see her majesty that night; for Mons. Hoffman (who was then by) had assured his highness that he could not be admitted into her presence with a tied-up periwig; that his equipage was not arrived, and that he had endeavoured in vain to borrow a long one among all his valets and pages. My lord turned the matter to a jest, and brought the prince to her majesty, for which he was highly censured by the whole tribe of gentlemen-ushers, among whom, Mons. Hoffman, an old dull resident of the emperor's, had picked up this material point of ceremony; and which, I believe, was the first lesson he had learned in five-and-twenty years residence.

I make a difference between good-manners and good-breeding, although, in order to vary my expression, I am sometimes forced to confound them. By the first, I only understand the art of remembering and applying certain settled forms of general behaviour. But good-breeding is of a much larger extent; for, besides an uncommon degree of literature sufficient to qualify a gentleman for reading a play, or a political pamphlet, it taketh in a great compass of knowledge; no less than that of dancing, fighting, gaming, making the circle of Italy, riding the great horse, and speaking French: not to mention some other secondary or subaltern accomplishments, which are more easily acquired. So that the difference between good-breeding and good-manners lieth in this, that the former cannot be attained to by the best understandings without study and labour; whereas a tolerable degree of reason will instruct us in every part of good manners without other assistance.

I can think of nothing more useful upon this subject than to point out some particulars wherein the very essentials of good manners are concerned, the neglect or perverting the which doth very much disturb the good commerce of the world, by introducing a traffic of mutual uneasiness in most companies.

First, a necessary part of good manners is a punctual observance of time, at our own dwellings, or those of others, or at third places; whether upon matter of civility, business, or diversion; which rule, though it be a plain dictate of common reason, yet the greatest minister* I ever knew was the greatest trespasser against it; by which all his business doubled upon him and placed him in a continual arrear. Upon which I often used to rally him as deficient in point of good-manners. I have known more than one ambassador, and secretary of state, with a very moderate portion of intellectuals, execute their offices with good success and applause, by the mere force of exactness and regularity. If you duly observe time for the service of another, it doubles the obligation: if upon your own account, it would be manifest folly as well as ingratitude to neglect it; if both are concerned, to make your equal or your inferior attend on you to your own advantage, is pride and injustice.

Ignorance of forms cannot properly be styled ill manners, because forms are subject to frequent changes; and consequently being not founded upon reason are beneath a wise man's regard. Besides, they vary in every country; and after a short period of time, very frequently in the same, so that a man who travelleth must needs be at first a stranger to them in every court through which he passes; and, perhaps, at his return as much a stranger in his own and after all, they are easier to be remembered or forgotten than faces or names.

Indeed, among the many impertinencies which superficial young men bring with them from abroad, this bigotry of forms is one of the principal and more predominant than the rest: who look upon them not only as if they were matters capable of admitting of choice, but even as points of importance: and therefore are zealous upon all occasions to introduce and propagate the new forms and fashions they have brought back with them. So that, usually speaking, the worst bred person in company is a young traveller just returned from abroad.

PASSAGES FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF SIR EGERTON BRYDGES, BART.

"PER LEGEM TERRÆ, LORD CHANDOS OF SUDELY."*

SIR Egerton Brydges, notwithstanding all which the critics have said, sometimes too truly, of the self-seeking, the repetitions, and vague and commonplace ideas observable in this work, is in our minds not only an interesting personage, by reason of the very weakness with which he clings to the romance and heraldry of his family claims, forgetting all the evils of the day of feudality in the last lingering colours of its sunset, but we look upon him as a man possessed of a real genius, which has been spoilt for want of cultivation, and has now become affecting in consequence, like some long evening sigh over a barren moor, or through the ruins of an old castle. Some of the personal sketches in his book, as may be seen by the following extracts, are masterly; and if nothing else survived him but the sonnet entitled "Echo and Silence," it would fully bear out, we think, the opinion we have expressed of his natural powers. The use of the word "she," instead of "one of them," in the sixth line, is highly vivid and full of impulse, and all the remainder downwards, is in the very best taste of fanciful imagery.

Effect of worldly splendour upon childhood.—There is a dazzle in worldly greatness which no young mind or heart can resist. I always from a child, loved to get out of its way, and bury myself in the woods.—"When I could not conquer, I learned to fly." I sincerely and deeply wish I had never come back again out of those woods. But I used to hear from my earliest infancy of the rise and grandeur of my ancestor, Lord Chancellor Egerton, and of my royal blood. Then again I heard of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, who was my father's relation, and of whose education I have heard that my grandfather had the care. The portrait of Chancellor Egerton, in his official robes, hung by the bedside in which I was born, and seemed with his grave countenance to look solemnly upon me. The engraved portrait of the other always hung over the fire-side of my uncle's justice-room. The Gibbon arms were there quartered with the York saltire, and reminded me of the relationship, for I was always observant of heraldic symbols. I have no doubt that these things made an impression on my mind which operated strongly on my future fate.

The Gentry of Kent.—At a particular age a peculiar cast of character prevails among the gentry of a particular province. We may not always be able to account for it; it is probably a fashion given by some one of leading rank and wealth. Kent once produced some very eminent men: witness Sir Thomas Wyatt, Lord Buckhurst, Sir Philip Sidney, and Sir Francis Walsingham. In the time of Charles I. the leading gentry were men of celebrity; such as Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir Roger Twysden, editor of the "Decem Scriptores," and Sir Edward Dering: this, of course, gave the bent to the minor gentry. One of the Knatchbulls, in the next reign, was an author, and in rather a singular department for a country baronet,—it was in divinity. I do not remember ever to have heard of a Honeywood having written a book. The Furnesses of Walsershire raised themselves to great riches at once, by smuggling, at Sandwich, in the reign of William and Mary, but expired in the next generation, enriching Lord Guildford, Sir Edward Dering, and the third Lord Bolingbroke. We had rarely much nobility. The second Lord Cowper, son of the Chancellor, was popular at the Moat, by his support of a pack of fox-hounds, and his love of the sports of the field; and I believe that the Lords Rockingham were well esteemed at Lee's Court, near Faversham; but the squires ruled the day. Mr. Barrett of Lee was a man of virtue, and a collector; he died 1758: Sir James Gray of Dennehill, was a diplomatist; and Mr. Robinson, afterwards Lord Rothesay, shot himself up, when he quitted Parliament, in his own independence of mind and habits, at Hopton, near Hythe. Old John Lewis pursued his own antiquarianisms at Margate,—then a little fishing town,—far from all these merry spirits of the field; while Dr. Brook Taylor indulged his philosophical genius at Bifrons. Sir Thomas Palmer, of Wingham, indulged himself, as Pope says, in wedding "the whole personæ dramatis."

To Palmer's bed no actress comes amiss,

He weds the whole personæ dramatis.

At the same time Sir John Hales shut himself up in his house at St. Stephen's, living like old Elwes, with an immense estate, on a crust, and letting his only son die in a prison. Old Dr. Nicholas Carter, the father of the poetess, was writing theological tracts against his neighbour, the orthodox Randolph, and bandying Latin epigrams with Sir George Oxenden, of Deane; and the poetess herself was writing odes upon wisdom, corresponding with Archbishop Secker, and translating Epictetus; while Nicholas Hardinge was visiting the Grays, and writing Denhiliads. Then the boy Thurlow was leading a life of torment to his master, Talbot, by his tricks and drolleries at Canterbury school; and laying the foundation of his own future greatness, by the ascendancy of his temper, and the daring directness of his talents. There from a small house opposite the west door of the Cathedral issued a Countess of Salisbury, and a fate of future greatness was still hovering over the same humble tenement, destined to be the birth-place of the late most excellent Lord Chief Justice of England. From another town in the same district the noble and illustrious house of Yorke had already issued to adorn the woollack, and enlighten the legislation of the kingdom. At the time Mrs. Macauley from Ollantigh was nursing her radical politics, and collecting materials for her most furious "History," her brother Sawbridge was dreaming of civic honours and John Wilkes. Such was East Kent from about 1720 to 1765.

Lord Rokeby. When he took possession of Horton he laid down a plan of life peculiar to himself. He resolved to be shackled by no ceremonies, but to pass his days in independence, according to what it seemed to him that nature pointed out: he kept no carriage, he never mounted a horse; he allowed no liveries to his servants; but his house-keeping was bountiful, and his hospitality generous and large. He was a resolute and unbending whig, formed on the principles of Algernon Sydney and Locke; and he carried his arguments much further than in those days the people were accustomed. Daring to think only for himself, he sometimes indulged in crude ideas, and his style was inelegant and harsh. He carried his hatred of the artificial through everything; he took down his garden walls, and let his hedges drop, that his herds and flocks might have their full range. He hated the plough, and let his arable fields run to natural grass; so that his park became very large and very picturesque merely by letting it alone: he was skilful in the management of cattle, and as his land was rich his stock was fat and profitable.

He had some strange notions about money, and rarely put it out at interest; he kept a sum of money in gold for about fifty years in chests in his house, which, at a compound interest would have accumulated to £100,000; and he had at his death above £20,000 lying in the hands of different bankers, of which a great part had lain there for many years; he had also money in many of the continental banks. He had no faith in the public funds, and always predicted that they would break; a prediction which he contended was fulfilled when the bank was restricted from cash-payments in 1797; yet it was not very reasonable to fear the national bank and trust private banks. It must be admitted that he entertained some crochets in his head.

His clothes were plain to a degree that many would call mean; and latterly he let his white beard grow down to his waist. He was a great walker, and stalked along with his staff, like an aged peasant. His voice was loud but his manners were courteous, and he knew the world well. He was sagacious, manly and uncompromising. He had a great contempt for provincial importance; and therefore was not in great favour with some of the neighbouring gentry, who knew not how to estimate that dignity of mind which despised those outward trappings of superiority on which they prided themselves. By the yeomanry and peasantry he was adored, as their protector and benefactor.

He was a great reader, but not of works of imagination. His taste turned to politics, voyages, and travels. As he loved plainness, he did not relish the more refined parts of literature. He was the reverse of his father, who was never happy out of the high and polished society and clubs of London, and thought a country life a perfect misery. The father and son were not very fond of one another, and each was angry at the other's taste. In every thing Lord Rokeby was manly and straightforward: he had no dark and hidden passions; he was free from the slightest taint of envy or jealousy: he was nobly generous, while he knew the full value of money; so much so as to appear to superficial observers miserly. His very simple and humble dress, was mistaken by many for avarice.

When now and then some stranger of rank came into the country, and paid him a visit through curiosity, founded on the absurd rumours of his eccentricities and hermit-life, he was surprised to meet with a man, though singular in his dress, yet a man of the world in his manners and conversation; ready, acute, easy, and full of good sense, with a power of sarcastic dignity which put down the smallest attempt at impertinence or misapprehension.

He retained his faculties to the last, and, I believe had enjoyed his earthly being altogether more than any other person I could name. He had an estate in Yorkshire as well as in Kent, of which I do not know the exact extent, and of which he never raised the rents; and he might have died amazingly rich in pastoral property, if he had made interest of his money.

Duncombe, the translator of Horace. John Duncombe, the translator of Horace, was at this time Sixpreacher at Canterbury, and rector of Herne. He was a sort of general littérateur,—very multifarious in his erudition, but not very exact; neglected and uncouth in his person; and awkward in his manner; a long face, with only one eye, and a shambling figure; his pockets stuffed with pamphlets; his manner hurried, and his articulation indistinct. He reached a certain point in everything, but in nothing went beyond mediocrity. The translations of Horace by himself and his father are miserably dull. Nothing was alleged against him, unless perhaps that he was mean in pecuniary matters. [This "unless" is a pleasant qualification.]

Bishop Berkeley's family. One of the prebendaries of Canterbury, was Dr. George Berkeley, son of the celebrated Irish Bishop. He recommended to my father, as a remedy, the bishop's pamphlet on tar-water; but my father unfortunately took a quack medicine called "Soap lees,"—a medicine strong enough to kill a horse. Dr. Berkeley was an amiable man, but talkative and wild, with a very small portion of his father's genius. He had married a virago, the most garrulous, vain, foolish, presumptuous, and ill tempered of women; by whom he had a son George Moncke Berkeley; who mingled most of the absurdities of his parents, except that he was not so bad-tempered as his mother. He died at the age of between twenty and thirty, and his mother published a heavy quarto "Memoir," purporting to be an account of his life, but stuffed with every sort of nonsense and impertinence. Thus ended the descendants of the excellent and illustrious Bishop Berkeley, to whom Pope ascribed "every virtue under heaven." The pious Mrs. Catherine Talbot (niece of Chancellor Talbot) has been, in early life, deeply attached to Dr. Berkeley, the son,—an attachment, which it was suspected, she could not eradicate from her heart to the last. Mrs. Berkeley, when angry, could sit for hours relating a set of scandalous stories, all falsehoods of her own fertile invention from beginning to end. Though the very picture of ugliness and deformity, she affected to have been a great beauty, and said she endeavoured to spoil her face, in pity to the worshipping swains, who would otherwise have died of admiration. Her husband was a dreaming, light-hearted, self-deluding man, who bore all this without great annoyance.

Country gentlemen fifty years ago.—I never saw London till I was sixteen years old; nor indeed ever went out of Kent. My father's health was bad, and he lived entirely in the country, his family was large, and though he lived plentifully, he lived plainly and unostentatiously. Few country gentlemen then went much to London, unless they were in parliament; and my father had on his own side no near relation except his brother.

The fame of writers compared with that of statesmen and worldly greatness.—The fame of men, of whose minds the fruits are spent upon their contemporaries, soon dies; of excellent authors the labours are permanent, and increase in value and reputation with time. Make the comparison in what degree of liveliness exists the memory of Johnson and Burke at this day, when set against that of Pitt and Fox. Compare Lord Chancellor Thurlow, Lord Rosslyn, or even Lord Mansfield, with Gibbon or Robertson! Even Cumberland is still familiar to us; while Lord North, to whose greatness he looked with such humble reverence, is fading fast from our recollection;—while Goldsmith, who lost his presence of mind before the pompous splendour of the Duke of Northumberland, lives on every one's lips at the time when the forgotten Duke is entombed in peerage books.

A good memorandum.—The passions are in some degree at the mercy of the thoughts, as are the thoughts of the passions. It is a moral duty therefore to endeavour to think rightly.

Charge against law charges.—I have found that lawyers take from seventy-five to ninety per cent. on an average; sometimes as high as eight hundred per cent.; viz. their charges have been about £2300 for what, when taxed, the legal charge was only £331. 7s. 6d.; and taken the greater part of it in advance too, stopping it out of money passing through their hands. In twenty years they have thus taken nearer £100,000 than £50,000 from me and mine; their regular law charges alone amounting to upwards of £2500 a year, and under the name of what they call their cash payments—many of which were no payments at all—nearly as much. In no other country of the world are there, or ever have there been, such abuses of this kind as in England. The appetite of the extortioner increases by feeding:—

And where the fell attorney prowls for prey, if you do not resist the first false charge of a few pounds, he will go on till he gets £99. 19s. 6d. of all your property. Let the Thellusson case be a crying instance. But he is not content with taking all; it is one of the tricks to bring you in debt into the bargain, that he may have a rod over you to keep you mute.

Thomas Warton.—There are few characters on which I look with so much complacent interest as Warton's. His temper was so sunny and benevolent; his manners were so simple; his erudition was so classical and various; his learning was so illuminated by fancy; his love of the country was so unaffected; his images were so picturesque; his knowledge of feudal and chivalrous manners was so minute, curious, and lively; his absence of all worldly ambition and shew was so attractive; his humour was so good-natured and innocent; his unaffected love of literature was so encouraging and exemplary, that I gaze upon his memory with untired satisfaction. —[There is something very pleasing and beautiful in this summary of Warton's character, the more so for its truth, and not the less so for being influenced by the writer's personal sympathy of pursuits. Some of Warton's sonnets and of Sir Egerton's would suit together, like windows in a cathedral.]

ECHO AND SILENCE.

(Written Oct. 1782, in the Author's Twentieth year.)

In eddying course when leaves begin to fly,
And Autumn in her lap the store to strew,
As 'mid wild scenes I chanced the Muse to woo
Thro' glens untrod and woods that frown'd on high,
Two sleeping nymphs with wonder mute I spy!
And lo! she's gone!—In robe of dark-green hue
'Twas Echo from her sister silence flew,
For quick the hunter's horn resounded to the sky!
In shade affrighted Silence melts away,
Not so her sister.—Hark! for onward still
With far heard step she takes her listening way,
Bounding from rock to rock and hill to bill.
Ah, mark the merry Maid in mockful play,
With thousand mimic tones the laughing forest fill.

Eloquent regret and important advice.—Were a great literary genius to set out early in life without fear, and listen only to the voice of nature, what mighty things he might do! But every one is in youth shackled by the technical tyranny of those who have taken on themselves to dictate in the literary world. He is frightened in the belief that he must by art arrive at some excellence different from nature; and for that he is much less qualified than an inferior mind. He does not trust to nature's first impulses, and seeks something more recondite than her lessons. Thus, he becomes stiff and formal; and so disgusts himself and gets dispirited, and often gives up the pursuit in despair. He finds the charlatan beat him; and hates that which he sees arrogant pretenders win. Oh, what a glorious career he thus abandons! A mighty world of inexhaustible wealth, and beauty, and grandeur, and beauty, and magic, is before him. He has but to take his pencil and his colour, and with free hand dash it out upon the canvass; then to look into his own bosom, follow its emotions, and to comment upon it with the eloquence and passion which those emotions prompt. He cannot then be wrong. What is written on his heart, is written on the heart of millions of others.

TABLE-TALK.

Unpleasant Reminders.—Never bring to view irremediable disasters; especially to, or in the hearing of any who, in the eyes of others or their own, may have contributed to these same disasters, or the like. No reference to them will make them not have happened; and, in addition to the sufferings they caused, add not the sufferings which the reminiscence of them brings with it. [Goethe has a good passage on this subject. See the admirable translation of his Wilhelm Meister, by Mr. Carlyle.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The song mentioned by D. W. has never reached us. We shall be happy to hear from G. H. L.

The lines of the deceased H. L., enclosed by F. B. are very young.

Pray let URBANUS SYLVAN set to work, taking care not to misgive himself; and then it will be hard, if his love does not make his writing do him justice.

The article entitled the "Man of Taste," which is under consideration, was not received in time enough for an earlier notice to correspondents.

MR. CAMPBELL'S LIFE OF MRS. SIDDONS.

This day, in Two Volumes 8vo., with a full-length Portrait, from Sir Thomas Lawrence, by Lupton, price 26s.

THE LIFE OF MRS. SIDDONS.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, Esq.

AUTHOR OF "THE PLEASURES OF HOPE."

"It was a cherished wish of the great actress that this eminent poet should be her biographer; and, many years ago, she exacted from him a promise, that, if he survived her, he would write her Life. The task is now performed, and we have not only the mental, the moral, and physical portrait of this surprisingly great actress reflected as in a mirror, but the work abounds in useful and delightful criticisms, so that a species of charm is imparted to every page."—Weekly Dispatch.

"The private Memoranda of the accomplished person whose memory the poet has thought it worthy of his talents to embaln, form a very interesting feature in these volumes which are, we may say, in a few words, an ornament to our literature of a highly pleasing and instructive character."—Literary Gazette.

"Whether we consider the interest which attaches to the subject of these volumes, or the author who furnishes them, we cannot but regard them as a valuable addition to the literature of the country."—Sunday Times.

"Mrs. Siddons has found a fitting biographer in the poet Campbell. Simple, elegant, and noble in style, as was the wondrous creature whose extraordinary career the work describes, it at once enchains the reader's attention."—Bell's New Weekly Messenger.

"Mrs. Siddons's own Memoranda, in these volumes, display a deep and heart-searching knowledge of human motives and feelings; they must be invaluable to actors, as proving by what patient and intense study she obtained that perfection which was, and is, and we sincerely believe, will remain without a rival."—Athenaeum.
